ROOM FOR IMPROVEMENT

glance, and yet without much expense it was changed into a kitchen to dream about.

It was a big room, dingy and tall and bleak as a winter field. It made you think of all the bad news you had ever had, and expect it again. The paper was drab and muddy, looking as if it had been rained on for years. The linoleum was full of holes, dead in hue, worn thin. There were doors in three corners of the room and a window in the fourth. And the windows were enormous, over four feet wide and almost six feet high. The ceiling was over ten feet high. And the one radiator was in the middle of the wall under a window, stretching almost six feet.

As for storage space, in all that expanse there was one solitary cabinet rising like a lone peak from floor to ceiling, and only 30½ inches wide! It stood between the door to the dining room and the back stairs, and the whole upper half was about as accessible as Mont Blanc. Everything had to be accordioned in the lower half, and there was no place for storage of mops, brooms, dustcloths or cleaning equipment. And there was almost no work surface at all. The housewife must have walked miles and miles for every meal.

The basic step in making a Cinderella of this stepchild was a complete change in the arrangement of equipment. This was lined up in two rows, making a compact working area within the large room, a kitchen within a kitchen as it were, leaving the excess space as a passageway. The sink was moved to the right of its original location, making space for upper and lower cabinets. The refrigerator and range were moved opposite the sink, with a good cabinet space between them, where an ample work surface makes food preparation easy. Back of the refrigerator and cabinets a supporting partition was placed, defining the passageway and giving support for hanging additional storage cabinets.

The floor was sanded and repaired, and new clear deep-blue linoleum was laid smoothly over the kitchen area, and light-gray mottled linoleum over the passageway area, thus helping to mark off the division and giving interest. The counters were covered with the blue linoleum, matching the floor. Blue for the passageway walls and white for the kitchen area balanced the color scheme.

ONLY two new pieces of equipment were added: a sink bowl sunk into a linoleum-covered counter; and a new automatic washing machine, which was a Christmas present from the man of the house to his very best girl. The sink change was necessary because the old porcelain sink was rimmed with cracks to catch dirt and nourish germs, and the old soggy wooden top just wobbled on its edge. It had no bottom shelf under it, so the floor of the room functioned as the bottom of the sink cabinet. I remember from my childhood how the dirt rolled in the bottom of cabinets like that. The base cabinet of the sink was remodeled to provide better storage and make toe space. Extra shelves were added inside.

The cabinets, which give much needed storage space, were secondhand and were purchased quite reasonably. One small closet for cleaning equipment was built in the room near the radiator, in space that would have been idle. A closet for the vacuum cleaner and extra brooms and mops was in the hall just outside the door to the back stairs. An old-fashioned grille was found in the basement, painted and fitted over the ugly leviathan radiator, adding interest to the wall and space for putting things.

The little kitchen within a kitchen makes housekeeping a delight. No more marathon around and up and down, and no more confusion as the family troops in and out of the back door, for the new arrangement takes the traffic out of the operating part of the kitchen. And this is one of the nicest features the room, I think. In the old kitchen when ıe back door opened to let in four children ıd a cocker and a lot of wind and snow, that :licate soufflé just coming from the oven ould never raise its head again!

Now to me no kitchen worthy of its hire ın do without a place for quick meals, early reakfasts or after-school snacks. In the ırly days, families ate in the kitchen most of ıe time, with dining-room meals on Sunday for company. Then it became the fashion) eat entirely in the dining room, probably ue to the servant period in our lives. And ow we are back again in the kitchen; and) privation, either, when the kitchen is gay ıd charming and the eating center is prac-cal and attractive. In this kitchen there as enough room between the dining-room ıd the back-hall doors for a small drop-own eating table.

Another advantage of a middle-aged house nd its kitchen is that there is usually space or an automatic washing machine. For if ıere are children in the house, as there ıould be, it is a great help to be able to run ırough a tub of laundry without making a pecial job of it. While polishing the silver, is comfortable to have the yellow and ıvender rompers swirling around at the ame time. And no lugging them up and down tairs either. Here the new automatic was laced at the end of the sink-cabinet unit, here it will be out of the food-preparation rea, and yet easily connected with the lumbing.

Pleasant general diffused illumination was rovided by installing lights behind the offit. These are directed against the glossy hite ceiling. More concentrated light was dded at the sink, eating center and range.

And finally, the gift of color added its ıagic to the dreary gray and tan of the past. The oversize blank panes of glass that made the whole kitchen so hopeless-looking were hung with candy-striped curtains of plastic-treated chambray. This material is practical as well as colorful, since it can be wiped clean with a damp cloth, is stain-resistant, fadeproof, and washes and irons well. Above them a dramatic sweep of candy-red swag was hung on plastic hoops, giving grace and personality. The plastic hoops in red and white were easy to fasten up, and the swag was simply a large piece of material cut on the bias and folded in soft folds. The ugly windows became an asset instead of a liability. A band of chartreuse painted from the ceiling to the top of the soffit appears to lower the ceiling. Chartreuse was repeated in the chairs and accessories.

When this kitchen was finished I couldn't help thinking again of dozens of kitchens I know which would respond to just such treatment gratefully. And the necessary carpenter work, electrical changes and plumbing were entirely done by local men, and done with skill and enthusiasm. It is a heartening thought that the kitchens of yesterday may be transformed into so much comfort and charm, and still leave the budget healthy and flourishing.

What fun for the children to troop in after skating and find oyster stew hot and savory in this kitchen, with crispy crackers and a salad bowl of mixed greens set up on the snack table! What fun to come in after a high-school dance and scramble eggs while the man of the hour makes toast and somebody else stirs the hot chocolate with a cinnamon stick! And what fun for mother the morning after to eat a quiet breakfast with father while the sun glows like a rose through the clean curtains! For this kitchen is good to live in!

GROWING PAINS

Meet Lois Sutton, Awkward Teen-Ager of Mt. Holly, N. J.

BY EMILY KIMBROUGH

WOULD you like to write a story" an editor of this magazine asked, "about a little girl thirteen years old? She's a fat little girl and ——"

I interrupted the editor vehemently. I would not like to write about a bouncing roly-poly, I told her. I could not do an honest report about a girl who laughed and giggled all the time, and had such a good time she didn't care how fat she was. Because I didn't believe all fat people were jolly—little girls particularly. It was all the St. Nicholas legend.

The editor was more polite than I had been. She did not interrupt, but when I had finished, she said quietly, "This little girl isn't jolly about being fat. And she isn't going to be fat much longer. She's going to lose twenty-five pounds."

The next day, driving over to Mt. Holly, New Jersey, to see the fat little girl and begin my story, I kept remembering over and over a day and night in June more years ago than I wish to count, much less tabulate here. I knew that this memory was what had made me so vehemently reluctant to have anything to do with a fat little girl. Because this memory over all the years since had been a sore spot, a bruise somewhere around my heart, I think, that made me wince when any reference to overweight jabbed it.

That day in June, so long ago, I was spending with a friend, one of my "ten most intimate friends." I had totaled the number judiciously and painstakingly. This friend was fourteen. So was I. And I was spending the day and the night with her because we were going to a party, the most important party in our lives, because it was our first dance. Actually the party was for the older sister of another "most intimate friend," but, out of kindness, a few of our "bunch" had been included in the invitations.

"Lois and a phone connect like ducks and water." Family still find their sprouting Sutton a stairway obstacle. But where rising prices of double malteds were once a nightly bulletin, now it's a rising temperature over the latest crush. "We gather that he's got big ears and a solid line."

What's a girl to do with the shape of a barrel when she really wants the contour of H. Lamarr? "Detour into some curves, of course," advised Navy-sophisticated brother John. Getting Lois to thump, bump, and like lettuce was his idea. "She never minds taking a telling-off from me."

All that hot June day we got ready for it. We washed our hair, and set it with "water-wave combs." We sprinkled pink powder on our nail buffers and buffed our nails until they burned, but gleamed. We locked ourselves in her bedroom and practiced pinning a three-inch-wide hair ribbon around our bosoms, pinning it tighter with each practice, until the proper "boyish form" was achieved. Our mothers thought we were not old enough to wear a brassière, and life was unendurable unless we could mash down our fronts into a façade as sexless as that of the Empire State Building.

Of course we thought the evening would never come, and of course it did, as evenings always do. We were there, at the party, standing at the edge of the dance floor, eager and scared, our foreheads glistening with nervous sweat; our noses too, though we rubbed them frequently with our new and first powder puffs from the little round cardboard "Dorines" we were clutching in moist, gluey palms.

It was about an hour later when my friend's brother came up to her. He was tall, blond, handsome, and he went to Yale. "Why don't you go home?" he said to his sister. "Nobody wants to dance with a fat girl."

A sign on the road pointed out that here was Mt. Holly. The man at the gas station knew that the Suttons lived three blocks farther down and four blocks over west—"big house on the corner with a lot of yard." Mr. and Mrs. Kenneth Evan Sutton lived there, and their daughter Lois, who was thirteen years old on the twenty-fourth of May, and weighed 135 pounds.

Mrs. Sutton opened the door. She is a little woman, and pretty. Her short, dark hair is vigorous and curly. She has chic and vitality. Humor and intelligence are in her eyes. Lois would be here in a minute. Would I come in?

The Suttons' house is a serene, not fretful Victorian. The rooms are large, high-ceilinged, long-windowed, and free from stained glass or cupola. The living room runs the length of the house on the left of the wide entrance hall. The dining room is on the right, with a charming built-in cupboard. We sat in the living room.

She had not done much decorating, Mrs. Sutton said. They had been in the house only a few weeks. They had bought this house in less than an hour after they had looked at it, and they had not had to do any repainting. But she was going to take her time about the decorating. The things from the old house fitted in very well, and she wanted to settle down for a while until she was sure just what she wanted. She did need a new kitchen arrangement—this one was very old-fashioned; and Lois knew exactly how she wanted her own room done over. Her father had made the bed she had now, but Lois was crazy for a Colonial room, and she had outgrown the bed and the rest of the furniture.

Lois came bounding into the room, a caramel-colored cocker jumping and yapping at her side. "Hello," she said, with quick friendliness, and sat on a couch near her mother; sat and fidgeted.

Lois' hair is actually chestnut, and that is uncommon. A reddish brown, like chestnuts, of course; like cherry wood, too, polished. She was about 5′ 1″ that day and her 135 pounds made her face round and shapeless. Her best feature was her beautiful hair.

She guessed she was going to like Mt. Holly, she said, but she hadn't met many kids. Nearly all of them got jobs in the summer, berrypicking, and were away all day. She knew one or two who were at home. They were younger than she, but that was all right. She'd gone swimming once at a place she'd been taken to. She didn't know where it was, but it wasn't far. Only there was something in the water she didn't like, and she hadn't gone again. She didn't like sports much anyway. She'd rather play with her paper dolls. It was fun to make clothes for them. She designed them herself. They were scattered about on a table in front of the window at the far end of the room. She ran to get them—the dog, too, and they had a roughhouse together.

Mrs. Sutton was talking about the furniture in the room. She had had to buy a few things. She laughed. "That table is only twenty-four hours old."

Lois stopped roughhousing with the dog. "No, it isn't," she interrupted her mother. "It's lots older than that."

Mrs. Sutton smiled. "I meant I've only had it for twenty-four hours."

"But you didn't say that." She was gleeful over her correction.

Conversation was a little difficult, because Lois made herself an insistent part of it, whatever the topic. A child her age might easily have been bored at being in the room with grownups, restless, impatient to get away to her own interests. Lois wanted to be there, and she wanted desperately to be part of everything that was going on. That is an attention-getter, psychologists say, and attention-getters are insecure people. Lois was a bubbling, vivacious, giggly child, but she was attention-getting. And once when she interrupted a conversation it was to interpolate that she had made her mother get up in the night a few days after they had moved here, to get in bed with her. Shirley, the little girl across

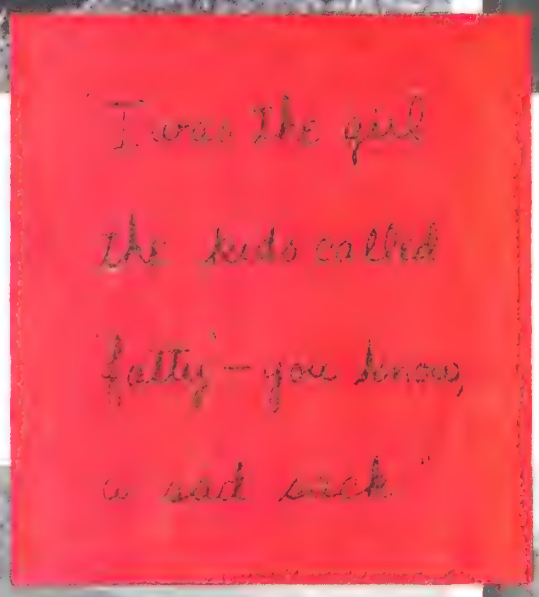
Who doesn't dream of a new place to live in and a whole new personality? There was a bonus for Lois when family changed homes as she was changing figure. Now it's a joke to recall her old plaint—"I can't pull in my stomach, I'm just fat."

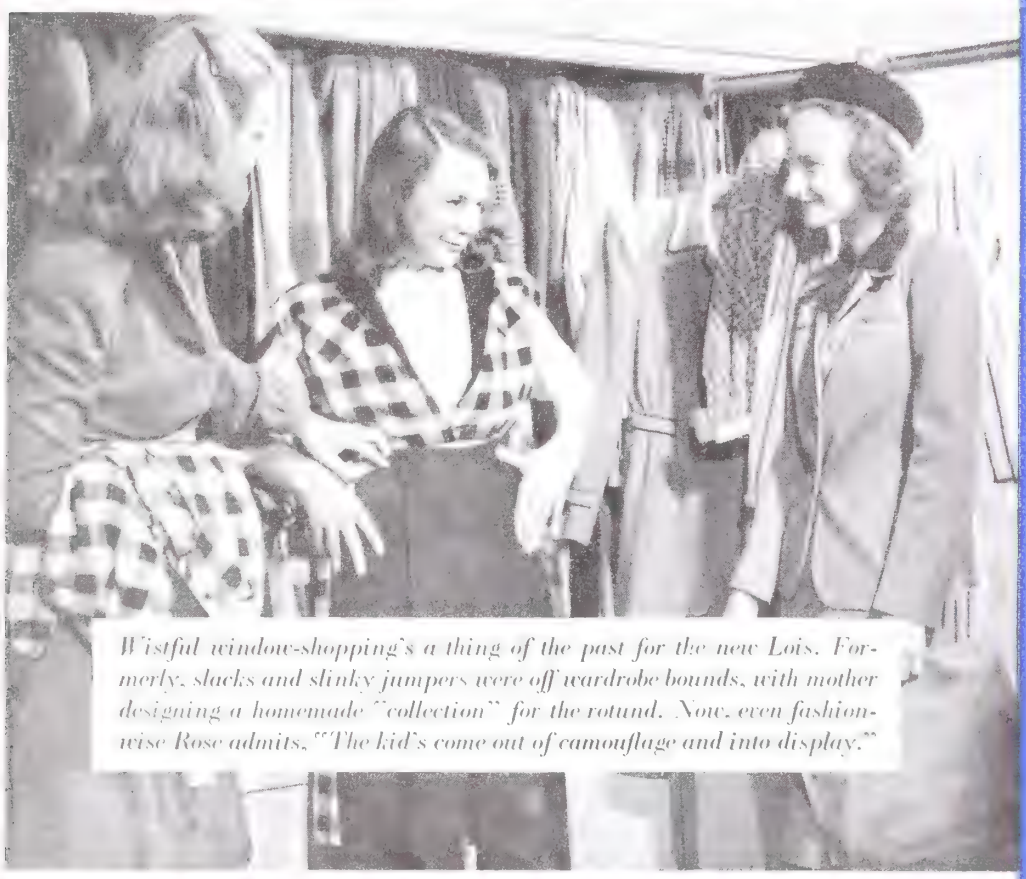
Only a batch of fudge used to be able to trap Lois in the kitchen. Now she's a whiz with the dishes, even takes over to do basting chores. "But cooking won't mean a thing to me—once I'm a Navy nurse."



Homework palls, and why not—especially when a mellow crooner sends 'em. But the singing bow tie (Sinatra), gets wary an ear when Dick Haymes is etherizing. On kids' hit parade, crime tops love, with Sherlock as the "ace gumshoe."

Glamour—courtesy of mother's lipstick. Lois gets a mirror's-eye preview of the time when she and her fan will stop the stag line. Today, she'll borrow on the future by borrowing grown-up clothes.

The titbit-nibbling Mr. Taffy takes over—just as if he didn't know that this is Lois' last big binge before her six-week fight to shave 25 pounds. "You'll probably make the movies," say kids who favor career in westerns, animal thrillers, or "old-fashioneds—anything from long skirts back."



Wistful window-shopping's a thing of the past for the new Lois. Formerly, slacks and slinky jumpers were off wardrobe bounds, with mother designing a homemade "collection" for the rotund. Now, even fashion-wise Rose admits, "The kid's come out of camouflage and into display."

"All I'd hear about was no salt and more celery and couldn't I turn the radio off so she'd get twelve hours' sleep," says Rose of evenings with Lois. "But then about the only fun she had was making over her dresses. I guess you take yourself seriously when you're taking a life like that."

the street, and younger, had told Lois a legend about the Jersey Devil, and Lois had been terrified in bed that night. Thirteen-year-olds are not apt to scare so easily, unless they are, perhaps, fundamentally insecure.

She was a competent child. At school in her sewing class she had made a pair of shorts. She ran upstairs, and came back with a dress she had just finished at home. Mrs. Sutton looked dubiously at the hem, but said she would pass it. She was a good little cook, Mrs. Sutton asserted.

Lois interrupted. No, she wasn't. She had put baking soda instead of baking powder into muffins she had made at school. But, she added, she had given them to a boy who had teased her. It was not hard to guess about what he had teased her.

When Lois ran off again, willingly and obediently, to make some iced tea, Mrs. Sutton talked again. We had gone into the yard and were sitting in a swing, in the cool shade of a big tree.

"Lois didn't start to get fat until about three years ago, when she had her tonsils out. After that she seemed to put on weight all at once. I didn't bother much about it. I thought she would outgrow it. But I fussed about the way she stood. I'd say to pull in her stomach. But one day this spring when I said it, she burst out crying. She said she couldn't pull it in, it had to stick out. She was fat, and she couldn't help it. The kids at school were teasing her. They called her Fatty." Mrs. Sutton's eyes snapped, remembering. "I said right back to her, 'Well, you call them Skinny, and don't go feeling sorry for yourself.'"

Mrs. Sutton is an intelligent and a sensitive human being. Those attributes are apt to make wise and understanding mothers. Sitting in the swing, her head resting back against the wooden framework, swaying lazily back and forth, she gave a lesson in parenthood that is good to remember.

JUST as soon as she could get there, after Lois' outburst, she had gone to their family physician. She wanted him to do something about Lois' weight, and not waste any time about it. Something drastic and quick. It was probably glandular. What about some injections? The doctor refused point-blank. This was no time to start tinkering around with glands. Thirteen was a ticklish age. But he'd be glad to make up a diet. Mrs. Sutton said she'd think it over; she doubted her ability to make Lois stick to a diet over a long period. Mrs. Sutton wanted action. And then Johnny came home.

Mrs. Sutton sat up and stopped swinging. "Here he comes now," she said.

A boy came whistling around the side of the house. He was blond, young, though his hair was traveling too fast and far from his forehead for his age to warrant. He had a smile and a twinkle in his eye that must have made girl hostesses in any canteen he entered say, "I dibs on that one," and start across the dance floor to meet him. Mrs. Sutton needn't have whispered that he was just out of the Navy. His trousers were as disreputable as the shapeless sweat shirt he was wearing, but the angle of the nondescript cap down over one eyebrow was a gob's tilt.

The screen door banged and Lois came flying down the steps. Johnny braced himself, feet apart and arms wide. "Hi," they called to each other. Presently they went into the house together, the dog circling them hysterically. Mrs. Sutton leaned back in the swing again.

Johnny is Lois' brother—her half brother, actually, though Mrs. Sutton had to go back to make that clear, because she never thinks of him that way. When she and Kenneth Sutton were married in 1932, Mr. Sutton had three children—his first wife had died in 1929: Rose, who was thirteen; Evan, twelve, and Johnny, seven. From the time Lois was a baby she had adored Johnny, and he was crazy about her too. He was enough older, Mrs. Sutton said, so that he didn't have to tease to make himself seem important, the way some brothers do.

So Johnny and Lois had always been pals. Evan married and moved away; Rose got a job in New York; and when he was eighteen, Johnny joined the Navy. It was while Johnny was away that Lois got fat. Just when she needed attention most she lost a major source. And no substitute was found. Now Johnny was back; he had a job "ditch digging" and was having a grand time. He was going to Rutgers later, under the G. I. bill. He planned to study hotel management.

It was Johnny's home-coming that Mrs. Sutton had started to tell about. The very first evening, while they were still excited about his being there, and the presents he'd brought back from Japan, he'd said to Lois, "Look, kid, if you'd lose twenty-five pounds, you'd be good-looking."

And then he'd said, before Lois had a chance to have hurt feelings, "Look, I'll tell you what. You lose twenty-five pounds, and I'll date you. We'll go to a night club in New York and I'll buy you a dress to wear. How about it?"

It had been as easy as that. Mrs. Sutton hadn't had to sell her idea at all. Lois was wild. She wanted to start that night. She would quit eating. She'd do this and the other thing. Mrs. Sutton sprang her plan. Lois would take a reducing

"If only Van could see you now." Lois really had the town talking for her return engagement with Pompton Lakes. The gang kept her busy trying on new clothes and trying out the latest hair-dos on everyone about. "It was somewhat exhausting," Lois reports. "But best of all was this: nobody laughed at me, not even once."

PHOTOS BY J. DI PIETRO

Lois used to walk her bases, both scholastically and out-of-doors. Now she hits homers for the eighth-grade team, in softball and geography.

"What do you know, it happened— a boy even whistled at me."

Sneaking a sundae means less to Lois than latest projects of "Slick Chick" club which meets weekly to cook, sew—"and just discuss things."

"Definitely fatiguing" is boys' idea of dancing, and even Mt. Holly's Number One wolves get a sudden yen for the outdoors when dates want to cut a rug. But cure for slowness on the "ballroom uptake" is underway. Girls hold after-school classes with cake for the apt. Their policy: "No jive, no food."

"Definitely not kid stuff—we never sat out one dance." Three orchestras and a floor show kept Lois happy when she and John went on the town to toast her new figure. But big brother is betting on a "quieter future. When she hits a stag line, I'll take to a side line."

"If heaven's like this—I'll be a thin angel."

course in New York. They did it scientifically. Mrs. Sutton had found out all about it, and Lois could live with Rose in her little apartment.

Now Mrs. Sutton was wise indeed to be prepared for the exactly right psychological moment to present Lois with a plan. But she was also lucky; she had the means and the facilities at hand for the shortest, easiest method by which Lois could overcome her awkwardness. They had enough money; they lived near New York, where, just because of the importance of self-assurance, confidence and attractiveness, there are many experts devoted to slimming down fat girls, streamlining bad skins, straightening careless postures, teaching clothes sense and in general trying to capture that elusive quality: charm.

Had they lived in a smaller city, Mrs. Sutton could probably not have found such a ready, all-in-one-package answer. But she could have found one all the same. She could have started with the help of the family physician—or she could have sought the many fine books and magazine articles on diet and exercise and beauty. Faithfully followed, good advice on figure slimming, health bettering, skin clearing and good manners will work all the wonders that any charm school can. Working in a group is, of course, a stimulant to action—but there are substitutes: dancing classes, teen-age beauty clubs, mother-and-daughter pacts to work together, a program of rewards. The stimulus to be attractive is all around us. It simply has to be put to work.

It happened to be Lois' brother who provided Lois with her stimulus—but had he not, Mrs. Sutton could probably have used simply the summer vacation and not too much to do. It was, after all, Lois' ideal chance. By the time school began, nobody would know she'd ever been fat, since they were in a new place, and the kids went out berrypicking.

MRS. SUTTON got up from the swing. "That's the way it stands," she said. "She'll be going pretty soon. I'm going with her, but I won't stay. I'll just see her started. I don't want to be away from Ken too long. But I'll be back and forth, I expect." She laughed gently. "Lois says she doesn't care what kind of dress she gets so long as it's ready-made. She likes what I make for her. It's just the idea. She can't get into any girl's-size dress the way she is now. I guess the day she can go into a store and pull a dress off the rack down over her head will be Christmas for her."

We went into the house for the iced tea, and Mr. Sutton came in. He is a quiet, thoughtful man, indulgent and devoted to his family. He calls Mrs. Sutton "Honey," and says he fell in love with her at a Christmas party at the Wright Aeronautical factory in Paterson where they both worked. She was a secretary and he was production manager. He says that she had on a red dress.

They still go out dancing together and like it. He likes fishing, too, and goes up to Canada every year with some other men who like to fish. When Lois is in college—she wants to go to the University of Pennsylvania—he and Mrs. Sutton are going to India. They are saving for it. They both love traveling. Mrs. Sutton was born in Paterson, and Mr. Sutton thinks New Jersey is a good state. He likes it. He likes where his wife came from, and he likes just about anything she decides. So if she thought this New York course was the thing for Lois, he didn't doubt that it was too.

I finished my iced tea and said that I must go. I would see Lois in her school in New York, I told her. That would be fine, she answered, but she was preoccupied with Johnny. She was badgering him to show her his Japanese souvenirs again.

It was nearly six weeks later, on a sticky hot day, when I went into the school (one of a number of such schools), on New York's Fifth Avenue to see Lois. The inside of the building was cool, however, cool and hushed and elegant. I experienced a slight sinking of spirit. What kind of atmosphere was this for a healthy, unsophisticated thirteen-year-old—all this soft, dim light, faint but exotic scent, and exquisitely articulated voices? She ought to be sweating in the sunshine and yelling and dirty. (Continued on Page 265)

"I'M TIRED OF BEING CALLED FATTY!"

BY DAWN CROWELL

Beauty Director of Modern Screen

IF you were the girl pictured on the left of this page, how would you like to be able to turn yourself into the girl on the right? To transform your face and figure from that of an awkward, overweight, self-conscious teen-ager to that of a pretty, slim, popular girl? These two pictures of Lois Sutton, taken only six weeks apart, could serve as illustrations for the most imaginative fairy tale ever written. But better than that, they tell a real-life story! The story of a girl who, for thirteen years, endured good-humoredly a long list of unflattering name tags and fun-poking jokes about her own appearance!

But there comes a time in every girl's life when a gibing remark, directed at her, hits at the heart instead of the funny bone. When a joke has no humor if it concerns the way she looks. The time came for Lois last summer. At thirteen Lois derived no merriment from being outstanding for her lack of feminine allure. At a time when other girls her age were enjoying their first enchantment of popularity, Lois knew her cumbersome figure would hinder her happiness in this girl-meets-grown-up world! With this disheartening discovery came her six words, half rebellious, half plaintive, "I'm tired of being called Fatty!"

Lois' mother knew a prompt remedy was necessary. First, to eliminate Lois' immediate physical handicaps. Second, in so doing, to insure her against the possibilities of an unhappy, inhibited adult life. Last summer, with her doctor's approval, and before she resumed school in a new town, Lois undertook a regular program of physical improvement. The following pages show pictures of Lois during those weeks. For a prescribed number of hours each day, Lois thumped and bumped away her excess weight; followed unerringly a rigid diet; and put to practice her new-found knowledge of good grooming. At the end of six weeks, Lois emerged with a brighter outlook, both mental and physical; an impressive amount of poise; and best of all, a lovely new figure that called for a size 9 dress!

Roll over on right hip until you have found the ttest spot between hipbone and spine. Then raise hip from floor and re-rn with thump on fat spot. Reverse position of legs. Begin 10 times, work up 50 for fat spot of each hip. An exercise designed to banish hip-area bulges.

Toe reach for flatter tummy, firmer chest. Lie flat on back, arms upstretched, waistline digging into floor. Raise right g and left arm in air and touch them together, reaching for toe. Now owly, with waistline digging floor as hard as possible, lower leg and arm to iginal position. Repeat with opposite leg and arm. Begin 10 times, work up 50 with each side. Follow details in all exercise directions for best results.

What's wrong with this figure? Lois listens while Miss Ann Delafield, who personally supervises the six-weeks course, explains Lois' figure faults to Mrs. Sutton. Lois has kyphosis (bad posture); lordosis (sway-back); a protruding abdomen and twenty-five excess pounds to get rid of.

Is there a doctor in the house? Lois cannot begin her strenuous exercises or rigorous diet until she has had a thorough medical examination. Any drastic changes in eating or exercise habits are a shock to the system and should be undertaken only after your doctor's approval.

With previous instruction on flattening her back against a wall, Lois takes another step toward pretty posture. Place a book far back on the top of your head; with shoulders down, chest and rib cage elevated, walk up a flight of stairs. Repeat for better posture, added height.

Lois forsook sweets, lunched on salads, drank ten glasses of water daily plus fruit juices and a glass of skim milk at night. Here she is pictured with classmates at the food bar. Her salad consists of a lettuce base, shredded carrots and beets, green pepper, and a giant-size stalk of celery. Fruit salads are served with a spinach base to bring out flavor of fruit.

"Good grooming to your finger tips" was a rule to be taken literally. In addition to learning how to give herself a manicure, Lois discovered that mineral oil and white iodine, applied in equal parts on the nail and cuticle, will help make nails grow stronger, prettier.

TEEN-AGE girls often suffer through the agonies of a bad complexion because they are told, "Blemished skin must be expected with adolescence." Blackheads, blemishes and coarseness were found in Lois' skin analysis. But after several weeks of a prescribed diet, plus instructions on thorough skin cleansing, Lois' skin took on a natural glow enviable to any girl! A typical day's diet would include: BREAKFAST: Three oranges, pulp included; one glass warm water with juice of lemon. 11 A.M.: One glass skim milk. LUNCH: Orange-and-grapefruit salad with diet dressing; one piece unbuttered whole-wheat toast; one glass warm water with juice of lemon. 5 P.M.: Fresh fruit. DINNER: Half grapefruit; one small piece broiled meat or fish, all fat trimmed; one portion spinach; one slice unbuttered whole-wheat bread; lettuce-and-tomato salad with diet dressing; one glass skim milk. All diets were changed weekly in accordance with individual health requirements and after a physical checkup.

Good grooming is equally important in this blueprint for beauty. In these times, more than ever before, there are many "recognized beauties" who give the illusion of beauty where beauty, in terms of perfect features, does not exist. Good health, shining hair, subtle make-up, tasteful clothes and perfectionist attention to personal details all work together toward giving a girl that lovely, poised look and feeling of self-confidence that can translate itself into beauty for those who behold her.

Lois' typical adolescent complexion acquired a natural glow with proper treatment and constant care. Here she learns how to use a cleansing cream. All teen-agers are told to reserve knowledge of make-up application for future use or for very special dress-up occasions.

DON'T CALL THEM SILLY

By Louise Paine Benjamin

A SMALL girl in a party dress stood before a full-length mirror. She was ten years old and she looked as though she might have stepped out of a charming print. Out of a Kate Greenaway picture, in fact, for her dress was flower-sprigged and ankle-length, and its high waist was gathered in with a blue sash. The false note in this pretty picture was that the little girl was crying bitterly.

"But, mother," she sobbed, "I look so funny. Everybody will laugh at me. None of the boys will want to dance with me. Why can't I have a white lace dress like Nancy's with a short, flouncy skirt?"

Unfortunately, her mother was intent on having a picture-book child. By her standard her daughter looked enchanting and infinitely more original than the other little girls in their short white flounces. So, with a "Don't be silly, darling, you look marvelous," she insisted that her ten-year-old go to the party in her unique costume. Thereby not only thoroughly spoiling that particular party for her child, but also giving her a social scar that lasted for a very long time.

Even sadder and more serious than childish distress about clothes is the hurt that grows in young hearts when their possessors feel that there is something conspicuously wrong with them physically. Mirth-provoking ears, flat wispy hair, heavy teeth braces . . . these can be real tragedies to a little girl. And chubbiness! No budding debutante wants to be called "Fatty."

In this issue of the JOURNAL is the story of one such schoolgirl, Lois Sutton, whose parents were unusually understanding in working with her to banish the unwanted weight which was making her self-conscious.

A kindly woman psychiatrist who has interviewed many mothers about their children's difficulties says that in nearly all cases the treatment lies in the re-education of the parent rather than the child.

Unusual height: The girl child who grows so rapidly during adolescence that she outdistances her schoolmates feels unhappily conspicuous, especially in mixed gatherings, where she fears she has an intimidating effect on her boy contemporaries. Too often she cultivates a stoop, which has a devastating effect not only on her posture but on her personality. From the moment it is first apparent she is going to be a tall girl, she should be made to feel that she is lucky; that she is going to be one of the women who wear clothes with distinction. She will, in fact, be one of that fortunate group from whom the loveliest models and stage beauties are selected. Encourage her to stand tall and to think tall with a glow of pride. And never, never tease her about her height.

Bow legs: There are, fortunately, fewer of these all the time, thanks to all that has been learned about proper bone building through adequate nutrition. But if there is the slightest indication that your daughter is developing knees that refuse to touch—or to touch too closely—cart her to the best exercise authority you can locate, before she acquires an anti-bathing-suit complex. Training in posture, balance and special leg exercises will do wonders in the way of correction, especially when the bones are young and still growing.

Prominent ears: In extreme cases plastic surgery may be indicated, but rarely is the condition severe enough to warrant this. It is much better to educate your daughter early to the fact that every woman has at least one "bad point" which she learns to minimize. Make this a heart-to-heart talk in which you are fellow conspirators planning how to emphasize good points, as well as to play down less desirable ones. Explain that ears are one of the easiest features to take care of, since soft curls, loops of braids, perky bows or cute little buns of hair right on the ears themselves can be used for concealment. How much more difficult it would be if she had a hawk nose like Great-aunt Malvina's! Besides, lots of people believe big ears are a sign of a generous nature.

Lisping: Any speech defect seems peculiarly amusing to children—and sometimes, tragically enough, to adults also. This is doubly unfortunate; for, since it has now been established that speech impediments usually have their source in emotional disturbance, the difficulty is only aggravated by nonunderstanding friends and family. A child who lisps, stutters or otherwise deviates from normal speech should have prompt, expert attention. Crippled speech can be as cruel a disadvantage as a crippled limb. Often it can be completely cured, especially in childhood. If in doubt where to turn, write for information to the National Hospital for Speech Disorders, 61 Irving Place, New York, New York.

Nail biting: This is another condition which is a symptom of inner stress. Nagging or ridicule just adds to the strain. More loving and less scolding would be better, and a deliberate cultivation of vanity. A little girl who feels warmly loved and who is assured that she is pretty and is helped by her mother to become even more so is less likely to do damage to her appearance than a nervous child who feels that she is under a constant fire of criticism, even though that criticism is prompted by genuine, loving concern. As for the poor mistreated nails, they should have an elaborate daily manicure with the prettiest of pale polishes. A good-looking ring would be none too great a reward for fingers that showed steady improvement!

Eyeglasses, teeth braces: These mechanical aids to health and beauty are mixed blessings. They can serve their owners or victimize them, according to the time and the place. No one will dispute their all-over value, but when a little girl doesn't want to go to a party because some bright boy may call her "Four-Eyes," or is afraid to smile because she feels as though her mouth were filled with heavy artillery, the emotional danger is greater than the physical advantage. Doctors agree now that an occasional lapse into poor vision, or undefended teeth, on important social occasions does more good than harm. Just be sure you talk the situation over with your family oculist or dentist and have a clear understanding of how far these excursions into freedom should go.

Overweight: This subject has been covered so thoroughly in Lois Sutton's story, there is no need to repeat here—except perhaps to pass on to parents this illuminating thought, given by a psychiatrist. Most children overeat because they feel "lost." When a child is actually lost, what is the first thing a kindly rescuing policeman does to comfort him? Often he produces candy or ice cream. A child who feels uncertain or lonely inside instinctively does the same thing: reaches for sweet food.

In conclusion: Over and beyond the specific suggestions above, there are a few general rules for the banishment of children's anxieties. The best way to rid them of an exaggerated notion in one direction is to give them additional ideas and interests. It is particularly good if these interests have social advantages. A new skill—singing, dancing, skating, the ability to play a musical instrument, all help to make for popularity. Being able to make or do anything well gives confidence. Every human being needs to believe that he has one or more special gifts. Children who are so much at the mercy of the adult world are in particular need of this gratifying assurance, and from whom can they better receive it than their own parents?

The Gentleman Votes

Dear Editor: Your article, Would You Vote for a Woman President? by Judith Chase Churchill, is the most inspiring question anyone has ever asked Americans.

Because of man's failure in the past to plan adequately and properly for all human beings, conditions are absolutely frustrated, neglected and subject to change. The initial step for complete survival is to elect a woman President.

Cordially yours,
ROBLEY D. STEVENS.

Doctor Hohman Knows Best

Chicago, Illinois.

Dear Editors: May I tell you, please, why Doctor Hohman's visit meant so very much? Doctor Hohman has a knack of handling children that kids go for in a big way—as well as answers that make sense. To Doctor Hohman, I could say, "What does one do with a child that lies down on a floor and kicks when asked to play with a toy and he doesn't want to?" I received a sensible answer: "Into bed, you pest." Ha—no useless spanking, and results. It took just three days, after Doctor Hohman's visit, to make it clear to us that the little girl (Kathleen, aged 13 months) isn't off the beam at all—it stems from the boy (John, 2 years) whom Kathleen imitates. Again, Doctor Hohman's statement: "I wouldn't permit the boy to throw; Kathleen will pick that up very soon." She already had that habit, plus a few hundred other undesirable ones she'd copied. And I could ask, "Why does John, when shown how to operate a toy, pick up the pegs (or whatever it is) and throw them at a window?" The answer: "He wants to see what you'll do. You talk too much and do nothing." (The shoe fits!) Today Kathleen is a lovely child. Her eyes shine when she receives a word of approval, she frowns and says "No" when temptation to touch becomes awfully tempting, comes obediently when bedtime rolls around—and, best of all, gives us sudden little bursts of affection that are wonderful. She quit whining in short order; Doctor Hohman again—"Teach John to smile."

Johnnie is hard to handle—stubborn, strong-willed, restless. Doctor Hohman suggested long walks for him. The whole household benefited. I wish all puzzled mothers could have the golden opportunity I had in watching Doctor Hohman and how he handles children so effortlessly, regardless of type. Yours truly, MRS. E. P.

Too Little and Too Late

San Diego, California.

Dear Editors: I was amused at Anne Sanford Cotter's letter on "Have no more children than you can afford."

The ideal time to have children is in the earlier years of married life. Yet, at that time, few couples can prophesy what their income is going to be ten, fifteen, twenty years hence, when the expenses incurred by children are higher.

We started out with an income of less than $100 per month. I had two children, was convinced we couldn't afford more. Now, nearly eighteen years later, if I had it to do over again, I would have five or six. What the large family may miss in material possessions is more than compensated for by the tolerance, unselfishness, hospitality and plain fun that are evident in so many large families.

Sincerely yours,
EVELYN R. STEVESON.

Dear Sirs: My husband had been chronically ill for several years and our doctor had failed to find the cause of his illness. Through an article in the JOURNAL about undulant fever we found his ailment. His symptoms corresponded so closely to those discussed in that article that I requested a blood test to be taken. It proved to be positive. He responded to treatment and is much better now. Sincerely, Shelbyville, Tennessee.

My Dear Sir: I was happy to be taken back to "yester-year" with Ruth Cook's picture of LHJ of Oct., 1895, and Nov., 1946. We truly have seen the "old girl put on weight" and how we like it!

I was a "bobby-soxer" in 1888, and became shyly interested in my first love story. The hero was Max Gordon, and I resolved then, when I grew up and married, if I ever had a son I would name him after the "charming lover" in Spring Farm! And I did it!

(My son, Max, a veteran of World Wars I and II, is recuperating now in a veterans' hospital in U.S.A.)

I am, most sincerely,

Pittsburg, California.

Dear Editor: The letter from Mrs. Cotter on having only the children you can afford prompted me to write. At first I was mad and then I wanted to laugh. We were not going to have any more children after the first two; now we have five and we never planned to have them.

To be sure, we have not been able to accumulate any savings, but perhaps that happy day will also come. Until then I'm sure things will continue to work out for us as in the past. Sincerely yours,

Memories of Courage

Bridgeport, Connecticut

Gentlemen: Lowrie Flagg's magnificent article, Aftermath, brought tears to my eyes because it brought back memories. I, too, did duty in Army hospitals, as a Wac. Her story of the courage of the men who suffered was told straight-forwardly and without an overdose of pity. More articles like this for the American public should help them to remember the boys still "sweating it out."

Very truly yours,
OLGA L. KORNFIELD.

CHARM ROOM FOR GIRLS

By Henrietta Murdock

Interior Decoration Editor of the Journal

HERE is a room of your very own, as gay and glamorous as a movie star's. It is a room to dream in while you are growing up, with a place for serious study and lots of beguiling accessories to help you improve your looks.

In this one room are all the ideas we worked out for Lois Sutton, who wanted a brand-new background for her own personal-improvement program. The chances are you won't be able to use all the ideas, but pick out the ones you like and we will tell you exactly how to go about making the various articles for yourself.

First off, every single thing is a do-over—except, of course, the new accessory cupboards. And, since you will use furniture you already have or buy secondhand, some details will be different, which doesn't matter in the least. Lots of the work you can do yourself, and the rest can be done by a handy man and a plain-sewing helper. The fabric is your main expense—it takes 35 yards to do the whole works; but there are ways to do that cheaply, too, as you will see. Here are all the secrets to help you start planning right away.

You are out to cash in, at a high market value, the self-bought bonds of personal rating that you purchase whenever you can by devious methods. You have more desire for a place in the sun than the average per-son. But see if your quick-on-the-trig-ger mind can't devise some less bump-tious rungs on your ladder to fame whose values will prove more enduring.

A HOUSEWIFE LOOKS AT SOAP OPERA

feeding the baby, washing the dishes, tidying up the kitchen, and then ho for the mending basket till ten o'clock, when the baby gets his final feeding of the day and we crawl into bed beside our husband, who is sleeping the imperturbable sleep of one who has spent eight grueling hours at a desk.

This lengthy and tedious description of a housewife's day I relay in all its depressing detail to emphasize the fact that every twenty-four hours (and I mean every twenty-four hours; Sundays and holidays are worse; Christmas and New Year's unrelieved nightmares) the housewife has, for fourteen hours, work on her hands and nothing on her mind.

The solution, obviously, is to get something on her mind. The question is, what?

There are two types of roughly every human being, even housewives, and these are, among other classifications, the so-called intellectual—those who had one or more years of college and read War and Peace during the invasion of Russia—and the non-intellectual, or those who did not. Another, and perhaps fairer, way of making this classification would be to say that some people, when they are alone, must have a book in their hands; others require a piece of needlework. Omnium humanum in duo partes divisum est: readers and potterers.

For our purposes, we shall make the terms "intellectuals" and "readers" interchangeable, because, though not in all, in the majority of cases they are. The intellectuals, then—or readers—are, I regret to say, those who, in spite of a widely prevailing fiction to the contrary, are least able to fall back on the resources of their own minds. They not only crave, they require outside stimuli. The non-intellectuals, or potterers, are those who have no such requirements, who are able to ruminate gently, peacefully and in silence for hours at a time.

I refer you on this point to any of several hundred articles on Mr. and Mrs. America, with their pleasant evening picture of mother knitting by the lamp in the living room, and father pottering in his tool shop in the basement. Father and mother can work with their hands so happily because they are perfectly contented to be alone, intellectually speaking, with their minds. Mr. and Mrs. College Graduate, though their mental resources are supposed to be infinitely greater, will be, if alone, reading; otherwise, talking or playing bridge—anything but alone with their minds. Mr. and Mrs. Potterer, cast on a desert island, would equal the output of Robinson Crusoe and the Swiss Family Robinson at their collective best; Mr. and Mrs. Reader would die of ennui within a period of weeks.

Now if one grants all this—and I think one really must—one must grant that the housewife of intellectual habits is in dire need of entertainment during her working day. Conversation is a dead loss. The fresh-vegetable man and the remover of the garbage pail can be detained only so long, your baby and their invalid wives being subjects of infinite exhaustibility. Little chats with the children, who if they are in the house at all are presumably under school age, are trying at their best.

"Mummy, is the moon rilly made of green cheese?"

"No, dear, of course not."

"What is it made of then, mummy?"

"Why—er—of some sort of rock, dear."

"Of a big rock, mummy?"

"Yes, dear."

"Of a big, big rock, mummy?"

"Yes, dear."

"Oh, a big, big, BIG rock, mummy?"

"Yes, dear."

"Of a ——"

And so on.

Anybody who has tried the combination of reading and housework can catalogue the pages of her book according to various domestic accidents. Page 42: finger cut while peeling peaches. Page 99: hole burned in shirt while ironing. Page 213: dish dropped while wiping. The lower right-hand corner of every page in every book in her library is also marked with sudsy water, dust or beer juice.

As a rule, our little personal tricks, even when apparent, are not seen often enough by our acquaintances to cause them much annoyance; but to those with whom we live they produce at least an irritation nearly akin to dislike. "Have you seen my wife anywhere?" says a husband to a friend. "I have not the pleasure of knowing her even by sight," is the reply. "Well," rejoins the husband, "if you should happen to see a pretty woman biting her nails, please tell her that I am waiting for her." Now, if the friend finds her, he thinks only of her pretty face, and forgets her fingernails; but her husband, who lives with her and her tricks, thinks and despairs about her fingernails, and forgets her pretty face. Yet he loves her dearly.

—THOMAS LONGUEVILLE: Vices in Virtues and Other Vagaries. (Longmans, Green & Co.)

Our entertainment, then, is obviously limited to the radio, on which, ideally, we are able to make the choice of four types of program: soap opera—to which we are too intellectual to listen; news; "hints" programs—fashion, cookery, gardening, and so forth; and music, "good" and otherwise.

The news and the hints programs are quickly disposed of. The first are not numerous enough or long enough to engage one's attention for over a few minutes at a time—and, of course, they are necessarily self-limiting. News commentators—who, like quiz programs, are wrong enough of the time to give you a pleasant feeling of superiority—save their efforts for the evening hours, when the brains of the family come home. The hints programs face much the same list of objections except that extreme limitedness of appeal and a certain adenoidal quality in their conductors must be added. Gardening hints are useful only to those who (1) are interested in gardening, (2) have time to garden and (3) have a garden. Cooking hints are utterly without value if you cannot write down the recipes—which, of course, you cannot at the time of day at which cooking hints are offered. Fashion hints are the worst. They bring on dark broodings as to the probable effect of spattering pork chops on that old black velvet remade into a "sweet little house dress" and thus only add to our sad fate.

Music, "good" and otherwise—or perhaps I should say "music" and music—is certainly of wide appeal. But popular songs, which are the most readily available on the radio, consist, over a fourteen-hour stretch, of perhaps thirty songs played five times each and five songs played thirty times each. Let us admit without further discussion that along strictly hedonistic principles that kind of radio listening does not pay. But "good" classical music is another matter. Such listening improves the mind, soothes the nerves and, needless to say, adds to one's knowledge of music. There is only one trouble: over a fourteen-hour period, one can hear classical music, certainly; one can not listen to it.

I submit in all humility that in musical knowledge I am probably the most completely average woman in the world. I mean by this that my record is 100 per cent success in telling the Bolero from Brahms' Lullaby; 100 per cent failure in distinguishing between late Bach and early Mozart. On the basis of this combined boast and confession I claim that no person of average musical knowlege can concentrate his whole mind dp Elgin's DuraPower Mainspring*!

UNITED STATES RUBBER COMPANY

The most important watchmaking development in over 200 years...!

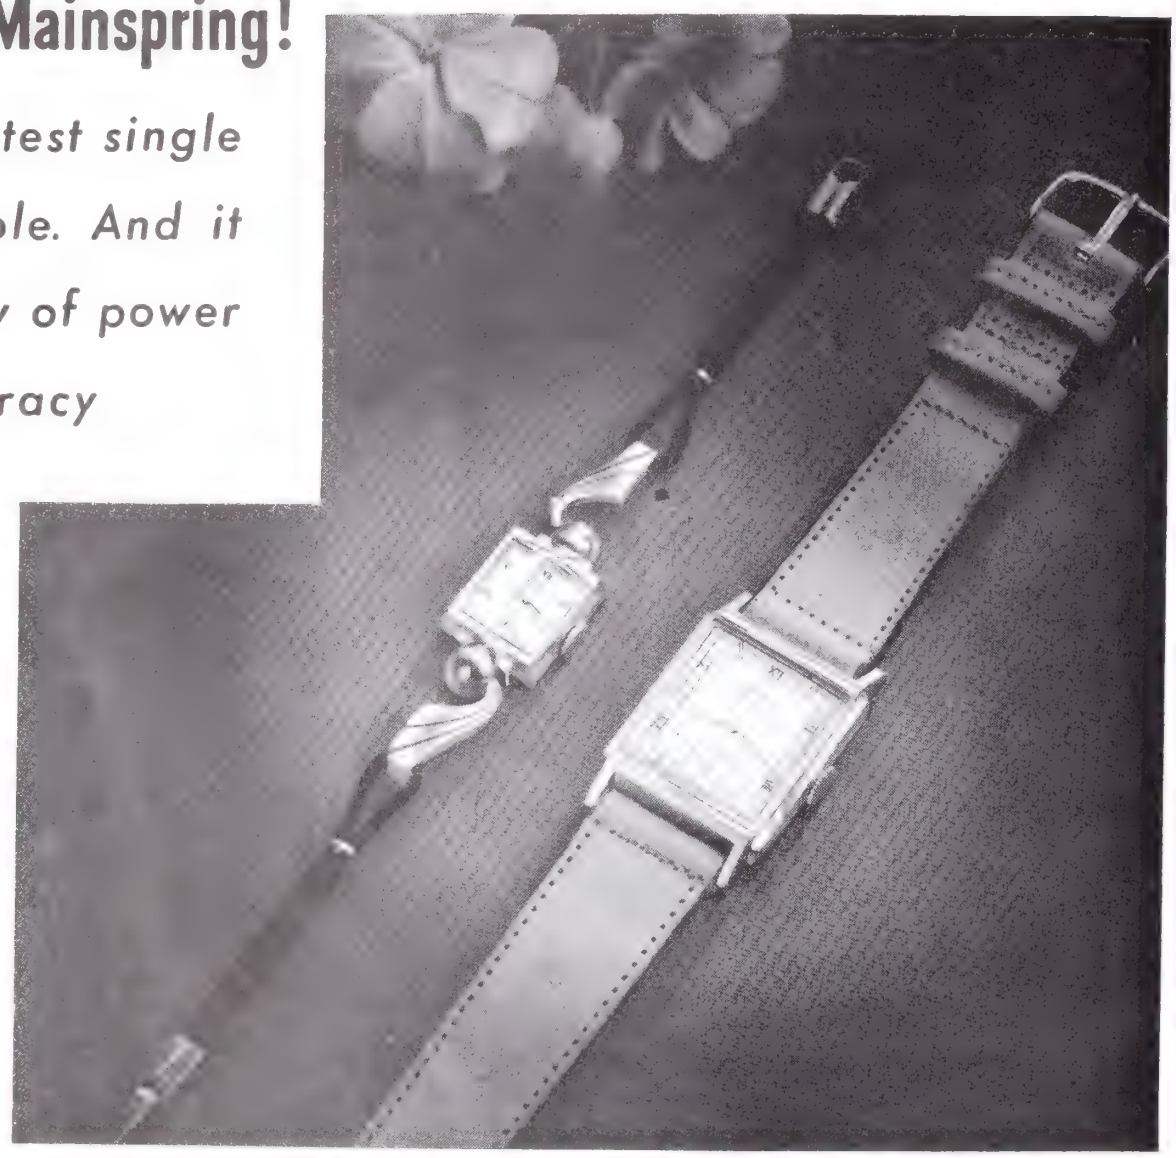
It eliminates the greatest single cause of watch trouble. And it delivers a steady flow of power for greater accuracy

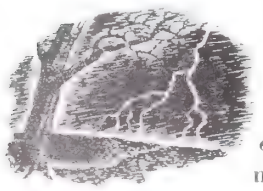


This Lady Elgin and men's Elgin De Luxe illustrate the beauty of Elgin Watches now arriving at jewelers'. Elgins, with Federal Tax included, are priced from $29.75

When watches stop and can't be wound; when they suddenly start losing or gaining a lot of time, repairmen look first at the mainspring. Over half of all watch movement repairs are due to mainspring failure.

For, until now, the finest mainsprings have been made of carbon steel. They frequently lose up to 20% of their strength . . . watch-running power.

Rust, resulting from moisture formed in the case during humid weather or sudden changes in temperature, weakens or breaks them. Even the transfer of a watch from a warm wrist to a cold surface . . . as when it's placed on a dresser top at night . . . can cause rust that snaps a delicate steel mainspring.



Weather can't hurt this new spring!

DISCOVERED . . . A NEW ALLOY

Elgin's amazing new DuraPower Mainspring eliminates these causes of mainspring failure. It is made from "Elgiloy", a wholly new alloy of metals developed by Elgin after 12 years of intensive research.

A DuraPower Mainspring won't rust. Is non-magnetic. And it is so tough that it cannot be broken by overwinding. It will hold its original "springiness" indefinitely . . . give a steady flow of power for better accuracy day by day and through the years!

Even this can break steel mainsprings

PERFORMANCE . . . AS IN NO OTHER WATCH

Not since jewel bearings were introduced in 1704 has there been such an important watchmaking development. Now, to Elgin's famous star-timed accuracy, these DuraPower Mainsprings add a permanency of timekeeping performance and freedom from trouble never before possible in any watch.

All the beautiful new Elgins at your dealer's have DuraPower Mainsprings . . . and the mark dp, small but very important, on their dials.

sic for any length of time exceeding an ir or two at most. Any musical amateur o maintains seriously that he can listen to entire symphony concert or opera with- experiencing slight wanderings of the eye I mind I should hesitate to trust with my er. Music simply does not and cannot d our attention for long enough periods to nt as entertainment for our fourteen- ir day, and we must therefore, along with se other offerings of radio which we have cussed, disqualify it for our purposes.

What happens now to the housewife's mind she washes the dishes, listening to news, ts and music? Horror of horrors, it is e more cast back upon its own resources! My resources, during those hours of the omatic and unvarying labor of the woman o does not "work," consisted of much self- y and much bitter cogitation on the sad of woman. My conclusions I related in relenting detail every evening to my ient and sympathetic husband, who was y very occasionally driven to point out t my only alternative was to leave the oy on a handy doorstep and scrape the quaintance of a althy gentleman h a view to even- l elopement.

But one day my sband came home find a pleasant wife, sunshine and sweet- s and gratitude for happy lot. I had de the choice be- een snobbery and ity. I had discov- d soap opera!

More learned ar- es have probably en written about the olution of the story m about the atomic mb, and quite htly, for the story ms an incredibly ge part of our daily es. All conversation, l all writing, is in ry form or illus- ted by stories. The atter at dinner be- een Mummy, ddy and Junior ually takes the form "Wait till I tell you at I heard about ary Parker. . . ."

"A man who came o the office today d had an interesting perience. . . ."

"The funniest thing happened in arith- tic today. . . ."

One of the most frequent demands of the red child is "Mummy, tell me a story." nat is more natural, then, than for the red woman to make the same demand of radio? And radio, with all the resources its power, answers, "Yes, dear."

F radio stories, commonly called soap era, there is an infinite variety; and what far more important, there are infinite mbers. Every fifteen minutes, from ten in e morning till six at night, there is another d more engrossing tale on the air. For elve of every fifteen minutes we can suffer th Mary Noble, sympathize with Joyce rdan, hate Carson McVickers with a cold d deadly hatred. Only during the com- rcials—or for approximately three min- es of every quarter hour—can we brood out our unhappy fate. For soap operas, natever their effect on the more critical sulties of our minds, do engross us. They do tertain us. They do keep our minds un- verингly fixed on whatever program our dio is turned to, and we enjoy them in the me open, wholesome and uncritical way at we enjoy a Perry Mason mystery, a Bob pe movie or Terry and the Pirates.

This quality, after all, is our only criterion. l we want from radio is continuous entertainment, something to fill our minds for fourteen hours a day. And the combination of our mental requirements and our mental limitations makes this not alone the best, but the only, kind of program adequately to fill the bill.

If a fully trained staff—nurse, cook and housemaid—were to turn up on my doorstep tomorrow morning with words to the effect that their dearest wish was to work for me, free, 11:30 A.M. might find me reading or playing golf. As it is, no power on earth, at 11:30 A.M., will keep me from discovering what Anna did after Barry threw away his chance for promotion in a fit of pique because she was late for dinner. Under different circumstances, 1:30 P.M. might find me finishing a leisurely lunch with a friend. As things are, I can hardly wait to see if Lord Henry will be influenced by the caddish insinuations everybody seems to be making about his wife Sunday's character.

The upper intellectual brackets of housewifery, or the "readers," need, as we have seen, not less but more outside entertainment than those of lesser scholastic pretensions. It is, therefore, unfortunate that the soap opera is directed more to the latter, the "potterers," than to the "readers," for the readers need it far, far more. The solution to this, however, is not less soap opera, but better. I could wish, for instance, that our stories were not quite so much centered upon the home, of which we have what we ladies call "a tummy full." Portia is a lawyer, Joyce is a doctor, Mary Noble is at least a "backstage" wife, yet rarely do we learn anything of the legal, medical and dramatic sides of their lives. I should like, also, to hear more complete stories during the daytime hours, but I realize that this would put on radio writers a burden more than the human mind could bear. The writer who was forced in sheer desperation to keep his characters in an elevator for an entire week, engaged in chitchat, while he caught up with his story has my deepest sympathy. But our homey serials, after all, are only a little more monotonous than Northanger Abbey, only a little more complicated than Of Time and the River, only a little more silly than the collected silliness of a year's subscription to the New Yorker. And what woman would not trade a reading of these three works for the equivalent number of hours of mental emptiness?

Three things I find indefensible in radio; three things which, if remedied, would not detract in any way from its entertainment value. I cannot feel that it is necessary for radio children to say "ain't" in order to be childlike, or for young men to speak in Brooklyn or in South Chicago accents in order to prove their virility, or for old people to sprinkle home truths quite so freely in their conversation. To be told, as I was by Ma Perkins this afternoon, that "the more glamorous the people, the less stable" may be balm to my housebound soul, but it is totally untrue.

Annoying as these small mannerisms are; degrading as it is to find our main source of entertainment in a medium despised by our betters, all this is as a pinprick compared with the glorious feeling of emerging with a sigh from The Road of Life to find that, once again, the dishes are done. THE END

Spring Is No Stranger

By Catherine Haydon Jacobs

Spring is no stranger to the quiet heart;
Only the restless fear the morning light,
Or the glad mystery of another day.
They who are warmed by cold and sullen night,
Who, fed by lack, are borne upon the wind,
Stand motionless before the moving ground.
For them there is no longer any song;
Their arms and souls are pinioned by the sound
Of beating rhythms at life's little start;
Spring is no stranger to the quiet heart.

How to Become a Farmer in One Easy Lesson

By Esther Valck Georgns

THERE are two ways to become a farmer. One is easy and the other is interesting. To do it the easy way, you have to have money. If you have ıoney, you can buy a farm and hire a ıanager. That makes you a farmer of sorts. sort of synthetic farmer. If you haven't ny money—or at least not much—you'll ave to do it the interesting way. In either ase, you first get a farm.

Now that I stop to think about it, the ıteresting way is easy too. Just to prove ow easy it is, I'll tell you how I did it. I ıved some money, and when I had enough bought the farm. Maybe you'll be luckier. omeone might die and leave you enough ıoney. After you get the money, the next ıing you'll have to do is to become sudenly deaf to your friends' and relatives' emonstrances.

They'll say, "You're crazy as a coot!" hey'll say, "You're bats!" They'll say, You're mad as a hatter!" Especially if ou're a female and intend to live on the ırm all alone. They'll spend their entire ıare time thinking up dire catastrophes ıat will surely happen to you. They'll lie wake nights in order to hatch variations to ıe terrible happenings. However, you are s deaf as a post, so you pay no attention ɔ them. You go right ahead and buy a ırm regardless.

While your friends have been shouting ire prophecies you have been making up our mind what kind of farm you want. And here you want it. In my case it was espeially easy. All I wanted was some land on hich there was an old house, a wood lot, unning water near the door, a sycamore ree in the yard, and electricity. I wanted : in the Catskills, because that's where my eople had originally settled generations go.

I got in touch with a real-estate man in hat general locality. He said, "I'll take ou to the nearest one first."

We drove through several little mounain villages, then turned off the main oad onto a good dirt road. After about wo miles, we passed a mill and a run-down armhouse, and then a little farther on he topped in front of an old brown salt box.

"Now this here place," he said, "is inety acres. It's mostly timber now, but here's been some cleared land once." He ent on talking while I looked.

The house was old—a perfect salt box—uilt into the side of the hill, as other and iser generations had the sense to build. There were, according to the realtor, ninety cres of wood lot. There was a noisy mounain stream less than fifty feet from the itchen door, two sycamores in the yard.

I said, "I'll take it!"

The real-estate man sat down on the unning board of his car. He gulped two or hree times. "It's an awful old house," he aid finally. "Well over a hundred."

"I can believe that," I told him.

"The barn needs roofing," he pointed ut.

"Well," I said, "there are two sycamores."

He thought that over. Then, "There's ıo electricity," he said flatly.

"Running water right outside the door," said gaily.

He said, "People always look at more han one place."

He was disturbed and uneasy, all right, ut I finally managed to make him take a leposit on the place. He looked at the money suspiciously, but he took it. So then I had a farm.

Well, after you get the farm you move onto it. That's all there is to it. Once you move onto it, you'll be a farmer before you know it. It may not be painless, but it's inevitable.

Take my case. I had absolutely no intentions of becoming a farmer. All I intended to do was live on a farm and write. That shows how inevitable it is. And unless you're especially keen, you hardly notice it while it's happening.

When I came to the farm I had a bull terrier for protection (there's never been anything to protect me from) and a cat because I'd had her for years and years and she goes wherever I go. Well, sir, as they say up here, it was hardly no time at all before eggs became a problem. You'd think, living in the country, eggs would be easy come by. And cheap. On the contrary, they might have been hen teeth instead of hen fruit, they were that scarce and, when found, worth, it turned out, their weight in gold.

A person doesn't have to be a Solomon to solve that problem. I got some baby chicks. I bought fifty. The man took a long look at my lipstick and nail polish and, "I guess I better throw in some," he opined. "Give you some to kill off." So he threw in seventeen.

Baby chicks necessitated a brooder, of course. I'm scared of anything mechanical. In fact, I consider anything more complicated mechanically than a can opener as diabolic; but once you get started farming, you don't have time to be scared. I had ordered the brooder by mail, and when it came it was in a couple dozen pieces. There was no time to sit and think. The chicks were yelling. So I spread out the diagram, thoughtfully provided by the mail-order house, put the pieces together as best I could, poured kerosene into the tank, applied a match where indicated, and popped the babies under the hood. I set the alarm for every two hours because I had no doubt the thing would explode, and went to bed.

Nothing happened. I raised sixty-six out of the sixty-seven chicks. The cat ate one.

The cat also had a kitten. His name is Mike. So now I had a dog, two cats and sixty-six chickens.

ABOUT then someone remarked that corn was going to be scarce. There was about half an acre of nice, fertile ground near the house, and if corn was going to be scarce it seemed like good sense to raise some. So I had the half acre plowed. I planted some corn. And as long as I was at it I felt I might as well put in a few other things too. So I bought a bag of seed potatoes, and fifteen or twenty packages of vegetable seed, hitched up my britches, and planted them too. (The seeds—not the britches.)

I stopped to get my breath from the planting and discovered the milkman had departed for regions where the milk ceiling was more to his advantage. Most of the farmers around had cows, but everybody knows what happens to you if you drink unpasteurized milk from a strange cow.

I'm not really afraid of any living creature except a cow. Under those circumstances, I thought it best to get a goat. The goat I wanted had just had a baby. Well, you can't break up a family like that, so I bought them both. Mamma has proved her gratitude by giving me nearly four quarts of milk a day.

You can see how one thing leads inevitably to another.

Living in the country will lead to company too. One of my guests, wandering around Macy's prior to his week end at the farm, saw the baby ducks. Unable to resist them, he bought ten and brought them up to me.

At about the same time a perfect stranger brought me a hound dog. He simply brought her one dark night and left her and when I got up next morning there she was, starved and gaunt-looking, waiting for breakfast. I fed her and a short time later she had a puppy. His name is Butch.

You're not a real farmer until you've harvested. Until you've harvested you'll never know whether your back will really stand the strain or not. I had to say sharp words to mine now and then, but I finally got the stuff in.

I dug half a ton of potatoes off my half acre, bushels and bushels of beets and carrots (for the goats, you know). I had fifteen bushels of field corn and fifty heads of cabbage. I had over two hundred jars of stuff and things in the cellar. I had herbs dried and hanging from the rafters. I had fresh vegetables all summer for myself and guests. I gave away bushels of spinach and other things. It gave me mild indigestion to go in the cellar and look at the food I was going to have to eat up during the winter!

I HAD, by that time, a hired man. He was fourteen years old, very sweet and not too bright. He came after school to help me with the chores. He was with me six weeks, as much at sea the last day as he had been the first, and not quite so willing. I was finally rescued by a merciful providence. His family moved away!

Then Dink came into my life. It happened this way. A neighbor—an old bachelor who lives alone on the next farm—said, one day, "Now if yer goin'ta farm like this yer oughtta have a hoss."

That seemed like a reasonable idea. "I guess I had," I admitted.

A day or two later he said, "Say, a feller up the road a piece's got a hoss yer might git if ye want him."

So I went to look at the hoss. He was brown with a white blaze and a watch eye. He laid his ears back, which struck me as sinister, but the farmer assured me he was kind and gentle.

"Not a mean hair on him," he went on. "And a good worker too. To look at him you wouldn't think he could pull himself straight; but by gum, he can work right along with the big fellers."

He wanted only fifty dollars for him, so I bought him. He is kind and he is gentle. I know what the ears mean now, though. He's stubborn as a jack mule.

I also know why my neighbor thought I needed a horse. Because he had a buggy he wanted to sell. So now I have a horse and a buggy. Unto these a sleigh has been lately added. I mostly ride Dink horseback. It's less trouble than all that harness.

And that's how you become what is known as a one-horse farmer. See how easy it is? Just as I said at the beginning, first get your farm. The rest will be inevitable. You'll be a farmer before you know it.

I doubt very much if you'll ever be a writer, though. THE END

MIXTURES

REPORT To the Housewife

BY JUDY BARRY

NOW that April's here, I'm sure that the first crocus isn't a bit more anxious to poke its head out into the sunshine and soft fresh air than we housewives are. These are the days when we want to be off to look for pussy willows, or window-shop for a flowered hat. And so, this month we've made a special effort to find some new work-saving quicker-uppers that will help speed you out of the house and into the woods or the avenue.

ARCTIC PLAT DU JOUR

The ultimate in ready-to-use food is the frozen precooked dinner-on-a-plate. The entire main course (meat, poultry or fish with potato in some form and a vegetable) is frozen on a special plastic grill plate, which pops right into the oven, and upon which you may, if you like, serve the dinner, so that even dishes are dispensed with. Servings are average restaurant size (not mother's-cooking size).

These have been used for some time on planes, cooked by the stewardess in a special high-speed oven. Now they are being sold for home consumption, each dinner in a neat flat box, with the food prepared in such a manner that 25 minutes in a 400° oven will make it ready for the table, piping hot. They need not be defrosted before placing in the oven.

We have sampled several of the plate combinations in the Workshop: felt that the food was of good quality and palatable, if not exactly a gourmet's delight.

So far, only a few large stores in large cities have these frozen dinners, but they'll undoubtedly be making further appearances soon. Business-girl-housewives will find them interesting.

SHINE, LADY?

You needn't get down on your knees to keep your floors glowing. A new tall-handled waxer, which you use while standing up straight, spreads wax over floors quickly and easily. You pour a pint of wax into the hollow aluminum handle, press a little dasher (as you do to fill some fountain pens) to control the flow, and whisk the lamb's-wool applicator on its shining way. The applicator is wedge-shaped, to fit up into corners and tricky spots effectively, and removable for easy washing.

Why should any modern housewife get cricks in her back and knees scrubbing, ruin her hands and nails wringing floor cloths or mops, when several varieties of new synthetic rubber mops, which lift up dirt and dust by suction, will wring themselves at the touch of a finger tip to a button? They look tidy, do a good job of mopping up speedily, and help so much to keep hands pretty. There are also several good self-wringing cloth mops.

APRIL SHOWERS

Alas, showers not only bring May flowers, but make dirty streaks on your windows. Try a new creamy liquid to clean and polish windows and mirrors quickly. It's the result of wartime developments in special cleaners for the glass and plastic on planes. We've found it quick and effective at dealing with the sooty film on mirrors and windows: and, even more welcome, found it good for our enamel refrigerator and range, which we like to keep shining and smooth as white satin.

FOILED

At least once a day lately, we've wondered how we managed to get along before we had a roll of aluminum foil in our kitchen. Have you used it? It does a thoroughly good job of protecting whatever you assign to its care in the refrigerator—last night's gardenia, a few pats of butter, the ham end you're saving for jambalaya. It's easy to tear off a piece of exactly the right size and shape to cover each of these assorted oddments, and it molds to fit snugly. This no-waste factor helps to compensate for the fact that it is undoubtedly more expensive to begin with than other protective wrappings, such as wax paper. However, it may be washed off and reused.

To us, its most endearing quality is the amount of hard scouring it can save. Once you've lined your broiler pan with foil when you're cooking lamb chops, once you've just rolled up the foil, where the grease has collected, and realized that the pan beneath remains almost spotless, you, too, will be a foil fan. We use it, also, for lining the casserole when we do scalloped potatoes and such; for lining the saucepan when we melt chocolate; for lining our precious silver bowl before we place a flower holder in it; to make neat little moisture-catching "saucers" beneath flowerpots.

LAUNDRY SAVERS

Sturdy paper aprons, made of the same vegetable parchment as the dishcloths we told you about in February, may be tossed into the wastebasket when their day is done. Their life span would depend, of course, on your luck with splashing grease and spilled gravy. Not so shapely as a Schiaparelli, but with plenty of coverage and usefulness. Especially good for male cooks, who are apt to be hard on your ruffled pinafores when they borrow them.

SMALL-SCALE WASHDAY

A businesswoman, or anyone who lives in a small apartment, should find a new junior-size washing machine which not only washes and rinses but damp-dries as well, a wonderful timesaver. (To say nothing of a handsaver.) A mother might find it very useful as a supplement to her big washing machine, to keep those daily half dozens from piling up. In one load, it will deal with about 3 slips, 3 panties, a nightdress and a few pairs of stockings; or 5 or 6 little-girl dresses. It's designed to be tucked away into a cupboard when not in use; a rounded porcelain enamel unit, 18″ high, 16″ wide, weighing 33 pounds. However, it needs a pair of strong arms to lift it up to sufficient height so that it can drain. It also needs a good husky table or cabinet to stand on when in use, since the process of damp-drying, one of its best features, makes it "walk" and shiver a bit.

A whole army of useful little gadgets, to help you peel and slice and shell and scrape speedily, has invaded the shops recently. Most of them aren't really new, but it's news to have them back again, and a trip through the housewares departments of large stores—or the dime stores—is again fascinating. One of the more expensive, carefully constructed ones is designed to be attached to a table edge; it shells peas like a whiz. We did a pound in six minutes. With another of its attachments, it turns out carrots, celery, apples, green peppers or potatoes in neat uniform strips, perfect for partified garnishes or shoestring potatoes. Then there's a little metal gadget, to be inserted into one end of a lemon. A small twist and you may extract whatever amount of juice is desired, pouring from the lemon itself as if it were a pitcher.

Shiny aluminum may be prettier to look at, but you'll do well to choose the dull-finished kind for pie tins, cooky sheets and baking tins; pies, cakes and cookies will brown much better. Shine deflects the radiant heat.

AS GOOD AS THEY LOOK

Plastic fabrics, all the way from filmy translucent ones, such as are used in shower curtains, to the handsome husky ones that look like leather, certainly aren't news to you or to us by now. But we became enthusiastic about plastic-coated fabrics all over again recently when we saw a group of decorator fabrics in really beautiful vivid prints, clear stripes and unusual colorings, and found that they were protected by an invisible plastic coating, which didn't change their pleasant textures or colors a bit, but did cause them to be extremely well behaved. They were waterproof, stainproof, soil could be wiped off them with a damp cloth, and yet they had no odor or shininess; nothing other than their complete practicality to indicate that they had been plasticized. Imagine having the pale yellow slip covers you've always wanted and being able to keep them pale yellow, even in New York or Pittsburgh, rather than having them take on the hue of an aged pumpkin in a week! These fabrics may be bought by the yard, in upholstered furniture, or in custom-made slip covers.

. . . And this is the key that opens up the sun-ripe perfection of fruits months after their harvesting and miles from their source.

To lock summer freshness in each airtight container America's canners rely on sugar—a basic food of nature. So, too, do the nation's housewives. For they know that sugar preserves the natural color, shape and texture of fruit—brings it to the table flavor-fresh and with a maximum of natural vitamins preserved.

In canning, baking, meat-curing, and many other food industries sugar is a standard ingredient. But sugar has hundreds of other uses—many not yet fully explored.

To learn more about this versatile food, the Sugar Research Foundation has instituted a broad program of research at dozens of universities and colleges, hospitals and clinics in the United States and Canada.

Its purpose: greater knowledge, better health, better living.

There's nothing so really startling about this meal—or complicated. It just happens to have been cooked four weeks before serving and the hostess wasn't worn out at the feast. We stuffed a leg of lamb with ground pork, veal and ham; basted it with a neat and gaudy spice sauce; we scalded the vegetables and wrapped them in moisture-vaporproof Cellophane; the freezer did the rest. Even the gravy and rolls were frozen.

CONVERSATION PIECE

By Ruth Mills Teague

"DON'T work too hard on the day of your dinner party—do the day before anything that can be done then," and so on; you've heard it before. Here's the prize way: cook the entire meal weeks or even months ahead of time and do just about nothing on the day of your party. Does it sound crazy? There's no trick to it if you have a home-freezing unit or a locker plant handy.

Obviously this food needn't be prepared far ahead of time and frozen. The point is, it can be. One more obvious point and we're off to recipes: this food will taste the same whether it's been frozen two weeks or two months, so you needn't crowd too much work into one day. I'll pass on to you one prize meal I've put to the test of freezing entire, and served after its sojourn in the locker with every delicate flavor and texture intact. Here's our menu:

Canapés
Tomato Bisque
Stuffed Leg of Lamb Creole
Homemade Rolls Vegetable Platter
Individual Strawberry Pies
Coffee

Mrs. Teague with a helper can freeze away a couple of dinners for the future by making, baking and wrapping fixings for many a meal.

do, and what a comfort it is to have the hors d'oeuvre problem solved for some future dinner or a high tea that can be whipped up when the unexpected guests arrive.

Lobster Ribbon Sandwiches: Chop frozen or canned lobster meat very fine, add 2 or 3 chopped hard-cooked eggs, several tablespoons mayonnaise, and season with grated onion, salt and pepper. Mash yolks of 4 hard-cooked eggs through a sieve and work to a paste with 1 small package cream cheese and 1 teaspoon anchovy paste. Season with 2 tablespoons lemon juice, 1 teaspoon Worcestershire sauce, ¼ teaspoon dry mustard and a little sugar. Taste for seasoning. If the egg mixture is not salty enough, add more anchovy paste.

Slice bread very thin, place in stacks of four slices each and remove crusts. Make the slices square, but don't waste the crusts. Dry them in the oven, grind into crumbs, pack in containers and store in freezer. Make four-decker sandwiches, top and bottom layers lobster and center layer egg. Wrap each sandwich in Cellophane, aluminum foil or Pliofilm, and seal air-tight. Store sandwiches in the freezer as soon as wrapped.

Toasted Liver Rolls: Brown several chicken livers in butter or margarine until barely done. Chop fine, add to ½ pound good liverwurst and mix until smooth. Season with 2 tablespoons catchup, 2 tablespoons Worcestershire sauce, 1 teaspoon prepared mustard, 1 teaspoon dried sweet basil and salt to taste.

Remove crusts from a loaf of bread and cut, the long way, into slices about ⅛ inch thick. Spread generously with liver mixture and roll tightly, starting from narrow end. Wrap each roll in cellophane and tie the ends. They'll look like papercrackers, the kind we have for children's parties. Store in freezer.

The day of the party, transfer canapés to refrigerator to thaw. Just before serving, cut each liver roll into four slices, place on cooky sheet and toast under broiler. Serve hot. Cut each lobster square into four small squares, then cut across each of these diagonally to make tiny triangles. Serve cold.

TOMATO BISQUE

To 8 cups canned tomatoes add ½ teaspoon crushed red pepper, 4 bay leaves, 6 whole cloves, 1 teaspoon saffron, ¼ teaspoon whole black pepper, 1 large onion, chopped, 1 clove garlic, minced, and 1 tablespoon sugar. Cook uncovered for 10 minutes, cover, cook 20 minutes more and strain through fine sieve.

Make a cream sauce of 3 tablespoons butter or margarine, 3 tablespoons flour and 3 cups milk and cream mixed. Undiluted evaporated milk may be substituted for cream. Work 3 envelopes beef bouillon powder to a paste with a little milk and add to sauce. Or use meat paste or bouillon cubes to taste.

Be sure that both the tomato mixture and sauce are hot when they are mixed. Add a good pinch of soda to the tomatoes and pour it into the sauce, stirring constantly. Add salt if needed, but with caution. The bouillon powder is quite salty and the tomatoes will have been canned with salt.

When cold, pour into cellophane-lined locker containers, the round kind, seal the lining with curling iron or the crimping iron made for this purpose and store in freezer. Or, if you have a home freezer, pour into quart glass jars, leaving ¼ of the jar empty for expansion, screw on lids and put in freezer. There's great danger of breakage if glass is used, so I'm told, and I shouldn advise it if jars are to be stored at a lock plant instead of at home. But I've bee freezing soup in glass jars lo, these man years and never an accident—and it is nice t be able to see what's in the jars.

While we're on the subject of freezin soup, I just can't stop with tomato bisqu delicious as it is. Right now my freezer hold three jars of lentil soup, made with a fin ham bone that might have gone to waste After all, when you've eaten straight throug a big ham you aren't at the moment in th mood for ham-flavored soups. But nex week—next month—it's another matter Then I have two jars of chicken-mushroom soup, made when there was more chicker broth on hand than needed. And there are always one or two jars of beef stock in my freezer.

Enough—but I do think it's a good idea to make extra soups when you have time and the right ingredients, for a meal that begins with a delectable homemade soup is off to a very fine start.

STUFFED LEG OF LAMB CREOLE

Have the butcher bone and skin a large leg of lamb, but ask him to leave on the last few inches of shank bone. Have ½ pound smoked ham, ¼ pound veal and ¼ pound fresh pork ground together two or three times. This will make forcemeat with which the lamb will be stuffed. (Not horse meat, as my horrified butcher thought I said. The last of that I will never hear.) Better tell your butcher what you're up to, so that in boning the lamb he will leave big flaps for sewing up the ends.

Work the ground meat with your hands to make it very smooth, add ⅛ teaspoon cayenne pepper, ½ teaspoon marjoram, ⅛ teaspoon nutmeg, a little salt, 4 tablespoons fine bread crumbs, 1 whole raw egg and 1 raw egg yolk, 2 cloves garlic, very finely minced, and 4 tablespoons top milk or cream. Work until thoroughly blended. Chop ½ pound fresh mushrooms fine and sauté a few minutes in plenty of butter or margarine. Add mushrooms to meat and again blend.

Now you're ready to stuff in the forcemeat, but first put your hand inside the leg of lamb and stretch outward to make the cavity as large as possible. Put in as much forcemeat as the cavity will hold and sew neatly with twine.

Cover the bottom of a roasting pan with several strips of bacon and put it in a 300° F. oven while you make the following sauce:

Into a stewing pan put ¾ small can concentrated tomato paste, ¼ cup catchup, 2 cloves garlic, finely minced, 1 medium onion, chopped, 2 tablespoons Worcestershire sauce, juice of 1 large lemon, ½ teaspoon grated lemon rind, 1 tablespoon vinegar, 1 tablespoon sugar, 1 teaspoon salt, ½ teaspoon freshly ground black pepper and 2 cups water. Cook this mixture, uncovered, for 20 minutes.

Now spoon over the lamb as much sauce as will stick to its surface, put it in the roasting pan and into the 300° oven. This is a long-cooking business, a good 35 minutes to the pound. About every half hour baste with more of the sauce. Be sure that every bit of the surface is covered, but don't use so much sauce that the bottom of the roasting pan will be full of it. In an hour and a half turn the lamb over carefully and begin basting the other side. The sauce has a delectable taste, it keeps the meat from becoming dry and it's a rich red color, so the thicker the coating of sauce, the better.

When cooking time is up, remove lamb and make a thin gravy with the drippings,

How Late the Willow

How late the willow stays awake,
How early does she rise;

She burns her candles at both ends,
Nature's insomniac!

flour and water and a little more of the sauce.

When cold, wrap the lamb in Cellophane and seal, or put it in one of those large Cellophane-lined bags the locker plants supply, and seal. Be sure the seal is perfect. Pour the gravy into a container. Chill lamb and gravy in refrigerator. Place in freezer. If your unit has separate freezing and storage compartments, quick-freeze first and then transfer to storage.

The night before you are going to use the lamb, transfer it to the refrigerator, still sealed, to thaw slowly. This is most important. Food loses too much moisture if it's thawed quickly.

About an hour and a half before serving, remove wrappings from lamb and heat it slowly in a tightly covered roaster or casserole. The roaster can be put in the oven, and the casserole there or over boiling water on top of the stove. The important point is the "tightly covered." You don't want to dry out that beautiful leg of lamb—and I mean beautiful. Wait till you see those perfect slices of lamb with their centers of forcemeat. And the taste! Of course this is the carver's dream dish. Just clean neat slices right through the whole leg of lamb—no bones except the little shank bone at the end which you can dress up with a paper frill.

VEGETABLES

If you've had your freezer long, it probably holds stores of peas and cauliflower, all processed and ready for the last ten minutes of cooking. I'll tell you briefly how to process these two vegetables and go on to the beets, which will be completely cooked, sauce and all, when they go into the freezer.

Cauliflower: Separate into flowerets and wash well in cold water. Have a big pot of water boiling briskly. Put about a pound of cauliflower into a wire basket, colander or cheesecloth and immerse completely in the boiling water. Move container up and down to distribute the heat evenly. Scald for 4 minutes after water returns to boiling point. Transfer immediately to very cold water for a minute or two and drain onto towels. I put about 4 thicknesses of paper toweling under the cloth towels. The vegetables should be as dry as possible before they are packed. Pack into Cellophane-lined boxes, leaving a little space for expansion, seal at once and put in freezer.

Peas: Same thing exactly except that the scalding time is 1 minute instead of 4.

Beets à l'Orange: Cut orange peel into tiny slivers to make 4 full tablespoons, boil 2 minutes in salted water and drain. Melt 2 tablespoons butter or margarine, stir in 2 tablespoons flour and add 1 tablespoon honey, 2 tablespoons light brown sugar, 1 cup orange juice, 2 teaspoons lemon juice and ½ teaspoon salt. Cook until thick, stirring constantly, and add the orange peel and 3 cups cooked beets cut into slender strips. Mix well, but be careful not to break the tender beet strips by stirring too heartily. When chilled, pack into container and put in the freezer.

These may be thawed at room temperature if your refrigerator is overloaded on thawing day. Heat in the double boiler to avoid stirring.

Put the peas and cauliflower, still frozen, into small quantities of boiling water and cook until tender. If you can get mint, cook a few chopped leaves with the peas. Add salt and generous lumps of butter or margarine. I like to serve all three vegetables on the same dish; and, of course, any way they are arranged is bound to be quite a sight, what with the contrast of colors.

The legs of the stork are long, the legs of the duck are short: you cannot make the legs of the stork short, neither can you make the legs of the duck long. Why worry?

The average boy is an entertaining and interesting companion, the average girl is not: she is too self-centered to find sermons in stones, she must talk about herself, she cannot be impersonal; she says I like and I don't like where he says it is. Last year over 5,000 freezer locker plants froze and stored millions of packages of Sweetose frozen fruits for their customers. Locker plants all know about Sweetose—they will be glad to help you.
YOU CAN'T BUY THESE

"Sweetose" is a trade mark of the A. E. Staley Mfg. Co., Decatur, Illinois, registered in the U. S. Patent Office.

The berries shown in background above were frozen at home in July—taken out in December—placed on cracked ice. The others were placed in dish at left. They were photographed just as they came from the jars. Colors are actual.

but you can have them any time!

FROZEN AT HOME...THIS NEW EASY WAY!

Here is something new—really! Berries (like you see above) plump and bright and fresh in flavor all the year around. Thousands of women have found that freezing fruits is as simple as sewing on a button. And it is all made possible by a new food discovery called Sweetose Syrup.

Here Is All You Do

Be sure to pick out high-grade—really ripe berries. Wash the berries and pack them (don't crush) in any sturdy waterproof container which has a tight-fitting lid. Cover the berries with Sweetose WHITE Syrup, put on the lid and freeze. That's all! (No preservatives needed.) And next winter—when you open them, see if you don't find them as plump, juicy, tender, and as bright in color as when you put them up.

If you do not have a freezer at home, take your prepared fruit to any freezer locker plant in your neighborhood. They will be glad to freeze and store it for you.

Just one word of caution: Don't use any sugar—don't use sugar syrup—if you want the results we offer here.

The Sweetose method of freezing fruit is easy—but it was no easy matter to perfect Sweetose. It took years of research. It is a basic invention, recognized by the U. S. Government. And its action on fruit is quite different. It does not draw the natural juices from fruit cells like ordinary sugar. It penetrates the fruit cells. It glazes the fruit—preserves the color—prevents discoloration—helps to keep it plump—and permeates the fruit with a delightful mild sweetness. Just send us the coupon and we will send you complete directions for freezing and serving Sweetose frozen fruits.

The Brunks cheerfully admit they defy every decorating axiom. The love seat, a former car seat, and the bridge table, once a drugstore's, cost $5 each.

Three pieces of junk make one coffee table.

HOME MADE OUT OF JUNK

HOW LEFTOVERS AND LOVING HANDS FURNISHED A HOME WITH WARMTH AND CHARM ★ BY MARTHA BRUNK

THIS is the story of a house filled mostly with junk. It's my home, but because it's just as startling to me as it is to anyone else to find it's so pretty, I want to talk about it even if I do know I'm not showing the proper modesty. Besides, what with shortages and the high cost of living, it might come in handy to someone to know what one woman—me, with no training or special talent—did with a lot of stuff of precious little value, if any.

I'm not much of a writer, so I'll just have to sort of take you through the house and show you what I mean. We started off with good basic furniture, but I won't talk about that, just about the junk. And right off the bat I want to underline junk. I don't mean antiques that I "picked up for a song" and discovered to my huge surprise were priceless. I'd probably drop dead if I ever found myself with a real honest-to-goodness antique on my hands. This country around Frederick, Oklahoma, is too new for antiques, and the people who have cared enough to bring them in have also cared enough to hang on to them. So this isn't a proper story at all. This is a junk story—a story of what I did with a lot of things other people didn't want.

I'll begin by telling you about the house itself. It's a bungalow of wide white siding with a white stone living-room wing. I painted the other wing—the service end—myself, and had for audience all the neighborhood kids who were firmly convinced I would eventually fall off the stepladder while doing so. I also painted the front door (turquoise blue) and the shutters (lemon yellow). But the back door, a Dutch-type door, is my joy. I did it lemon yellow with the same turquoise scallops I put round the back window. I have always despised an ugly service entrance, so this was one of the first things I did when we moved in several years ago. Also, since I can imagine nothing more dreary than watering flowers, my back-door flowers are the most successful flowers I have. They repeat the house colors: turquoise pots, lemon-yellow bows, and flowers shading from pink to dubonnet. They are the only flowers I know of that bloom all the year around, never wilt, shed, or attract bugs—and if you can't pick a painted flower, who cares?

Breakfast nook: a tacked-on ruffle helps solve the tablecloth problem.

Enough of the outside. Inside is the junk. In the living room, for example, is a prize piece. It's the love seat next to the fireplace, and when I first saw it it was the front seat of a wrecked car, sitting forlornly in a junk yard with a $5 price tag on it. Now, in chintz, it's one of the most comfortable pieces of furniture in the house—low, grand springs and slanted just right.

...THE BENDIX DOES THE WASH!

aby may keep you busy—but not the family ash—with the Bendix. You set the dial, put in ap and go. All by itself the Bendix fills itself th water—washes clothes—changes its own water rinses 3 times—damp drys clothes—cleans itself drains itself—shuts itself off. No washday mess th the Bendix! When baby naps, so can you!

nly the tumble-action principle of e BENDIX washes clothes so clean, gently . . . with so little hot water nd soap . . . and no work at all!

O LIFTING OR STRAINING with the Bendix sket-level porthole.

OUR BENDIX "BABIES" EVERYTHING—its gentle, umble-Action dips clothes up and down in suds foaming and penetrating even ground-in grime play clothes comes racing out. And with no agitator rubbing or scrubbing it's so gentle even baby's daintiest dresses wash sweet and safe.

YOU'RE FLOWER FRESH in cottons washed in your Bendix washer. Colors never get drab and dingy from soil left over from previous loads. Every Bendix load gets fresh suds washing. No chilled-off water. No lazy, soil-laden suds.

OLD SHIRTS WHITE AS NEW? Certainly—with Bendix' Triple Rinsing. Soiled water and soap are so thoroughly rinsed away there's no sign of washday gray. No soapy particles to harshen baby's diapers. The Bendix shower rinses away soiled suds—then tumble rinses clothes in two more changes of water, for a cleaner, fresher wash!

LET HIM SHAVE, let them shower! The Bendix Water-Saver Cylinder saves so much hot water you don't have to warn the family to go easy on washday. And, with less water in the cylinder you need lots less soap for the richest suds!

YOU'LL BE LOVING IT—Always—like the many thousands of women who've turned all their washing problems over to their Bendix, for 9 whole years. Only the Bendix has been tested like this. See your dealer now—for a Bendix demonstration.

ext to it is a low chest, also from a junk ard, and while it's in no sense of the word a ally good piece of furniture, it was a solid aple dresser once. I cut the legs off it and finished it.

On it goes the old lamp I got rewired and aced in the base I picked up a year later—e discarded top of an old Tom and Jerry owl which, turned upside down, holds ivy. 'e've also got some lamps around the house hich once were turpentine cans but are ow wallpapered with Godey prints or the ke.

My bridge set is a get-together master-ece. The table was unwanted by a local ugstore, and despite the fact it has a mar-e top, I got it for five dollars. The four ire chairs have quite a history, because ey're scarcer than hen's teeth and it took e over a year to collect them. I got the rst two from a man who runs a junk yard own by the railroad tracks two miles from ere. One more I got from a friend for four ellow teacups I had that she wanted. One friend found for me in a junk yard in Memphis, Texas, and he brought it all the ay here to me in the ack of her car, bless er.

As for my "secre-ary," I built that. 'he bottom was an old resser, cut down and ompletely made over. 'he top was once the etter half of a secre-ary which wound up n another junk yard. put these two pieces ogether, and deco-ated them to display ny Dresden ware. I opied the decorations aithfully from a Marie Antoinette piece, colors nd all.

Also in the living oom is a washstand vhich I took a front anel out of to put ilded wire screening n, and make a radio abinet. I also added shelf for magazines nd used the "floor" as the perfect spot for husband Paul's slip-pers. My coffee table was another concoction, copied from one in a cigarette ad—only mine was made from a cut-down kitchen table, topped with an old picture frame around a sheet of mirror. (Total cost of all three: six dollars and fifty cents.)

THE dining-room furniture is mostly nor-nal except for a white wrought-iron-and-plate-glass plant stand. It was once one of those horrible, plush-covered "fireside benches" that were all the rage around 1910 and were so uncomfortable nobody would sit on them, so ugly it hurt your eyes to look at them. I took out the alleged seat and put in glass shelving, whitewashed the iron 'arms," and made the plant stand.

In the summer, the plants are flanked with my special summer curtains made of mos-quito netting at six cents a yard. I use or-gandy and draw curtains in the winter, because our house isn't all junk by a long shot.

The breakfast chairs are rush bottom, up-holstered, and came, at fifty cents each, from my favorite junk yard. The table is an old round oak table, which, after refinishing, looks like Swedish modern. I had a bed I didn't need, but no table, while Peggy, a friend, needed a bed. I told her she could have my bed if she'd find me a table. Her mother's maid had a table she didn't need, but she did need a chest of drawers, so Peggy got the maid a chest of drawers, gave me the table, I gave Peggy the bed and everyone was happy. I put a ruffle around the edges for my war-and-peace tablecloth after I got tired of ironing six luncheon cloths one week. The ruffle needs washing and ironing only once every few weeks and keeps the table looking dressed up all the time.

I also had a bright idea on the breakfast-chair slip covers. I made five for four chairs, whipping the extra one on when needed instead of having to strip all the chairs because one is soiled.

THE kitchen, just off the breakfast nook, holds my work desk, topped with a bulletin board and a shelf which was my maiden attempt at carpentering. It is only a little crooked and I put a ruffle on it so it doesn't show. On it is my kitchen clock, an old one I found in my mother-in-law's basement, which I painted with polka dots because—don't ask me why—I have always wanted a polka-dot clock.

In five-year-old Johnny's room space presented a problem, so I sold his twin maple beds which were lovely but took up the whole room and made him a new set by cutting down some large bookshelves and using them for bed ends on two studio couches. I took Currier and Ives prints off a calendar and lacquered them for pictures and then made him a gun, toy and tank rack lined with wallpaper with hunting scenes on it. Because he is map crazy, as well as gun crazy, I also made him a lamp shade out of a map and turned an old desk into a very new-looking one by giving it a map top, varnished over. I fixed up the desk drawers with new pulls too—made out of some brightly colored wooden beads he got his first Christmas. His desk lamp is his favorite. The base is a square can painted red; the shade, a cheap one, is banded top and bottom with red and covered with a Currier and Ives fire-engine print. Johnny adores it because I cut out the windows in the building where the fire is, backed them with red tissue paper and poked a darning needle through them so that sparks seem to leap out.

There are loads more things which are just camouflaged junk—like my cut-down mission-oak table in the living room which I refinished in mahogany and rubbed until it does look like an antique, or my revolving table for Paul's pipes, which I made out of an old piano stool. But the whole point I want to make is that it doesn't take any particular talent to do all this with junk. Anyone can do it, even with household responsibilities there's no end to. I speak of building the secretary and I mean actual building—but my training consisted of inspiration and desperation and not much else. I tried for months to get a carpenter. When he came, I asked him, among other things, to fix a dresser drawer that went too far back. He spent an hour and fifteen minutes on it, and then couldn't get it out. It turned out he'd nailed it in. So—I decided I really couldn't do anything worse than that and I wouldn't have to be paying myself a dollar and fifty cents an hour to do it. So I got myself a few tools, including a miter box (which holds a hand saw straight) and the result was all this. Now junk's my weakness—and my pleasure.

THE END

Some people keep their ideals as they keep heirlooms, locked away, so that but for their owner's word we should almost be inclined to doubt their existence; others use them and wear them. Well, they may get a bit cracked, a bit tarnished, and some of them may even get lost altogether; but they're more convincing when they're handled that way.

Her class was submitting to its weekly nail spection when I came in, conducted by the perb and awesome figure of the head of e school herself. The students of nail culre—there were perhaps fifteen of them, all out Lois' age—held out tremulous and ghtly grimy hands, palms down. They sat hind a long table. She passed by the front the table, lifting each nervous hand, probg severely into a possible nail biting from e evidence exhibited, and tossing over her oulder a grade which an attendant, who llowed in her train, marked down in a lite notebook.

"You see," the directress said, when we ad sat down in her office, "fat people, girls pecially, aren't usually happy people at l. And sometimes their fatness is a comensation for some unhappiness. They overit because eating is a kind of comfort. It's othing. Then they don't care about their ppearance, because the comforting feeling more important. We try to give them other als to shoot at: high grades for improvent, gold stars, praise—a variety of attenon. We make them care about how they ok, for their self-respect."

I went back thoughtfully to the classes. erhaps playing happily outdoors in the nshine with other children was not more portant than this, if a fat little girl would t be playing happily.

Lois and her schoolmates were having a ancing lesson. The teacher was from the st-known dancing school in the country, ith branches in most every city. The girls ad no shyness about dancing with him, ven in front of the line of their gimlet-eyed ntemporaries.

I TOOK Lois in a taxi back to her sister's partment. She hadn't broken over her diet nce. The first week's restrictions had been retty stiff, but she hadn't really cared—as a atter of fact, the hardest part had been to t as much celery and lettuce and "stuff e that" as you were supposed to. No, she asn't tired, she felt fine, and the other night e'd had salt on spinach by mistake—her iet said she couldn't have anything cooked ith salt—and it had made her feel sick.

She talked all the way to the apartment, mpletely absorbed in her new regime. here wasn't much time to do anything else. he didn't like her mother's going back to lt. Holly. It was nicer when she was round. Rose played the radio at night, not ery late, but still, when you were trying to ake yourself over like this, you had to get many hours' sleep.

Lois was preoccupied with Lois. For her, here was no other world beyond her peronal appearance. I drove away troubled and uneasy. Fingernails, scalps, pores, celery seemed fragile material out of which to build a young person equipped to take a place in such a world as is going to be turned over to her.

I went to the graduation exercises. Lois won first prize for highest marks, unbroken observance of every rule and restriction, and greatest loss of weight. She had lost twenty-five pounds. "Lois Sutton, of Mt. Holly, New Jersey," said her "diploma"—another reward, "weighed one hundred and thirty-five pounds in July. She weighs, this seventh day of September, one hundred and ten pounds."

I STAYED to congratulate Lois and Mr. and Mrs. Sutton, who were there, but they were so excited, so pleased and proud, that they wanted to be alone, and I slipped away.

I did not see Lois again until many weeks later. I invited her and her mother to lunch and a matinee. I was a little late, and they were waiting for me. Lois stood up, a little behind her mother, and above her. I said at once that she had grown taller. She nodded happily. "Three inches," Mrs. Sutton said, "since she learned how to grow in the right direction." We all laughed.

We went in to lunch, and Lois stepped back for us to precede her through the door. I asked what she would like to eat and she ventured a possibility of sweetbreads, which, she said, she had never eaten. She fell back finally, however, on the dependable chicken, but waited to make her choice until her mother and I had finished.

Mrs. Sutton and I talked at some length, catching up on what had happened since I had seen them last—not what had happened to Lois, but what decorating had been done in the house, how Christmas had gone—ordinary woman talk. Lois sat quiet. She not only did not contradict anything her mother said, she did not even enter the conversation. We had finished the soup and were well into our chicken when I turned to her. She had been listening attentively and interestedly to every word her mother and I had said, without any sign of a withdrawn preoccupation. I asked if she had had fun at Christmas. She laughed happily.

"I've had fun all year," she said. "Mt. Holly is the nicest place in the country to live in. The school is wonderful. They do so much for you. Why, they even have parties and get-togethers sometimes on Friday nights."

What had she got for Christmas? Oh, an archery set, and lots of other things for sports. Yes, she was simply crazy about sports now. She played basketball and baseball and everything there was at school. They were more fun than anything.

How were the friends she had talked about when I was there in the summer? Oh, she never saw them any more. They were younger, did I remember? I did. Well, now she went with the kids of her own age. Boys too? Oh, sure, especially one. Her mother thought it was funny that lots of times the girls paid at the movies for the boys, but didn't I think that was right, if the girl happened to have saved more from her allowance? Anyway, they all did, and the boys paid when they had enough. It all evened up.

I asked if she still kept to her diet. No, she didn't have to, she answered indifferently. Her weight stayed at one hundred and ten. But she didn't have a craving for sweets any more. Too busy, she guessed.

Words came back to me: "Very few people really want to overeat. It's a compensation." Lois was talking again, turning to her mother.

"Remember my birthday party last year when I made you hunt all over town for tuna fish because I wanted tuna-fish salad?"

Mrs. Sutton did remember. "There wasn't any in town, so I gave you white salmon and you never knew the difference."

Lois was contemptuous. "What a meal! I'd never want that stuff now! Potato salad, too, and tomato salad, potato chips, ice cream and cake. Whew!"

"I don't suppose," I said, "that anything has been so exciting since the night-club party and your new dress. You did go, didn't you, just the way Johnny promised?"

"Oh, sure," Lois said, "but I've forgotten about it nearly, except that we had a terrible time getting home. The car broke down, and we didn't get back until nearly three o'clock. I was so tired. But I'm saving the dress for the high-school formal. It'll be just right. That's going to be a really super party."

Yes, fingernails and pores and posture have been good building material for Lois. They have made her a serene and secure child, who is interested in everything about her and not afraid of anything. So she doesn't have to interrupt or contradict, or make friends with younger children, or avoid sports lest she be laughed at. She is at home among her contemporaries and looking out, not in. That is a good posture to have for the world about to be thrown at her—head up, feet well planted, and arms wide.

THE END

RED-LETTER YEAR

THE war was over and the two Conrads were finally together. They settled down after that long-distance marriage to some long-term dreams. The first of those dreams came true with the birth of their baby girl.

"We had just everything," Eleanor says. "And then all of a sudden just problems."

There was the problem of Bill getting a good job; getting used to the loss of his good right leg. There was the problem of finding a home, especially when along with Lyn's first tooth came the knowledge that soon a young brother or sister would be coming along too.

But no problem's too big when two people in love decide to live with it—and lick it.

CANDY'S SECOND HUSBAND

his shirt; he had put on a revolting pair of brown corduroy trousers, used for manual labor, and an elderly gray tweed jacket with pockets like laundry bags. He was, in fact, almost militantly at ease. Candy looked at him and the doorbell rang.

Adam did not bend over and kiss her gently on the forehead, nor did he seem too moved to speak. He shook hands with her and with Bill firmly and cordially.

"This is awfully nice of you ——" began Adam.

"Isn't this nice!" began Candy.

Bill said nothing, and a small but horrible silence fell upon the room, in which Candy heard herself telling, with a sort of mad vivacity, David's latest bright saying, which had not been outstandingly bright, even at the time. In the middle of this untimely anecdote, Ellen announced dinner and Candy rustled into the dining room so fast that Bill and Adam had to raise their voices to be heard above her house coat.

As they consumed shrimp soup, she began to realize that attempting to be two entirely different people at the same time puts a definite strain on the nervous system. To Adam, she had expected to be the unattainable lost love, soft-focused by time and memories; while to Bill she would have been the loyal mate and good companion, clear-cut and as direct as a man. Before they had finished the soup, she was simply eating.

Oddly enough, it didn't seem to matter; for suddenly Bill and Adam were talking as though they had known each other since early boyhood. She might, she reflected with some bitterness, have had her dinner on a tray upstairs. She reached for the salt and took her first really good look at Adam.

She remembered him as he had been eight years ago: tall and thin, with a shiny shock of russet-colored hair, very blue eyes and a slow grin. The freshness and brightness, she noticed now, had faded in four years of Pacific warfare. He was less vivid—but somehow more attractive. She had forgotten that he was one of those rare people who really know how to pay attention; when Adam listened to you, his eyes were concentrated, warm, interested.

What a nice man! Candy thought. I like him much more now than I did eight years ago.

"And I hope you'll like her," Adam said.

Candy dropped her butter knife. "Like her?" she repeated half-wittedly.

"Adam's fiancée," said Bill, clearly and slowly, "whom he has just been telling us about."

"Kate McKettrick," said Adam. "Maybe you know her?"

"Oh!" said Candy. "How perfectly—wonderful. No, I don't." She swallowed. "When may we meet her?"

"Well, I'll be coming out every week end to work on the house, and she comes on Sundays. We can't get workmen, so we're doing most of it ourselves."

"Tell us about her." Candy avoided Bill's eye. "How long have you known her?"

"We were engaged before the war," Adam said. "But we both thought it would be better to wait."

"Is she pretty?"

"I think so. Smart too."

"Oh, I'm sure of that." Candy smiled at him with all her teeth.

Bill inquired practically, "What does she do?"

"She's a speaker and lecturer for the Women's Independent Committee for International Peace."

"Oh," said Candy, "my goodness."

"Travel round much?" Bill asked.

"Too darn much," Adam said with feeling. "I've hardly seen her since I got back. She's in Atlanta now, but she'll be out next week end. Why don't you two come over on Sunday? I'd like to show you the house."

"Fine," Bill agreed heartily. "We'll be there."

"That would be lovely," Candy said hollowly. And now I will give a piercing scream and be carried up to my room where I can spend a peaceful evening tearing my clothes to shreds. Speaker and lecturer. Hatchet-faced, six feet tall, enormous teeth and no bust. My successor.

After Adam had gone, Bill lighted a last pipe and lay down on the sofa. "Say," he said, "you underestimated that guy, darling. He's a darn nice fella."

"Under——" Candy began. Then the variety of things which she longed to say, together with the number of ways in which she would have liked to say them, stopped speech completely. She shut her mouth and directed upon her husband a long, level look. He sucked on his pipe abstractedly.

"Like to meet his wife. I'll bet she's terrific."

"She isn't his wife," Candy snapped. "He hasn't married her yet."

Bill looked up at her through pipe smoke. "Tired, sweet? Why don't you go on up?"

Candy went on up, her skirt rustling like a palm tree in a high wind.

Sunday was one of those June days which, as Candy observed, science should have found some way to preserve. Inside the Dean cottage, someone was hammering and whistling. The lilacs over the green door were in deep purple bloom and a pink dogwood blushed by the fence. As Candy and Bill opened the gate, someone called and the hammering ceased. The front door opened and Adam called a welcome. A girl stood beside him.

ASTONISHMENT slowed Candy's pace up the path—an astonishment that made her feel both puzzled and impatient. Why, after all, should she have assumed that Adam was going to marry someone six feet tall? Why should it be so amazing that Kate McKettrick, speaker and lecturer for the Women's Independent Committee for International Peace, was tiny, her blond hair bobbed like a child's, her round hazel eyes as alert and watchful as a squirrel's?

"Kate, this is Candy Stewart—and Bill ——"

Words flew round Candy's head like a nest of sparrows disturbed into flight:

"—— darlingest house in town. I've always wanted ——"

"—— on in and see what we're ——"

"—— those old floor boards ——"

Kate McKettrick's hand should have been warm and soft; it was dry and hard. Her voice should have been high and sweet; it was deep and resonant, a perfect speaker's voice. She had an amusing, turned-up nose, an exquisite complexion—and very thin red lips that drew a sharp line above her rather sharp little chin.

"This," said Kate, "is the living room."

There was a pile of newspapers at one end and a six-foot stepladder at the other.

"I like the way it's furnished, don't you?" Adam said reflectively. "Sort of functional."

Kate said competently, "I'm going to join those two windows in the south wall and make one big bay window. If we can ever get hold of a carpenter in this town."

"It's a nice town, isn't it?" Adam offered Bill a cigarette. "How are the schools?"

"Good, but they could be better," said Bill.

Kate laughed abruptly. "You don't have to worry about that yet, darling."

Adam's eyes were invisible; he was wiping paint off his hands.

Candy said swiftly, "Bill's on the school board."

"H'm," Adam observed reverently. "Influential."

"I am also," Bill offered modestly, "on the sewage committee."

"Ah," said Adam. "Leading citizen."

"Well, naturally," Bill went on. "What's this—dining room?"

"It will be," said Kate briskly, "when I get the right wallpaper."

"Oh, I saw some the other day," Candy cried. "I should think it might be perfect in here. It was a Williamsburg pattern—big pale greenish-blue and white flowers on a ——"

"Wallpaper always sounds awful when you describe it, doesn't it?" Kate said kindly. "I had a sort of little red-and-yellow calico design in mind." She laughed. "Of course it's really perfectly ridiculous for us to live in the country. I didn't want to in the least, but Adam insisted. He's a very obstinate man when he wants to be, aren't you, darling?"

Adam nodded gravely. "Very obstinate Hard to get along with."

"I never thought so," said Candy suddenly. "I always found him very cozy." She smiled at Adam, who grinned back—a purely impersonal grin.

"How about the upstairs?" Bill asked hastily.

"Just two bedrooms." Kate's eyes were very round and bright. "I'd love your advice about Adam's room, Bill. He's left it all to me."

"Well, I don't know much about it," Bill said, "but anything I can do to help——"

Candy thought, Congratulations, Kate. Aloud she said, "Bill, dear, we must be going along. We'll be late for church."

"Church?" Kate's beautifully controlled voice was a sudden little crow of amusement. "Do you honestly go to church—you two?"

Bill smiled at her. "We do, and as a professional speaker, I think you'd enjoy our minister. He preaches a sermon that really is a sermon."

Kate shook her head. "Not for me, I'm afraid." She glanced at Adam with a flicker of shared amusement. "I haven't been inside a church for years. I wouldn't be married in one if Adam didn't insist. He's sentimental."

Bill said mildly, "Well, lots of people feel the way you do."

Kate stood by Adam's side in the front door. "The churches," she said, "are the traitors of the twentieth century. They've let the people down."

Candy hoped her own voice was as sweet as she meant it to be. "That hardly seems a very good reason for letting the churches down, does it?" she said. "Well, good-by. Let us know if there's anything you want. You must come to supper next week."

As they drove down Elm Street, Bill said cautiously, "Amazing to find a mind like a steel trap behind that face, isn't it?"

Candy said grimly, "Take another look. It's the face that's the steel trap. . . . And don't you dare say I'm jealous! I'm not. I don't want Adam Campbell and I never did. I've got you."

"O.K., sweet." Bill parked the car. "I guess Kate's not a woman's woman," he told Candy.

"Whatever that may be," Candy said bitterly.

But during the first two hymns she was dimly, unaccountably sad, with a heartache that obscured her pleasure in the service; she found herself ferreting after its source and paying no attention to Doctor Merritt. . . . What she had told Bill was quite true: she was not jealous of Kate. That was silly. And it wasn't that she wanted Adam never to marry. That was silly too. She did want him to marry—but someone worthy of him; and in some curious, mixed-up way, someone worthy of herself too. Otherwise it would be not his good judgment, but simply accident, that Adam Campbell had once found Candy Goodwin attractive enough to fall in love with.

Kate McKettrick, she said firmly inside her head, will not do.

How does your voice sound to others? If you are curious on the point, try the following experiment: Cup your ears with both hands, pressing the ears forward slightly, and speak, and you'll have a pretty good idea. You will, no doubt, be surprised how different your words sound. Radio performers often test themselves this way just before a program. —Irish Weekly.

MONEY ISN'T EVERYTHING— (OR IS IT?)

BY GROUCHO MARX

WHAT do you want to save up a lot of money for? You'll never need the stuff.

Why, just think of all the wonderful, wonderful things you can do without money. Things like—well, things like—

On second thought, you'd better keep on saving, chum. Otherwise you're licked.

For instance, how are you ever going to build that Little Dream House, without a trunk full of moolah? You think the carpenters are going to work free? Or the plumbers? Or the architects? Not those lads. They've been around. They're no dopes.

And how are you going to send that kid of yours to college, without the folding stuff?

Maybe you think he can work his way through by playing the flute.

If so, you're crazy. (Only three students have ever worked their way through college by playing the flute. And they had to stop eating for four years.)

And how are you going to do that world-traveling you've always wanted to do? Maybe you think you can stoke your way across, or scrub decks. Well, that's no good. I've tried it. It interferes with shipboard romances.

So—all seriousness aside—you'd better keep on saving, pal.

Obviously the best way is by continuing to buy U. S. Savings Bonds—through the Payroll Plan.

They're safe and sound. Old Uncle Sam personally guarantees your investment. And he never fobbed off a bum I.O.U. on anybody.

You get four bucks back for every three you put in. And that ain't hay, alfalfa, or any other field-grown product.

Millions of Americans—smart cookies all—have found the Payroll Plan the easiest and best way to save.

So stick with the Payroll Plan, son—and you can't lose.

SAVE THE EASY WAY... BUY YOUR BONDS THROUGH PAYROLL SAVINGS

"Hymn two hundred and fifty-four," announced Doctor Merritt. "Hymn two hundred and fifty-four."

Candy lay back luxuriously on the guest-room bed and watched Mollie Belle Ruxton unpack the contents of an enormous suitcase.

"This is marvelous," she said. "It's like being back in school again."

Mollie Belle shook out a pale-green dinner dress and said, in the melting accents of the deep South, "Better. I don't have to listen to you talk all night about Princeton, Yale, Harvard and Williams. My, I'm glad to be here, sugar."

Candy sat up. "Look—I'm sorry we have to have this Campbell man to supper the very first night you're here."

Mollie Belle sat down in the maple rocking chair and stretched out her exquisite legs. "Sugar, I wouldn't care if you had Toto and Gargantua to supper. Who is this Campbell man?"

"He's an old beau of mine."

"Oh." Mollie Belle looked up. "Nice?"

"Very. But he's marrying a—a werewolf."

"Oh," said Mollie Belle. "What's she like?"

Candy said tersely, "Public Address System Number One. Knows everything."

"You mean she's plain?" Mollie Belle sounded shocked.

Candy laughed, a short, bitter laugh. "Blond, big shiny eyes, lovely skin, divine figure. About five feet two. Hates me. Hates all women. Likes nice big bedazzled men."

"Oh," said Mollie Belle. And after a moment, "Do you remember the time we kind of bothered Loretta Bemis?"

Candy giggled helplessly. "Dear Loretta. Such a fine-looking girl. So magnetic. President of everything."

"But she didn't like girls very much," Mollie Belle said thoughtfully. "She said Southerners were dumb. Once."

Candy got up suddenly. "I must put David to bed."

Mollie Belle smiled luxuriously. "I'll see you later, sugar," she said.

Late that night, lying wide-awake while Bill slept as wholeheartedly as David, Candy thrashed about and asked herself with impatient scorn exactly what she had expected. Actually she had had no definite plans, beyond the pleasure of witnessing Miss Kate McKettrick's certain irritation; but even that had been denied her. Looking back on the evening, she felt not only let down, but baffled—very baffled indeed. It had been somehow so—well, so surprising.

ADAM and Kate were already there when Mollie Belle walked into the living room, looking like a tall flower in the pale-green dinner dress. With some satisfaction Candy noticed Kate stiffen slightly; Mollie Belle at her best was a disturbing sight. Then Candy had glanced at Adam. His expression was attentive, polite, remote; his response to Mollie Belle was the absolute minimum possible to any normal male. Candy drew a deep sigh of lost hope.

At Mollie Belle's first sentence, Kate's round, pink-and-white face took on amused tolerance. Candy could almost see the filing system at work: Southern Belle, said Kate's expression, and the Southern Belle was dismissed mentally from the room. Kate directed her attention to Adam and Bill, leaving occasional polite gaps for Candy to fill.

And—this was the surprising, the maddening part—Mollie Belle did nothing whatever about it. She had come down, as Candy well knew, after an hour's preparation metaphorically holding a knife in her teeth and now she simply sat looking—like Adam—attentive, polite and very, very uninterested. Candy was bewildered.

"OF course, the situation at UN is perfectly fascinating," Kate announced. "Matches, please, Adam!" This last was the impersonal command of constant repetition. She said parenthetically, "He never remembers. Such manners! . . . I happen to have heard from a friend of mine who knows the Russian contingent well ——"

Kate continued to talk, interestingly and well, through dinner. She did not so much monopolize the conversation as manipulate it: she drew both Adam and Bill into a discussion of communism and its danger to which Candy listened in silence, not having been asked her opinion; and to which Mollie Belle apparently listened not at all.

As they were leaving the dining room Kate asked kindly how long Miss Ruxton was staying in the North.

Mollie Belle looked at her vaguely. "Oh, I'm gettin' a job, I guess," she said, with the accents of Amos and Andy.

Candy grinned to herself. Now it would begin. But it didn't begin.

"What kind of a job?" Kate asked, looking at herself with apparent satisfaction in the mirror of her compact.

"Oh, I guess some of secretarial," Mollie Belle murmured.

Kate smiled. "How nice," she said, as Adam and Bill came into the room.

Adam was saying, "So I practically hit the jack pot. This Pete is a first-class carpenter, and he got three friends and they all came Friday and started in."

"Are they good?" Bill asked.

"Swell," said Adam.

Kate laughed shortly. "They're perfect idiots but they're vets and so, of course, Adam loves them. The one named Frank or Joe or something put the bathroom paper on upside down."

"It looks better that way," observed Adam mildly.

Kate threw him a look in which a good many emotions were only partially suppressed, and turned to Candy. "I've got to go West for a couple of weeks on a speaking tour, and I tremble to think what the house is going to look like when I get back. With Adam in charge —— I wish you'd drop in, Candy, and check up for me."

Candy felt her cheeks grow hot, but Adam spoke before she had to. "Don't worry, Candy. Kate couldn't be inefficient to save her life. She'll write it all down in a little notebook."

"And then you'll lose the notebook," Kate prophesied acidly.

"That's right." Adam turned suddenly to Mollie Belle. "Are you efficient, Miss Ruxton?"

The Circus is Coming

BY MYRTLE CHANCE

I shall not spend my love to keep you gay,
For gaiety must have its charge of grief.
Let me remember. It was circus day,
And I ran barefoot, in wide-eyed belief
That for a five-year-old the show was free;
That bears and ponies, tigers, monkey, clowns,
The red dogcarts, the loud calliope,
The spangled people from the other towns,
All came along with life. But papa said
He bought our tickets from the blue-cup dimes;
The blue cup, to which we contributed
Was empty now for any choicer times.
Today I count for you the price of sorrow
And know it will buy happiness tomorrow.

Love-at-First-Sight

A common folly! Girl sees dress. Girl loves dress. Girl buys dress. And the mean, ornery dress turns traitor at first washing. Oh, woe! Oh, shrinkage! Moral: Don't fall in love till second sight. Wait till you see the "Sanforized" label.

Follies of the Female (COULD THEY BE YOURS?)

"It Can't Happen Twice!"

Oh yes, it can! As many times as you buy cotton dresses without the "Sanforized" label, you take chances with shrinkage. Only with "Sanforized" can you be sure your cotton lovelies will keep on fitting, keep on looking smart!

So You Think You'll Outsmart 'em?

Here you see the folly of feminine logic . . . "If dresses shrink, I'll buy mine a size bigger and let 'em shrink to size!" But shrinkage, my pet, is no more predictable than you are! Better buy dresses tagged "Sanforized"—same size as you. They keep their figures just like yours, tub 'em as much as you will.

The style will never shrink away from the dress that wears this label →

"Sanforized"—the checked standard of shrinkage. The "Sanforized" trade-mark is used on compressive pre-shrunk fabrics or ready-to-wear garments whose tests for residual shrinkage are regularly checked, through the service of the owner of the trade-mark, to insure maintenance of its established standard by users of the mark.

Mollie Belle turned her enormous dark eyes upon him. "No, Mr. Campbell, I guess I'm not. I don't think I'm even very modern."

Bill snorted. "She's right, Adam. She's wasted in this age. She should have been born in a covered wagon. You should see her drive a couple of pigs to market."

Mollie Belle dropped her gaze and said sweetly, "Oh, anybody can drive pigs, I guess."

"She doesn't look it, though, does she?" Bill said affectionately.

Adam looked at Mollie Belle's profile and said flatly, "She looks like Nefertiti."

Soon after that, Kate had to go. She was staying with friends in Beaver Brook while Adam camped out in the cottage. . . .

Candy stared at the rectangle of lighter darkness that was the open window, and wondered drowsily what had gone wrong. Mollie Belle had not only failed to get under Kate's skin—she had played straight into her hands. Mollie Belle, normally as gay as she was intelligent, had behaved exactly like Kate's idea of a silly little Southerner. Why? Candy sighed, and the first wave of sleep washed over her gently.

It had all gone wrong. She had wanted . . . what? She didn't exactly know. She had only hoped —— She was asleep.

The next five days were comparatively uneventful; later, Candy was to think of them as the lull before the storm, but at the time they held no portentous quality, no hint of premonition. Mollie Belle called up three or four old friends in a desultory sort of way, and wrote notes to a few people who might know about jobs. The results of both activities could not have been more impressive if she had casually sown a handful of dragon's teeth and been confronted with a harvest of fully armed warriors: for every telephone call she made, at least two personable men seemed to spring up, usually on the Stewarts' front steps, but sometimes on the telephone, which rang night and day. George. Fred. Julian. Sam. Mac. Steve. They multiplied daily. As Bill said, they had nothing in common except their gender, and their passionate determination to take Mollie Belle out to dinner.

"I NEVER saw such variety. They run the gamut from rare to well-done," he said. "How do you do it?"

She grinned at him, her wonderful, gamine grin that went so oddly with the exotic coloring. "I'm going to move to a hotel. It's awful to make you and Candy put up with this nonsense."

"We love it," Candy cried. "Why, it's my first touch of romance in years!"

"She was drying right up for lack of love," Bill said.

"But it makes me feel peculiar," Mollie Belle objected.

"I should think it might," said Bill. "Imagine how it makes me feel. For six years I live here in perfect peace, coming home to nothing worse than an explosion in the furnace, or maybe the car horn stuck or the attic on fire. Now I come home and there are strange men in every room in the house. They use all those little shrunken towels that Candy hangs up for guests—you'd think only gnomes came to visit us—they smoke our cigarettes, they wear out our rugs ——"

"Hush yo' mouth, boy," said Mollie Belle. "I'm staying right here."

The next afternoon, Candy took her guest to tea with her mother. Mrs. Goodwin was very fond of Mollie Belle, and after a while Candy left them together and went off to have a cozy talk with Cobb, who had been her mother's butler for twenty years. When she came back, Mollie Belle was saying:

"I suppose it's silly of me to feel that way."

Mrs. Goodwin refilled her teacup, glancing up absently at her daughter. "Yes, dear. There are spells like that in every relationship—especially marriage. When one partner seems to stand still, and the other one runs ahead. But it doesn't necessarily mean one has outgrown the other."

"But I've seen it so many times ——" And, to Candy's pity and dismay, she saw real fear in Mollie Belle's dark eyes.

"The only tragedy," said Mrs. Goodwin gently, "is when one partner goes in the opposite direction from the other. More sugar, dear? We seem to have a great deal. I think Cobb runs a black market in the laundry."

Candy said brightly, "It's happened to Bill and me several times. I got a little mixed up about democracy once, and Bill had some very strange ideas about the South."

Mollie Belle was paying no attention. "Mrs. Goodwin," she said slowly, "do you think you can always tell when you meet a man whether or not he's going to . . . catch up with you? Or let you catch up with him?"

"I think you can always tell whether you're traveling the same road," Mrs. Goodwin said firmly, "and that's the important thing. One of you may travel faster along it at times, and have to wait for the other to catch up. But you'll be all right if you're not on separate paths to begin with."

"Yes," said Mollie Belle. "Yes." But her dark eyes still held a very strange expression.

Saturday morning, David woke up with a cold in his three-year-old head. By noon he had a temperature and a terrifying earache; and Doctor Blane had gone sailing. Candy was frantically looking up the boat-club number when the telephone beside her shrilled unpleasantly. She ground her teeth. Sometimes all those men of Mollie Belle's ——

But it was Adam's voice, sounding strained. "Candy? How are you? Listen, I need your advice. Kate ordered some red-and-yellow paper for the dining room and they've just called up to say it's out of print or something. Anyway, she has to choose some more, and she's in Detroit. And Pete and Frank are here all ready to put it on, and what do you think I ought to do?"

"Oh, Adam, what a shame," Candy said emptily. David wailed, "Mummy! Mummy, come!" and she went away from the telephone as far as the cord would let her. "Adam," she said to the telephone, "wait just a minute." Mollie Belle came into the hall, and Candy put her palm over the mouthpiece. She spoke fast. "Darling, deal with this, will you? I cannot cope with Kate's little decorating problems. He wants advice—you take him over. Please!"

Mollie Belle nodded calmly and waved her hand in the direction of David's room. As Candy flew, she heard Mollie Belle, coolly impersonal:

"Yes? Well, why don't you pick another pattern? Help? Why—if you really want me to, of course I suppose ——"

By four o'clock Doctor Blane had arrived; by eight o'clock David was out of pain. By eleven o'clock, David was damply asleep, Bill was wandering about winding clocks and Candy was getting ready for bed.

"I left the hall light on for Mollie Belle," Bill said. Then he added, "Say, why do you suppose she came north in June anyway?"

"Why not?" Candy was very airy.

"Well, it's an odd time of year to try to get a job in New York, that's all. And last spring she said she wasn't coming till October."

"Well—she just came."

"You know, she's a swell girl, Candy. I can't understand why she doesn't get married."

Candy peeled off her slip. "She's got a thing about it. She's scared."

"What's she scared of?"

"Falling out of love, I think. She hasn't talked to me—just to mother. She said something about having seen so many people outgrow their husbands—or wives—or even friends."

Bill took his necktie off and looked at it. "Poor kid. It sounds a little as though ——" He stopped.

"I thought so too," said Candy. "He went off to Okinawa or something and when he came back ——"

"Yeah," said Bill. "Well, there are plenty around the house for her to choose from. Which one is she out with tonight?"

Candy stared at him. "Adam. She left here before lunch, and I was so busy with David—she hasn't come back ——"

The front door shut with a thud and steps sounded on the stairs. Candy opened her door a crack, and the light fell on Mollie Belle's face. She looked dazzled.

"Hel'o, pet," said Candy. "Did you get the wallpaper?"

"Wallpaper? Oh, wallpaper. Yes, we did!" Mollie Belle said brightly. "It took ages. How's David?"

"Much better. Did you—er—have a good time?"

Mollie Belle stepped out of the light and said, "Well, you know what choosin' wallpaper is like! Good night, sugar."

Candy shut the door gently, and Bill said, "I didn't know they sold wallpapers after six in the evening. Even on Saturdays."

"They don't," Candy said tersely, and went to brush her teeth. That look on Mollie Belle's face —— She stopped with her toothbrush in her mouth and stared at herself in the bathroom mirror. Well, she thought, well! A slow, frothy grin lit up her face, and she stood for some time, lost in startled contemplation.

After she had turned out the light, Bill said, "What are you snickering about all to yourself?"

"I was just thinking," Candy said, "it would be funny if I was smarter than I gave myself credit for."

"It certainly would," said Bill inexcusably.

Sunday-morning breakfasts were rather special. David was present, and Ellen made her famous waffles. On this particular hot Sunday in June, Candy was wearing a new printed silk dress, Bill looked unusually handsome in a gabardine suit fresh from the cleaner's, and even David was for the moment unspotted in yellow.

It was, therefore, surprising when Mollie Belle drifted into the dining room, attired in blue jeans and a plaid cotton shirt. She sat down and smiled round the table. "Hi," she said.

"Hi," said Candy. "Er—darling, do you know what day it is?"

"No," said Mollie Belle interestedly. "What?"

"Sunday."

"Oh?" said Mollie Belle, still looking interested.

"Sunday," said Candy.

"Yes, I understand," Mollie Belle said amiably. "Sunday."

Bill leaned forward. "My wife is trying to tell you with gossamer tact that in the North women almost never wear trousers to church."

"Oh," said Mollie Belle. "Sunday! Your wonderful minister!"

"You said ——" Candy began.

"Oh, yes, I did—I do. But I—not this Sunday. I can't. I have to help Adam. I mean I promised. It's the paint. You see, we found exactly the right paper—a Williamsburg reproduction. Only it means we have to paint the woodwork that marvelous blue. And we have to do it today because tomorrow Pete and Frank are coming to hang the paper. So ——"

"Sure," said Bill. "We'll come over and help."

"Thank you. That's very nice of you," said Mollie Belle, with the courtesy of one who has just been presented with a live boa constrictor.

"Oh, I don't think we can ——" began Candy.

"Of course we can," Bill interrupted heartily. "Right after lunch."

"Bill!" Candy had not intended to sound like a sharp explosion. Bill jumped. "Will you get me a handkerchief, please, darling?"

Bill looked utterly bewildered; but five years of marriage leaves its mark. His wife's highly significant and rather threatening expression meant nothing whatever to him—except that she was looking highly significant and rather threatening. Wisely, he went and got a handkerchief.

Three hours later, Candy came back from church to find Ellen clutching the telephone with a stricken air. She held it out.

"Candy!" Mollie Belle's voice sounded breathless but controlled. "Sugar, could you get a doctor kind of quickly? It's Adam—he was on a ladder and it broke. His collarbone broke, too, I think. And he hit his head."

"Don't move him," Candy said instantly. "I'll get Doctor Blane. I'm coming." She hung up, called Doctor Blane, hung up again and bellowed, "Bill!" Bill, who had come in and was at her elbow, recoiled slightly. "Get some sheets and pillowcases out and put them on my bed, will you? I'm going to get the chicken. And you might put out some pajamas, too, just in case."

"Would it be too much to ask what your plans are?" Bill inquired. "As I understand it, we are about to put a chicken to bed. In my pajamas."

Candy was halfway to the kitchen. "No, no—Adam. In my bed. Maybe I'd better take this dress off. Ellen, where are you?"

Bill ran a hand wildly through his hair. "Listen, what's going on here?"

Candy ignored him. Men were unbelievably slow-witted.

But they had no lunch, and it was long after dark when they finally ate the chicken, in the kitchen. In the unsparing electric light, Candy reflected that they all looked a little worn. An afternoon spent in and out of ambulances and X-ray rooms is not relaxing.

But Adam, pale and handsomely bandaged, was upstairs, in Candy's bed, completely surrounded by hospital corners, ice bags, shaded lights and small hand bells. Bill was to hold the office of night nurse; Candy had moved into the sewing room. Everything was arranged. Everyone was exhausted.

"A broken collarbone, but only a slight concussion," Bill murmured. "Fine thing if he'd been alone."

Candy said suddenly, "Do you think I ought to wire Kate?"

"No," said Bill crossly.

"Of course," said Mollie Belle.

Candy met her dark eyes for a concentrated moment; then she got up and went out to the hall telephone.

Kate's answer arrived next morning, addressed to Mrs. William Stewart:

TERRIBLY SORRY ADAM'S ACCIDENT THANKS FOR YOUR CARE. BACK JUNE 28TH. REGARDS. KATE.

Terribly sorry. Regards. Candy sat in the hall, and looked at the yellow paper long and hard. "The woman's a mackerel," she said at last.

Ellen paused in her carpet sweeping. "What was that, Miss Candy?"

"I said, 'Miss McKettrick is a mackerel.'"

"That one!" said Ellen. "Her. Sure, she'll have his flesh picked off his bones inside of a year."

Candy said nothing. She and Ellen looked at each other.

"Miss Mollie is a good cook, I'm thinking," Ellen observed.

"Wonderful," Candy agreed, and waited.

"Maybe he'd fancy a little something special. I'm busy myself, seeing it's Monday."

MADE BY THE MAKERS OF FAMOUS WOODBURY FACIAL SOAP AND OTHER AIDS TO LOVELINESS

"Yes," said Candy. "Yes, I think you're right, Ellen."

"I'm an old hand," said Ellen ambiguously.

Candy went up the stairs and paused outside her own door. Mollie Belle's voice rippled like gentle water:

"'We try to discover in things endeared to us the spiritual glamour which we ourselves have cast upon them; we are disillusioned, and learn that they are in themselves barren and devoid of the charm which they owed in our minds to the association of certain ideas. . . . And so, if I always imagined the woman I loved ——'"

Proust! thought Candy. My goodness.

At lunch, she said to Mollie Belle, "Darling— Remembrance of Things Past! There are eleven hundred and forty-one pages in the first volume. Does Adam think he's incurable?"

But instead of bursting into a geyser of giggles, Mollie Belle unfolded her napkin in a stately fashion, and said, "He's never read Proust, nor have I. It's very interesting. Rather strange too. Sort of wonderful."

"Interesting, strange and wonderful it may be, but it'll take you the rest of your life to read it aloud," Candy said heartlessly.

Mollie Belle made no answer.

The next day, Adam moved into the sewing room, and the house settled down to its new routine. For the first few days Candy was fully occupied with a convalescent and very regal David; and somehow, during those days, Adam became Mollie Belle's responsibility. She was not at home to George, Fred, Julian, Sam, Mac or Steve. Her voice seemed tireless; she read aloud by the hour. And at Ellen's suggestion, she began to take care of Adam's trays as well. Adam had crème brûlée and special little almond custards; he had ripe Camembert cheese and toasted crackers; he had soft-shell crabs and small hot rolls.

When Mollie Belle was not reading to Adam, she sat with him, and the pattern of their voices was like light and shade: the quick chatter and laughter slowed to murmurs and even long silences, during which Candy sometimes thought that Adam was alone, only to find Mollie Belle sitting by the open window, knitting or writing a letter . . . and then there would be the rise and fall of talk again.

Spring Ensemble

By Bernard D. N. Grebanier

If Love wore flying skirts this springtime weather,
Pert bonnet with a rakish feather,
And dainty pumps upon his little feet,
You'd be the rogue himself, my sweet.

It was late in the afternoon at the end of that week that Kate McKettrick walked into the hall—ten days ahead of time. Candy, who was halfway down the stairs, stopped where she was, frozen. The two stared at each other and Kate's lips were knife-sharp.

"How do you do?" she said. "May I see Adam, please?"

Candy's eyebrows went up; in that moment she looked very like her mother. Her mind was racing. (Get Mollie Belle out of the sewing room? Warn Adam that Kate had come? There was no time for either.) "Of course," she said coolly. "Come up, will you?"

Kate marched up and across the hall. Adam was lying back in Bill's old Morris chair, his hands locked behind his russet head, his eyes on Mollie Belle, who sat by the open window, working on a sweater for David. Adam turned his head; Mollie Belle lifted her eyes, and her fingers stopped. For a moment no one spoke.

Then Kate said, "I've been to the house. I went there from the station. I wonder if you'd be good enough to tell me, Adam, why all the wallpapers have been changed?"

"Certainly," said Adam, with a certain guarded amiability. "I didn't like them."

"You didn't like —— Do you mean to say that you painted my dining room that extraordinary shade of blue and put that paper all over it just because ——"

Adam's mouth set, and his blue eyes were suddenly hard. Candy's stomach felt like an ice cube: in just a minute there was going to be a perfectly ghastly scene. She rushed in swiftly. Too swiftly.

"Kate, listen. Don't be angry. Your red-and-yellow paper—they couldn't give it to you. They wanted Adam to choose some more, so he and Mollie Belle—I mean they did the best they ——"

"Oh," said Kate. "Oh. So Miss Ruxton decorated my house. Why?"

Adam said quietly, "Why not? She was here. She was kind enough to help."

Kate laughed, jarringly, without mirth. "Honestly—it's too absurd! I have only to turn my back and Adam falls off a ladder—a stepladder smack into the hands of the first brainless little female he sees! It's so exactly like you, Adam, so utterly feeble—so corny."

Mollie Belle stood up. She looked very tall. "I think I'll go," she said gently.

"Don't go on my account," said Kate.

"No. I shouldn't." Mollie Belle looked down at her, and her dark eyes were dangerous. "I'm going on Adam's account."

Adam said, "Sit down, Mollie Belle. I want you here."

"I think it would be best ——" Mollie Belle began.

"Do as I tell you!" said Adam. "I don't care what you think would be best. In about thirty seconds that fine continental temper of yours is going to blow its top. Sit down."

Mollie Belle sat down, looking bewitched.

"Now," said Adam, in a businesslike way, "do I understand you, Kate? Do you imply that I am a weak character?"

Kate's eyes glittered. "Yes, darling. Weak and charming."

"Then why," Adam inquired with scientific interest, "do you want to marry me?"

Kate smiled at him like a little cat. "I don't want to marry you, Adam. I'm sorry to make this . . . public announcement, but you rather force me to it, don't you? I haven't the slightest desire to marry you. It frightens me to think how close I came to it. I suppose I have Miss Ruxton to thank for that."

"You may call me Mollie Belle," said Mollie Belle with her softest and most fatuous smile. "It seems kinda silly for us to be so formal."

Kate's fair skin burned in a sudden blush of uncontrollable fury. She turned on Adam. "And don't come back, asking me to change my mind, Adam Campbell. Because I won't, ever."

Adam nodded judicially. "You won't. Good. Then this is good-by, is it, Kate?" he asked.

"Good-by!" said Kate, and went down the stairs and out the front door.

Candy drove to the station and plucked Bill from the express. They drove home very slowly, the long way round so that she could give him a blow-by-blow description of the afternoon. Bill listened with his mouth hanging open, enthralled.

"So Kate marched right downstairs," Candy ended, "and what do you think Mollie Belle did?"

"Poured boiling oil on her head as she went out the door," Bill suggested promptly.

"She picked up that idiotic Proust and went right on reading where she'd left off this morning."

Bill drew a deep sigh and leaned back. "Well, well. People. Amazing things." They drove half a mile in silence. Then he said

. . . these eyes are straining! Struggle-to-see causes them to peer, squint and blink; etches deep frown-lines around them. Clearly, something is wrong!

Are you being fair to your eyes—and to yourself? Your eyes are priceless. And irreplaceable. They're on the job every waking minute of every hour, doing countless intricate seeing tasks for you. They do your reading, working, viewing. They enable you to get the most out of life's pleasures and beauties.

But what do you do for them in return? Do you care for and protect them as your most prized possessions?

Are you forgetting that, with each passing year, those loyal, hard-working eyes of yours age and weaken? Neglected and strained, they can cause untold difficulty—suffering and misery—headaches—backaches . . . and severe nervous disorders.

slowly, "Tell me one thing, will you? Exactly how much of this was your doing?"

"My doing?"

"Oh, I know you asked Mollie Belle to come. Probably by telegraph. I figured that out. But how did you know all this would happen?"

"Well—I didn't," Candy said. "I just thought it would be—nice—if it did. I mean, Adam is such a nice man." She glanced at Bill and he nodded solemnly. "And Kate was all wrong for him." He nodded again. "And Mollie Belle—well, they sort of seemed to fit." Bill nodded once more. "Well—there you are."

"You didn't get rid of Kate? Nor bribe the wallpaper people?"

Candy giggled. "No. Nor inconspicuously saw that stepladder in half."

Bill shook his head. "I don't know how you do it."

"Well, there's one thing I've noticed all my life," Candy said with the air of one about to divulge a cosmic secret. Bill waited expectantly. "If you're on the side of the angels, the angels are sure to be on your side."

Bill grinned. "That's quite a team you've got, darling."

HOW TO THINK A THOUGHT

Einstein's Sidelights on Relativity or one of the works of Sigmund Freud. In the course of any single season of eighteen sessions the members of the group learn to pit one great mind against another—to measure Shakespeare's heroes against Aristotle's definition of the virtuous man, say, or to see how St. Thomas Aquinas' theories of creation stand up to Darwin's Origin of Species.

The result may not be "learning"—nobody connected with these classes finds formal learning nearly as interesting as ideas. But even the ideas of ancient philosophers are never taken over blindly. As the manual for Great Books discussion leaders points out:

"The mind is not improved by stuffing it with ready-made conclusions of others, even though those others may be our betters; it is improved only by increasing its own power to handle ideas in order to arrive at its conclusions. The great books are simply used as tools, the best and sharpest tools, for this purpose."

Such a puff for the classics might be taken as the statement of just another educator, trying to push his wares. It might—if it were not for the surprising effects the Great Books have had on the men and women in Indianapolis who have been exposed to them for even a few months.

These people report that they get so "wound up" during the class discussions that they can't immediately relax; at first, some of the members of every group reported taking sleeping pills after the sessions. Most of them have now developed, instead, the practice of going off in groups to a neighborhood drugstore or café for a half hour's "unwinding." Here the members thrash out the questions raised but not exhausted in class. Here—as a natural by-product of this intensive, friendly struggle of mind—new friendships arise.

There is one Indianapolis group meeting at the central library—a section of town surrounded by many lodging houses. Young women who joined this class because they live near by report that the "lonely girl in the big city" problem has been happily solved for them by contacts they have formed at Great Books meetings. In this same class are a dozen young veterans, somewhat sobered by the war; they tend to agree with the ex-marine taxi driver who says, "A lot of us began to wonder about a good many basic questions overseas. Why were we out there, anyway? And what do wars ever accomplish? The Great Books don't give me all the answers; but they help me to do my wondering more clearly. That's something."

Testimony on the effect of the Great Books in the home has come from several sources. A local clubwoman—who attends one of the neighborhood groups with her husband told me: "The real excitement begins when you've read half a dozen classics and begin pitting one against the others. My husband woke me from a sound sleep the other night to ask, 'Jane, do you think Socrates would have signed the Declaration of Independence?'"

Clarence Moore, a colored group leader, and his wife "talk about something that came out of a Great Book every time we sit down to a meal," he says. "It's exciting to be able to try out your new ideas, every day, on someone who's reading and thinking the same things you are. It gives any marriage a second wind."

The Moores had a violent week of disputation last year over Hamlet before attending the class: Mrs. Moore thought that the Prince was wishy-washy, indecisive and pretty much a jerk; Mr. Moore felt that Hamlet had been a wise, strong, patient man, capable of withholding action until the appropriate moment should arrive. After the two-hour session they came out and found that they had completely changed positions; then they argued, in reverse, for another week.

So far there have been no Great Books marriages in Indianapolis—though the older Chicago groups report several cases of such lifelong romances begun at the sessions. But members of all the classes report a change in their social life, as a result of the shared experiences. "And one thing," says a department-store girl clerk who found several beaus in these meetings, "one thing about going out with a Great Books member, you never wonder what you'll talk about. Both of you are crazy to spill the bright things you would have said at the last meeting—except that you didn't think of them until the next day."

Many a man who speaks humbly of his own insignificance gets angry if other people refer to it.
—HOME TALK.

Sometimes lifelong beliefs are mangled and destroyed in the course of these discussions. The most dramatic change to date is that of a declared Communist who joined one of the Mortimer Adler-led groups in Chicago; after two years of tussling with the Great Books, he joined the Dominican order! Less sensational changes of attitude are commonplace: one Indianapolis factory manager had stanchly refused to permit unionization in his plant; after a year of the Great Books he invited the steelworkers' union to come in and start a local.

"It was Aristotle that did it," he says. "There's no more useful guide to making business decisions than Aristotle's categories; I use them almost every day."

Lynn Williams, an Indianapolis industrialist who has had much to do with importing the Great Books from Chicago, feels that businessmen get more out of the sessions than any other group; he is the leader of a lively class which meets in the outskirts of the city. Its personnel includes the president of a silk company, four executives of manufacturing firms, a mail carrier, an engineer, a lawyer, a schoolteacher, a banker, a chemist, an accountant, a grocer, a labor organizer and a dozen housewives.

"The members of my class," says Mr. Williams, "lead very different lives during the working day. So, in fact, do most of my own friends. Businessmen have become specialists in the last few decades; we get to know more and more about less and less, so that the problems we consider all day long are technical matters, of no interest to our friends or to our wives. Since we can't talk to one another about our work, most American businessmen talk to each other about the headlines or the football scores, or kill

Which Twin has the Toni?

(And which has the beauty shop permanent? See answer below)

to be a TONI Home Permanent

You'll thank the lucky day you give yourself a Toni Home Permanent. For you'll discover an amazingly easy and inexpensive way to keep your hair always at its loveliest. Beautifully groomed with deep, luxurious waves...silky soft and natural looking. Because Toni Creme Lotion waves your hair permanently, but gently . . . leaves it frizz-free and easy to manage from the start.

Toni works like a charm on any hair that will take a permanent—even baby-fine hair. That's why every hour of the day another 1,000 women use Toni Home Permanent.

No trick at all to giving yourself a Toni . . . just three simple steps:

1. Roll your hair up on curlers, and dab on Toni Creme Lotion.

2. Tie a turban round your head and relax for 2 to 3 hours. (No sitting under a hot dryer.)

3. Saturate each curl with Toni Neutralizer and rinse.

Your Toni Cold Wave is finished . . . it's beautiful . . . and will last as long as a $15 permanent.

time by playing bridge. The Great Books don't care about what your work may be; they cut under the superficial differences between us and show us how to talk about the things in which all of us are gravely interested."

This suburban group meets at seven-thirty in a schoolroom, with the usual U-shaped table, ash trays, pipes in evidence.

"Mr. Mitchell," asks the leader, "have you lived a tragic life?"

The plump businessman looks shocked. "Why, no."

"Well, then, why not? How have you avoided it? Everybody in this play, Oedipus Rex, led a tragic life. How did you escape?"

"I was lucky," says Mr. Mitchell.

"Well, are the people you know lucky too? Are tragedies just things that happen to Greeks?"

"There were the Okies from the dust bowl," someone suggests.

"O. K. How do the Okies' problems differ from those of Oedipus?"

"Money was the least of Oedipus' worries," chimes in a girl from the assembly line. "He kept his wealth."

"Right. Oedipus always had his three squares a day. Yet his life was tragic. How come?"

"He didn't adjust," offers the class expert on Freud—a physician. "Oedipus was a neurotic, and he was bound to get into trouble, no matter what the events of his life happened to be."

"Hey, wait a minute," cuts in an engineer. "Oedipus had quite a lot to adjust to. Do you think anybody—you, for instance—would just get a divorce from Jocasta and check the whole thing off to experience?"

"Why not?" the physician replied. "As a matter of fact, Oedipus never would have got into this jam if he'd let well enough alone. His curiosity got the better of him. He began nosing around to solve a lot of mysteries in his life better left unsolved."

Man is a puny fellow at best, and the only way he can keep going is by reminding himself constantly of his successes and forgetting his failures. This simple and ancient truth, which was lost sight of for a while, was rediscovered in the twentieth century by people like Coué, who called it the new psychology and retailed it at half a guinea a lesson.

—JOHN D. SHERIDAN: I Can't Help Laughing (Talbot Press, Ltd.).

"Well, but isn't curiosity a good thing?" This from a salesman. "If scientists didn't nose around, we'd never discover anything new."

"Yes, but Oedipus wasn't any scientist. The kind of thing he was doing was more in line with being a Peeping Tom."

"Being a Peeping Tom is the beginning of wanting to be educated, maybe," says one of the housewives.

THE talk is off to a lively start. The men and women seated around the table include a wide variety of types and ages. Their religions and interests are by no means the same. By the end of the two hours they are arguing eagerly on the question of punishment and guilt. Oedipus didn't know he had done an evil act; was he guilty, anyway? Oedipus sought his own punishment; was this a morbid act, or did he have a lively sense of justice? Would he have been a happy man if he had lived on unpunished?

"Children are disturbed if you let them off punishment when they've been bad," a young mother suggests.

"Do you mean mercy is a dirty trick?" someone else wants to know.

In the neighborhood classes, as in those held in the libraries and clubs, age makes no difference among the members. Young couples hire "sitters" so they can come and look for some inkling of life's meaning to hand on to their children. Men and women in the fifties show themselves quite as much at sea as to just what their lives mean. Ages range from eighteen to sixty-nine; the majority of the members are in their thirties. Sex makes no difference, except that women are less shy than men in the early days of the course and provide most of the ice-breaking answers. So far as age, health, sex and occupation go, the classics have proved a great democratizer.

This is true even of the factory and business-firm classes.

"In any office group you start t[o] with the file clerks and such scared-[to] death of the big boss," one of the [g]roup leaders explains. "Then, about the [se]cond session, the big boss gets himself o[ut] limb in the discussion, and some smar[t] him right off. The file clerks inwardly [re]joice. A few minutes later someone saws [off] too. Then they loosen up and rel[ax] realize that everybody is on the same [le]vel of crushing inferiority compared w[ith] authors of these books. We all look s[o] fore the year's over, and so we all b[egin] like each other more."

CONTROVERSIES in the classes are co[m]mon but friendly—the leaders have been [ch]osen for quick-wittedness and poise, but [al]so the ability to prevent any argumen[t] from developing into a bitter free-for-all. The leaders' educational background is not [ne]cessarily impressive; Milton Mayer, wh[o] conducts more sessions than anyone else, [has] never even graduated from college. [Mrs.] Buell, one of the most successful [group] leaders in Indianapolis, has been an [actress] on Broadway and in a radio soap-ope[ra] program; her present occupation of hou[sewife] can, she finds, be neatly combined [with] deep interest in the Great Books or [be]cause her husband likes them too. (In [fact] all the Indianapolis groups, husban[d] and wife attend together; class hours fro[m] to 9:30 at night make this possible.)

Women have been responsible for [many] of the classic wisecracks which spread [from] one Great Books group to another. The[se] include the comment [Mrs. Buell] made while a group was reading Li[vy] tius—that "Lo[ng] what makes the [sun] stand still"; and [the] summary of M[ach]velli's teachings: "[Do] unto others as [they] think they would [have] unto you, but [do] first." A lady, [ar]pressed to defend [Oe]dipus' character, po[int]s out that "At least, he kept his incest i[n the] family." One reader of St. Augustine, [chal]lenged to define God, said, "First you i[mag]ine an old man with a beard. Then you [take] away the beard. Then you take away [the] old man. What's left is God."

Such witty summaries, regrettably, usually occur after the session is over, accor[ding] to most of the members. In the hou[r of] preparation for the course, readers are [all] busy making an earnest effort to grasp [the] author's meaning to play many tricks [with] it. The assignments are short—thirty p[ages] perhaps, out of the center of a volum[e of] philosophy—but they do require hard [con]centration. One housewife admits, "I [left] my Plato propped against my washer [for] days at a time." One chap follows the irre[gu]lar practice of tearing pages out of the ch[eap] paper-bound editions and carrying t[hem] about with him, to study during odd [mo]ments of the day. But most of the mem[bers] find time to do their reading by passing [up] activities they never really enjoyed, [in a] way: dozing over the radio during a dull [eve]ning, going to a third-rate movie, rea[ding] trashy novels.

"I will never go back to gin rummy aga[in]," says one pharmacist firmly. "This is [so] much fun."

There is no real reason why he ever sh[ould] go back. The Indianapolis courses are p[at]terned on the pioneer groups in Chic[ago] whose members have worked toget[her] through so many classics that they have r[ead] developed a kind of common language [all] their own. After a few years of argumen[ta]tion on the basic problems, the memb[ers] have actually reached an agreement on so[me] of them in every course. No member o[f a] fifth-year group, for instance, would dre[am] of maintaining that one system of moral[s] just as good as another, "once you get u[sed] to it." Most members eventually co around to a belief in a universal moral sense, inborn in men. The last holdout against any degree of free will generally gives in during the second year. And most members of third-year classes would be charmed to prove to you that applied Marxism must lead to tyranny.

But the range of differences in viewpoints in even the oldest Chicago groups remains wide. Dante's conception of heaven was rejected, with horror, by most of the businessmen at a recent fourth-year session because it was too quiet. "That's not the American way," as a cloak-and-suit manufacturer sternly remarked. Most of the women present thought Dante sounded fine.

But none of the Indianapolis readers have been at the Great Books long enough to have had their original beliefs shaken to a profound degree. At a recent session—largely attended by Indianapolis businessmen and their wives—the leader tossed out a provocative icebreaker on Plato:

"Do you think that professional economists—Raymond Moley, for instance—know more about economics than you do?"

"Yes."

"So you think President Roosevelt was right to get a Brain Trust and let it determine our economic policies?"

"No!"

"But you would not insist that you ought to have a voice in writing your own medical prescription, if you had faith in your doctor, would you? Isn't that Plato's point?"

"Yes."

"Well, then, Mr. Cross, if Mr. Moley was a greater economic expert than you, why do you object to trusting him to run the country?"

From this kind of rough-and-tumble, some members emerge, in the first months, with their old beliefs shaken and nothing much except a great confusion in their place. The commonest complaint about the courses is that the leaders don't tell the classes "what we've learned." This charge delights them. They point out that their sole job is to ask questions—and this proves so exhausting that two of them are required in each class, to spell each other. This is known as "the Socratic method" and, in the words of a member of one class, "is undoubtedly the reason why the Athenians killed Socrates."

Timid, culture-hungry men and women have protested to Milton Mayer that they want to be "told more." One of them pitifully pleaded with him, "We're not great thinkers."

"You will be," said Mayer grimly.

Like the questions of all the successful leaders, most of his are designed to warm up the talk and to break through the reserve of moderns who have become too polite to argue. His stark refusal to lecture fits in well with Doctor Hutchins' remark:

"I'll take a smart plumber as a group leader any day in preference to a professor who has fallen into the bad habit of telling his pupils what to think. The initial period of confusion in these classes doesn't last long; people examine what they have been told all their lives and reject the portion that won't stand the test. But the beliefs they choose to keep are numerous and, from now on, they have the pleasant sense that these things have been tested and challenged and survived."

Americans are better prepared to defend democracy after being asked, "Do you think your baby was born brighter than the child of feeble-minded parents? Yes? Then isn't the Declaration of Independence being silly when it says all men are created free and equal? Well, why not?"

They read the newspapers in a new light when they have discussed, "Is the Conference of Foreign Ministers being run by Machiavelli's methods? Just how does it differ?" Or "Do you learn anything useful from history, or is it just a fancy piece of snobbery, like a mink coat?" Or "Is the Declaration of Independence propaganda?" Or, in a session on Greek philosophy, "Would you rather have been an inmate of Buchenwald or one of the Nazi guards?"

Specialists in Junior Health Shoes Since 1888

Because religious leaders believe that it is healthy for people of diverse interests to meet and debate the ultimate questions of life, the Great Books courses in Indianapolis have been sponsored by the local Federation of Churches. The city's library system has played an active part of providing meeting places and organizing neighborhood groups. The school system and the leading newspapers have given the movement its blessing. With this backing and a long waiting list, the sponsors expect great things to come in the next few years.

Indianapolis is merely setting a pattern to be followed in other towns. Several Midwest cities already have programs organized along similar lines—altogether, more than five thousand persons are members of groups in Chicago, Indianapolis, Detroit and Cleveland. In Baltimore and Washington, helped by St. John's College, the libraries and the more progressive trade-unions have joined forces to push the formation of Great Books courses there. The American Legion and the CIO are both discussing wide-scale plans. City fathers from St. Louis, Milwaukee, Boston, Los Angeles and New York have asked that the Chicago pioneers send someone to help establish Great Books courses for them. This organization work will be pushed in 1947 and 1948—it is known to the exultant Chicago group of founders as "putting our show on the road."

The latest extension of this militant scholarship was the opening in January of teacher-training classes—each designed to produce two-man leadership for twenty or thirty groups—in Portland, Spokane, Seattle, Tacoma and Vancouver under joint auspices of the University of Chicago and local library systems. Milton Mayer filled the role of Apostle in the Northwest.

How far the movement will spread remains a matter of sharp debate, even among its pioneers. Doctor Adler points out that anyone with an Intelligence Quotient of 100 can read and enjoy the Great Books (colleges don't accept applicants with I.Q.'s below 110). He sees no reason why fifteen million Americans should not someday be enrolled in such courses—to remain members for the length of their days. Other sponsors believe that if the courses spread too fast they will attract too many faddists, who will push the whole thing to oblivion when the bubble bursts.

BUT no one can deny that on the desk of Cyril Houle—the University of Chicago Dean in charge of Great Books advice to out-of-towners—there are inquiries from 46 colleges, 77 school systems and 228 community organizations of other kinds. Nor can anyone gainsay the fact that the Great Books cells multiply rapidly: two years ago only 165 Chicagoans were members of any group; today there are over 2800 readers in that city alone. And over 90 per cent of the people in the off-campus groups last year joined another for a second season; members tend to leave a Great Books course only when they have decided to launch out and become a leader of one of their own. Since neither tuition nor teaching salaries are involved, those who lead groups do it because they find it more fun to sit at the head of a table and ask questions than along the rim and try to answer them. "A kind of natural selection operates to put most people in the role where they will have the most fun," says Milton Mayer.

Certainly fun is what the Great Books enthusiasts all stress. Yet—even if they resist admitting it—the members learn things from these heated discussions that hav livened their nights. If nothing else hap they at least make the discovery re mended by Stringfellow Barr to his u graduates at St. John's College: "Tha world was not discovered yesterday, n Fifth Avenue."

MEN who have pitted their twen century brains against Aristotle (and pinned firmly to the mat by an intelli that lived 2300 years before the da radar) no longer exaggerate the achieve of the mechanical age to the degree they did. Men who have found St. Th Aquinas' arguments for the existence o as persuasive as a theorem in geometr less sure that reason has supplanted for the rest of history. Men and wome once assumed democracy and individual were important only because they had told so at the age of eight, have learn good many of the arguments against American ideals; thus they now know the Founding Fathers preferred our sy to a limited monarchy or a landed tocracy. People who entered the cours the belief that Freud had made self-dece the only modern sin have found that political scientists urged self-interes a sound basis for perfect state.

You can mak maximum claim fo Great Books m ment, and say, Doctor Hutchins i more elated mo that "through t courses we can ho realize Thomas Je son's ideal of an ele ate educated to be to think clearly o the questions fa their Government. you can side with cheerful skeptics Milton Mayer, claims, mildly, "the members p ably have a better than they used to l listening to Jack Be every night."

But whatever final result, you're to hear more about Great Books. In fact—if you live in a city, and don't watch yourself—in ano year or so you'll possibly be reading th

Baby's thinner skin needs gentlest care

here's how to guard him from a daily discomfort

From the top of his head to his little pink toes, your baby's skin is fragile as a flower. It actually is thinner than a grownup's.

That's why it's so necessary to keep him dry, and to rinse every trace of irritating soap from his diapers. And for the very same reason, you should select his bathroom tissue with the utmost care.

THREE 'MUSTS' FOR BABY'S BATHROOM COMFORT

Your baby's bathroom tissue should always provide three things. Real softness, so it cannot chafe, or irritate... high absorbency... and sufficient strength to prevent tearing and shredding.

More mothers are finding this ideal combination of qualities in Scott than in any other brand.

ScotTissue is "old linen" soft for comfort, wonderfully absorbent, yet strong enough for thorough cleansing. These qualities will be a great help, too, in training your baby to proper toilet habits later on.

HERE'S HOW TO REDUCE THE DIAPER LAUNDERING PROBLEM

For babies up to 6 months, try crumpling up 20 or more sheets of soft, absorbent ScotTissue and inserting in the diapers. You will have more dry diapers... less staining. Simply flush away the wet or soiled tissue. It's by far the most economical way to keep baby "comfy" and save on laundry, too. If you can't get ScotTissue every time, it's because the demand is so great.

New ScotTissue is softer than ever

"Childhood Constipation"

...give Fletcher's Castoria!

"It's the laxative made especially for infants and children."

WHEN your baby's happy smile disappears . . . when he's fussy and peevish merely because of "Childhood Constipation" . . . why not be wise and do this:

Give him Fletcher's Castoria. It works thoroughly and effectively. Yet it's so gentle, it won't upset his sensitive digestive system.

Why it's right for children

Unlike adult laxatives—which may be too harsh—Fletcher's Castoria is specially made for children. It contains no harsh drugs, and will not cause griping or discomfort.

And Fletcher's Castoria has such a pleasing taste that children really love it. They take it gladly, without any struggle. Caution: Use only as directed.

Babies by Our Bedsides

By Rosalind Bacon Hall

MOTHERS all over the country will be interested to hear that a few of our most understanding doctors are planning to reverse the hospital maternity practice of many years and bring our babies back to our bedsides.

The idea will be as new and strange to most mothers today as it was at first to me. When I brought my first baby home from the hospital, I took it for granted we should be separated, just as the hospital had ruled from the beginning.

It was my mother who was uneasy to find her new grandson off in a room by himself at such a tender age. "I had you right by my bed where I could reach you any time, day or night," she protested. Possibly I looked amused. Old-fashioned . . . unhygienic . . . too protective . . . and rather a bother, were the modern-young-mother thoughts that ran through my head.

Yet, two years later, I brought my second baby straight to my bedside after our eight days of hospital isolation, and there he stayed until he slept through the night without extra nourishment. Far from being a nuisance, he was welcome! In fact, it was so good to have him there that I would like to join the doctors in their new plan and have my next baby by my bedside from the very beginning.

After all, that is Nature's way. We have departed from that natural course only in the past twenty-five years as it has become the style to be delivered in the hospital. It is true that childbirth was never safer in the United States than it is today. But the most recent opinion does not attribute that improvement solely to hospital care, but to a better understanding and application of preventive care and hygiene to childbirth wherever it occurs, from hospitals to rural-nursing deliveries.

Nor is the particular type of hospital care that you and I know, that separates mother and baby from each other, entirely responsible for our safety. Before World War II, the maternal and infant mortality rates of England and Scandinavia were being lowered as strikingly as ours, yet they still kept babies, even the hospital-born, beside their mothers' bedsides.

PRENATAL classes give mothers the facts about babies and childbirth, and facts lessen fear. But even the best class or book has little power to prevent the worst fear of all, the modern mother's fear of herself. How had she expected motherhood to feel—a sweet, relaxed contentment as her reward for the long months of waiting and the trials of labor? Here she lies on her hospital bed making a mighty effort to glow in motherly fashion, yet churning inside with a storm of new feeling. No one could forecast this emotional turmoil, for she could not understand it until she had experienced it.

Now that she is a mother, she discovers there are two new persons to manage: her baby—and herself.

There was my hospital roommate, for instance. She had counted dearly on nursing her baby, but discovered that she could not do so. She spent one long day weeping. She asked for her baby, she pleaded to go home, she prayed a bit, then she wept quietly some more. The hospital did not trust a new mother to give her baby a bottle, and my roommate saw her new baby just twenty minutes out of every twenty-four hours.

Her tears were not unusual, the nurse told me. "They're all likely to have a day like that with the first baby," she confided. How well I knew, for I too felt a ragged need to cry. "Postpartum depression" is the name the doctors give it.

Neither my roommate nor I suspected we felt as we did. Who were we to que hospital procedures? Neither of us kne a certainty what would quiet our bab they cried, and we were relieved to have in the hands of skillful nurses. We were to have others handle everything. And we were miserable

It was the second baby who taugh why. Attuned to the needs of one ba mother has learned the meaning of a b cries. As she lies in bed listening to the d wails of the brood in the nursery, th anguished note above all the rest mu that of her own baby wanting to be fed uneasiness is far more acute than th the bewildered new mother, yet more borne because she knows its cause—and she will do when she is once home. The mothers have done from time immem she will simply feed and soothe her TELLING of her feelings toward her baby, one mother admitted, "Whe practical nurse left me with that scre baby, even after four weeks, I couldn' it!" Said another, "Why, I never real joyed my first baby until he was six m old!" Yet both are intelligent mother truly wanted their babies.

This frigidity toward one's baby—one had expected to love him dearly—rifying to a mother. She blames hers being unmotherly, she feels resentfu guilty. Very humanly she can twist the for it all to her husband or to motherh—not to her own ignorance or the unf system of hospital care that has exagge this. Her next step is to lose self-co Emotion comes to rule the handling baby, and whatever basic common sen was endowed with is canceled.

Of course there is always the baby to turn to for help. But even the wis pediatricians can do no more than mother what methods she can try. She learn from her baby which ones work the sooner a mother learns the ways baby, the sooner she will feel at hom him and enjoy him.

And what of the other member partnership—the baby himself? How this separation affect him? Psychiatris us that his needs are few, a continuatio an outgrowth of the kind of life he liv fore birth. He should have warmth closeness to his mother, and nourish when he says he wants it.

But witness how oblivious of these is the modern hospital. There the baby moved to an impersonal nursery. He handled between feedings only for diaper change. He is held in human only as he goes to an efficient bath and he is fed by his mother for five or six t minute feeding periods daily. If he is the nursery, as so many babies are these a bottle is easily propped by his mouth common but not universal resort of pressed hospital nurses. And if he aw in the nursery, quite likely he will cry the scheduled hour is reached, th again and again in his need for food by tem that has neither time nor inclinat treat babies as individual persons.

It is this hospital routine that preve many modern mothers from nursing babies. A study of nursing made in E by Dr. Merrell Middlemore indicates single nursing period, enjoyable t mother and baby, was the best insuran nursing continue. But here is what h in our hospitals:

One infant is trundled to his moth voice hoarse from screaming. Imme his mother is nervous, so she handles the baby badly. And he is frantic himself by now, and not easily taught to nurse. After a few minutes, when his hunger pains are quiet, he may fall asleep without his full quota of breast milk. Or at another time he arrives sleeping all too soundly. No amount of toe tickling, cheek stroking or sole slapping will rouse him, since he cried so long in the nursery that they finally gave him a bottle. Obviously he will awaken there soon again, to be given another one. In either case the nursing period has been far from enjoyable to mother or baby. Precious mother's milk has gone unused, and so her supply dwindles instead of increasing as it must to satisfy the appetite of a growing baby.

Some doctors estimate that only 40 per cent of our mothers nowadays nurse their babies for as long as a few months. Some put the figure even lower. Yet they say that approximately 90 per cent of women are physically capable of it. Happily for the baby, the modern formula is nearly foolproof. But just the same, we are told by authorities on every side that there is no food that can match breast milk, advantage for advantage, during the first months of a baby's life.

We know now that the new baby rarely conforms to any schedule if the choice is left to him entirely. One pioneering mother, Frances Simsarian, offers convincing evidence of this. Mrs. Simsarian, her obstetrician and pediatrician worked out an arrangement in which she kept her two babies by her own bedside in the hospital, so that she could feed them whenever they were hungry. She reported on this experiment in two issues of Child Study: "On the whole they wanted to nurse much more frequently than the traditional six feedings. Sometimes they nursed for a long time, sometimes they fell asleep after a few minutes." The feeding record of the first baby, a nine-pounder, follows: "He would nurse for three to seven or ten minutes, then fall asleep, to awaken shortly and demand further feeding. At other times he nursed phenomenally long periods of forty-five and, on one occasion, sixty minutes. . . . Sometimes he took three times as much at one feeding as at others. . . . He took fifty-four feedings during his first week, from three on his first day to eleven on his fifth. Toward the end of the second week, he settled down to six feedings a day." It is plain that such erratic feeding schedules, differing for each individual infant, would throw our present hospital system into complete confusion.

But if the baby were by his mother's bedside he could be fed when he needed it. A mother is not ill after normal childbirth, and the small effort of reaching to the crib and drawing her baby to her is entirely within the average woman's ability after a day or so, surely by the time the baby begins to need frequent feedings. In this way the quantity of milk increases as swiftly as possible, and much of the discomfort and pain often connected with the first weeks of feeding a baby can be avoided. Babies are satisfied quickly when put on their own schedules and need do little crying. Mrs. Simsarian and another pioneering mother, Roberta White Taylor, testify; and wards full of mothers and babies in Scandinavia are quieter than American hospitals where babies are shut off in the nursery. Although it may be more physically fatiguing to have the baby by one's side, the nervous tension is not there. Far from being a burden, the baby's presence is a kind of healing.

Then why, if the modern hospital care is so mistakenly planned for genuine human needs, is not something done to change it? There are two choices: to return to home delivery, or to improve the hospital care we give mothers and babies. Probably it is wisest to accept the trend to hospitals, though many of us have seriously discussed returning to our homes a day or so after delivery to avoid NEEDED URGENTLY BY YOUR BABY is Vitamin D, the essential factor which helps build and strengthen his bones and teeth, and which is provided by Squibb Cod Liver Oil. In spring and in summer, as long as your baby is growing, he must have Vitamin D every day, physicians are careful to point out. Get Squibb Cod Liver Oil for your baby now, and give it regularly.

TODAY'S CHILDREN SET RECORD! Less than 25 years ago, three out of every four preschool children developed weak, imperfect bones. What a difference today, when four out of five have bones and teeth that are "perfect" or nearly so! Regular use of Vitamin D helps to account for this change. Give your baby this help. Two cities will soon see a new plan for maternity care in its experimental stages. Dr. John Montgomery, a leading pediatrician of Detroit, will devote one entire floor of Wayne University's new Medical Center to rooms where mother and baby will live together. In Washington, D. C., Dr. Preston A. McLendon is planning a similar type of care for a new maternity unit to be built for George Washington University Hospital.

Now in theory we mothers may agree that the rooming-in plan might be good for us and our babies. But would we actually like it? The nation-wide response to Mrs. Simsarian's experiment has been very favorable. And as an illustration of how many mothers feel, Doctor Montgomery tells this story:

A pediatrician was talking with a mother who was soon to be confined with her second child.

"If you could have your baby by your bedside at the hospital," he asked, "would you like it?"

"Oh, I couldn't stand all that crying."

"But if you could take him up and feed him as often as he needed it?"

Her face lighted up. "Why, then he needn't cry. I should love it!"

But how safe is this plan? Does it not open a greater chance for infection to have babies with their mothers? Doctor Montgomery believes the rooming-in plan can be fully as safe as the present one. Asks Doctor McLendon, "Why should the average baby be 'mass-isolated' for eight to twelve days, and then—without reason—be completely unprotected in the bedroom at home? Has the baby so suddenly and dramatically become immune to infection, physically and psychologically mature? Has the mother suddenly become a capable and sensible person, only the day before just a moronic incubator?"

> It is a rare thing to win an argument and the other fellow's respect at the same time. —Tuam Herald.

The most dangerous disease to the newborn, and particularly difficult to control in the hospital nursery, is infant enteritis. But it does not occur in completely breast-fed babies. Since the rooming-in plan should bring breast milk to a possible 90 per cent of all babies, only the remaining 10 per cent would need special protection. Impetigo, long dreaded before penicillin, is far less likely to occur when babies are cared for separately. The story is told of the Scottish nurse in one of our American hospitals who reported in great agitation that an infant in the nursery had smallpox. In her country, where the babies stay with their mothers, she had never seen a case of impetigo!

Obviously the rooming-in plan must limit visitors, for health reasons. But the baby's father is not to be ranked as a visitor in Doctor Montgomery's plan. On the contrary, he is to be especially welcomed and brought into the baby-care picture from the start. He can see the baby fed, bathed and dressed. Before the mother and baby return home, he can join them in a "family room" especially set up for training in the home care of the infant.

And the expense of this rooming-in plan? Certainly it would be more than present average practice. Yet it is hardly fair to compare the two in cost, since the present system is so inadequate in many ways. Doctor Montgomery asserts that the rooming-in plan will actually cost less than any other hospital arrangement that gives optimum care to mother and baby.

"But it is not a question of cost," declares Doctor Montgomery. "It is a question of giving the kind of care to mothers and babies that will send them off to a flying start in making a happy family. In this we can afford nothing less than the best."

I think I speak for many American mothers when I say that the rooming-in plan will fully justify itself simply by restoring the rightness and goodness and naturalness to motherhood. THE END

mmunizations in Childhood

BY DR. HERMAN N. BUNDESEN
President, Chicago Board of Health

LY a generation ago, mothers of oung children lived in constant fear smallpox and diphtheria. Terrible idemics of these diseases used to very community of many young often whole families of youngsters wiped out as parents and doctor ed helplessly. Yet now, just a few later, mothers scarcely have to about these infections. Modern ne has given every mother the of having her child protected t such killers; as a rule, only chilf unknowing or careless parents can allpox or diphtheria today.

addition to these safeguards, chilan be protected against whooping one of the contagious diseases most deadly to tiny youngsters and infants, and against tetanus, the dreaded "lockjaw," which sometimes results from punctures made by contaminated nails and other common childhood wounds. Moreover, children going to camp, or to places where water and food sources are not sure to be safe, can be given vaccines providing temporary freedom from the threat of typhoid and paratyphoid fever.

going painful and deadly ailments if parents will avail themselves in time of the immunization measures science has provided.

Other procedures, while not always preventive, can lessen the symptoms of children exposed to measles or scarlet fever. These not only make the sick child less uncomfortable, but also reduce the chances that dangerous complications or aftereffects will result. If given early enough after exposure, the measles may be warded off altogether in a number of cases.

Yet in spite of these striking advances, children still die every year from the preventable diseases. Others suffer needlessly because their parents have not made use of the disease-fighting weapons science has given them. Parents who do not place their babies under a doctor's supervision and follow his advice explicitly when inoculations are due and recommended, are taking inexcusable risks with health and welfare, if not with life itself.

Immunization is made possible by the fact that when human beings and animals are attacked by infectious organisms, they develop in themselves protective substances called antibodies. With certain diseases, those who survive one attack are henceforth protected from it by the antibodies they themselves have manufactured.

SCIENCE merely makes use of Nature's own mechanism to build immunity to these diseases without forcing children to endure the dangers and discomforts of serious illness. Vaccines, to name one preventive measure such as those used to ward off typhoid fever and whooping cough), are prepared from dead bacteria of these diseases. When the prepared vaccines are injected into healthy children, the bacteria, though harmless themselves, still stimulate in the child's body the manufacture of antibodies—thus furnishing an advance guard to fend off germs when exposure to disease occurs.

Diphtheria toxoid, which is similar in the way it acts, is prepared from the bacteria themselves as well as from the broth in which they are grown. Antitoxins and convalescent serums used in the prevention and treatment of certain other diseases are made from the blood serum of animals, or of human beings who have had the disease and whose blood, therefore, already contains antibodies.

Every mother today owes her child immunization against smallpox, diphtheria and whooping cough.

THE use of other immunization procedures for other diseases may vary among different groups of children in different localities, but these three, at least, should be done routinely as part of every baby's care. Here are the essential facts for mothers to remember:

1. Make sure the baby is vaccinated for smallpox by the time he is a year old, and better yet before he is three or four months old. The doctor will do this by puncturing or scratching the skin surface of the upper arm or leg with the vaccination material. In three or four, up to seven, days, the area of the vaccination will become red and possibly swollen and tender if the vaccination is going to "take." The inflammation will subside gradually soon after it appears, and the child's discomfort is rarely serious. To help make it certain that the protection will be lasting throughout childhood, smallpox vaccination should be repeated when the child enters school.

2. Have diphtheria immunization injection started by the time the baby is about eight to nine months old. If this has been neglected during the first year of life, diphtheria injections should be administered right away. If you have not kept track of the time your baby received these immunizations, call or write to the doctor; his record will show whether or not your child has received this needed protection. Most doctors give diphtheria injections in series of either two or three treatments, at intervals one month apart. Others may give the injections a week apart. The needle is slipped painlessly into the muscles of the upper arm, which may become slightly tender for a day or two.

3. Whooping-cough vaccine, given in a series of three injections one month apart, is often started by three or four months of age, since it is during the first few months of life that whooping cough takes its greatest toll. If the whooping-cough vaccine is given this early, the baby may not be completely protected, so at eight months the doctor may then give whooping-cough vaccine and diphtheria toxoid together in an alum-precipitated mixture, which has been proved most effective. Since these are given when the baby is about eight months old, the doctor may again wish to give a reinforcing injection after three or four years, but the reinforcing dose always should be given by the time the child enters school. Sometimes the diphtheria-whooping-cough mixture can be combined with a third ingredient, tetanus toxoid. If this is not done, the tetanus toxoid is often given at the age of two or three years, when active youngsters start to play outdoors and are subject to cuts contaminated with dirt containing tetanus spores.

As the child grows up and exposure to measles, scarlet fever and other contagious diseases inevitably occurs, the doctor may suggest immunizing injections for a child exposed to measles or scarlet fever. These will not necessarily keep the child from catching the diseases, but will usually at least lessen their severity if given early enough.

Always, mother should keep her own permanent records of every immunization. Often the doctor who cared for the children when they were babies is in another city or is otherwise inaccessible. The family records will save many anxious moments and possibly prevent a tragic mistake. THE END

But I hungered to go to New York and when I got past my eighteenth birthday and inherited the money my Grandfather Ames left me, I decided to go.

Mother said it was too dangerous for a young girl all alone, but dad said a good girl is a good girl anywhere and if she's not then being at home wouldn't make her any better. My three brothers who are much older agreed with dad and my younger brother Billy who is in the Navy since his seventeenth birthday said it was a swell idea. Since mother is always influenced by what the men of the family think, she agreed. And so I came.

Mother or dad or one of my brothers would have said, "When you get to New York, call up Elly. Here's her phone number." But not having any phone they'd have to write and people who are visiting don't find time to write. So you see not having a phone has been a terrible handicap to my social life and to a girl of my age that is very important, for after all, if you don't get to meet people how are you ever going to meet the man?

Decker gestured with a lovely manicured hand. I could see a diamond glitter in the ring he wears on his left pinkie. "To be shut away from the sight of man in this dark cavern."

I said, "Oh," and I laughed. It is a lot like a dungeon with all those blank-faced files and dull walls.

DECKER said, "Something awful, I bet. But I suppose the young prince comes every day at five-thirty and releases you from the spell. There is a young prince?" I just shook my red wave and Decker said, "No young man?"

I said, "None. I don't know any people in New York. I've only been here three months. From Iowa."

Decker lifted his dark brows. "From Iowa. I'd like to hear about it."

"Why ——" I began doubtfully and Decker said:

"Not here, of course. If you haven't a date tonight, maybe we could have dinner together and you could tell me."

There wasn't any reason why I should refuse, was there? He was someone intimate with Emson-Carter and that was as good as being introduced, and besides I wanted to say "yes." So I said, "Yes. I guess yes."

Decker smiled that wonderful smile. "I'll meet you in the lobby of the Commodore at seven. Is that all right?"

I could only nod. Mrs. Mosking and Mr. Edwards came back up the aisle.

Mr. Edwards said, "You were wrong, Stewart. Not a hogshead!"

Decker said, "Good thing I paid for the lunch then. I lost."

He laughed and Mr. Edwards laughed. Mrs. Mosking laughed, too, but when Decker looked at me it was very tingly because it was a secret between us. It was in his look, I mean. That we had met and liked each other and made a date and no one knew.

That was about two-thirty and I don't know how I got through my work. I was so excited and so busy wondering what I would wear. It was my first date with a man in New York, because you can't count the time my brother Billy's destroyer put into Brooklyn Navy Yard overnight and Billy took me to dinner at the little café a few doors from where I live. Because after all Billy is my brother, and anyhow I paid for the dinner and he borrowed five dollars more from me.

This was different as you can plainly see. At five-thirty I dashed out, hardly crying "Good night" to Mrs. Mosking and the girls. From Lexington to Third isn't far and I was at Mrs. Broker's in five minutes. I had my shower and got my hair into curlers quick and then I set the electric clock where I could see it and opened the door of my closet and figured all the factors so I'd know what to wear.

It was rather difficult, not because I haven't any clothes, but because I have quite a few new ones I've never worn. Not ever having had any dates, you see. When I'd see something I liked, I'd buy it against the occasion to wear it, but no occasion had come up, so I had four brand-new outfits to choose from. My blue print, my pink-and-blue rayon, my chartreuse bolero outfit and my green suit. The one with the cutaway front and narrow edging of really lovely beaver.

I decided on the suit because it being spring now you can't go wrong with a suit, either from the point of fashion or weather. And I have nice accessories and that's really the most important factor. My new brown slingbacks; the matching shoulder-strap bag and cloche hat I had such an awful time finding, since I got the shoes first and had to match the color to a bag and hat. And I had a lovely chatelaine I was dying to wear. It's made from a wispy gold chain my grandmother wore and a fleur-de-lis that once pinned her watch to her shirtwaist when they wore them away back when.

So with that settled I got out my nylons and very best pretties and by a quarter to seven I was ready to work on my face. At five to I took out the curlers and gave my hair a quick brushing and when I looked in the mirror I was almost satisfied. I dumped out my blue bag and shoved what I needed into the brown one; slipped it over my shoulder, grabbed up my gloves and hat and ran.

Just as I got downstairs Mrs. Broker looked out of her door. She is short and quite wide and she wears reading glasses so that she has to look over them at anything not under her nose. She said, "Going out, Elinor?" (She simply can't grasp that my name is Ellen.)

I said happily, "Yes'm. I've a dinner engagement."

I OPENED the door and I heard her say after me, "Have a good time, dear." But I was down the steps and waving madly at a cab. I didn't want to be too early, but I didn't want to be late because Decker doesn't seem to be the sort who likes waiting and besides, mother says it is bad manners to make anyone wait.

When I got to the Commodore lobby Decker wasn't there yet. There were lots of people. It was rather breath-taking because the men looked at me as usual, but the women looked at me, too, and I'm not used to that. I guess it was the outfit.

I sat down and it wasn't more than ten minutes later that Decker came. He was wearing a blue pin stripe and a blue fedora with a hand-painted tie and he was really striking. He looked around at people. He looked at me and I smiled. I saw him touch his necktie and sort of throw back his shoulders. Then he looked at me again, blinked and came up to me quick. He swept off his hat from that shining hair.

"The dungeon certainly doesn't suit you. This is where you should be. Out in the world to brighten it." That was nice, wasn't it? Decker tucked my arm in his as I got up. "You look good enough to eat," he told me. "Speaking of eating, we're going to a place where they have steaks—but steaks. How about a quick one before we go?"

I wasn't sure what he meant but I said, "All right." And I realized I didn't know his name. Not all of it.

We laughed about that later. About not knowing one another's names I mean. The quick one was a drink. I had sherry. We have it at home and I like it. Decker had a highball.

The steak place was way up on First Avenue. Really a remarkable place but I guess you've been there. It has sawdust on the floor and old-fashioned gas globes only they've got electric bulbs in them now. We had to wait to get one of the red checker-clothed tables but at last we did and the steak was quite good.

Decker told me all about how he'd discovered the place during the war when you simply couldn't get a steak and of how he'd told people and in no time it was the rage. I guess Decker knows a lot of people and is really important. A man about town.

It was late when we finished dinner. Decker said, "Too bad we can't make a show. Let's go dance."

I didn't mind at all. We went to a place. I don't remember the name. I was too excited and fussed to think of looking or asking. It's over on Broadway and it is Spanish or Mexican. The music was all rumbas and Tuesday, March 18, 1941.

NEW YORK TELEPHONE COMPANY,
New York, New York.

Dear Company: I know there hasn't been time for you to answer my letter since I only wrote it last night and mailed it this morning, but something has happened that makes it even more important that you should put in my telephone right away.

As I told you last night I gave Decker the number of the café since that is the only place he could call me. This afternoon, right after work, I hurried from Lexington so that I could get to the café before six. I didn't come past the house. I went around the block because I knew Mrs. Broker wouldn't like to see me go into the place by myself.

You go down two steps to enter. It is called Mario & Pete's. It's rather dark and it smells of beer but it isn't so terrible, really. There is a bar on the right and booths on the left and in the back is the room with white-clothed tables where Billy and I had dinner.

It was just before six when I came in. There was a man in a white jacket behind the bar and one man sitting at the bar. I guess there must have been some other people in the booths but I didn't see any.

I FELT awful funny, being all alone and the bartender looking at me and the man at the bar looking at me in the mirror behind all the bottles. But I had to wait there to get Decker's call just because I haven't a telephone of my own and so I took a deep breath and went over to the bar.

The bartender said, "Good evenin'."

That made me feel better. I said, "Good evening. My name is Ellen Ames. I live a few doors down at Mrs. Broker's house. I haven't a phone of my own, though I'm getting one soon. But I'm expecting a very important call and I gave this number. May I wait here until it comes?" The bartender, a man with gray hair and black eyebrows, looked doubtful, but I said quickly, "I expect my call between six and six-thirty so I'll be gone before you get busy."

The bartender scratched his chin. "You takin' anythin'?"

I said, "I beg your pardon?" Then I realized what he meant. I said, "I'll have sherry, please," and he looked relieved.

I went to one of the booths and sat down where I could see the phone booth at the far end of the bar. The bartender brought my little glass of sherry and I paid for it right away and gave him a good tip just to make him feel all right about me and then I sipped my sherry and waited for Decker to call.

That was about six. It was quite comfortable in the booth and the sherry was good. I had lots of pleasant things to contemplate. Where Decker and I would go and just how long he'd have to know me before he'd kiss me. You know, things girls think.

I just couldn't help looking at my wrist watch (the one dad gave me for graduation), and then at the phone booth every minute or so and each time I'd see the young man at the bar looking at me in the mirror only when I looked at him he'd be looking elsewhere.

That sort of thing is annoying, isn't it? But he was a nice-looking young man with curly brown hair and broad shoulders. He had on brown trousers and a gray jacket and he simply couldn't compare with Decker. Not at all.

It must have been about a quarter past six when a man came in from the street. He must have been drinking elsewhere for he said, "Hello ever'body," and there wasn't anyone in sight but the young man with the brown hair and brown eyes at the bar. The bartender had gone through his little door behind the bar a full minute before.

Of course, there wasn't any answer, but it didn't seem to bother the drunken gentleman at all. He shoved his derby hat back on his head and came weaving down the floor. I tried not to look at him but he must have seen me for I smelled liquor and then I heard his voice say:

"Sittin' all alone. Terrible shame. Pretty li'l' redhead sittin' all alone."

I looked up, frightened and not knowing what to do. He was beaming down at me and I couldn't get out because he was blocking the booth.

I tried to speak but my voice wouldn't come. Then a deep voice said, "Thanks for entertaining Ellen. Very kind of you, old man." It was the young man with the brown hai. and brown eyes. He had his hand on the drunken gentleman's arm, smiling at him. The man swept off his derby. He had a head that simply shone it was so bald. He said, "Not at all. Not at all, frien'. A priv'lege. A priv'lege. Mighty nice girl you got here. Mi-i-ghty nice." He gave me a sweeping bow, but the young man had his arm firmly and he didn't fall on me. He straightened up and went weaving away.

The young man looked down at me. "It was the only thing I could think of. He meant no harm, but ——"

I said very coldly (for I didn't know him, did I?), "It was kind of you. Thank you very much."

I picked up my glass, forgetting I'd finished my sherry minutes ago. He said, "I hope you won't misunderstand, but perhaps I'd better sit down. He might come back and then ——"

I swallowed. I could only nod and he sat down. I didn't say anything. I didn't even look at him. He didn't say anything either. It was then six-twenty-four by my watch. At six-thirty I knew Decker couldn't call me so I got up. I said, "Thank you."

> To suppose, as we all suppose, that we could be rich and not behave as the rich behave, is like supposing that we could drink all day and keep absolutely sober.

> —LOGAN PEARSALL SMITH: Afterthoughts. (Harcourt, Brace & Co., Inc.)

The young man was on his feet. He didn't say anything. He just bent his head and I swept past him out of the booth and out of Mario & Pete's.

It was really terribly embarrassing and something no girl should be subjected to. (I mean the strange young man as well as the drunken gentleman.) If you send my phone and have it installed right away that won't have to happen again. As soon as Decker calls tomorrow I'll give him the new number and then I won't have to go to Mario & Pete's any more, will I?

So please have my phone installed immediately. Please.

Truly yours,
ELLEN AMES.

NEW YORK TELEPHONE COMPANY,
New York, New York.

Dear Company: I got your letter this evening when I came home but I only just opened it. It was very kind of you to write me so fully, but I do not want you to feel too badly about not being able to give me a telephone right away as something has happened that makes me think I can get along without one just now. In fact, I'm sure I can.

I felt very badly when I wrote you Tuesday because I knew I should have to go back to Mario & Pete's on Wednesday. I had to be there when Decker called and after the disagreeable occurrence that had occurred I was somewhat apprehensive.

But I went. Right after work. The drunken gentleman wasn't there. The bartender was (his name is Riley) and so was the young man with the brown hair and brown eyes. This time he had gray trousers and a brown jacket. (I think he must have two suits and changes off. It makes quite a wardrobe for a man that way, doesn't it?)

There were more people at the bar this me, but the bartender said, "Good evening, liss Ames. Sherry?"

I said, "Yes, thank you," and went to my ooth.

I'd hardly sat down and put my gloves and ag on the table when someone said, "Good vening, Miss Ames."

I looked up. It was the young man with ie brown hair and broad shoulders. He ad a glass of sherry. He set it down before e. "Riley's busy. You don't mind?"

I said (still coldly because I really didn't now him, did I?), "Thank you." I opened y bag and took out my purse. The sherry as thirty-five cents, I knew, but I hesitated bout adding the ten cents for the tip. (I now it's a lot but I had to keep Mr. Riley leased, having no phone of my own.) I ought maybe the young man might think I eant it for him.

He was very understanding, though. He aid, "Just leave it all on the table. Riley ill collect when he has a minute to spare."

He smiled at me as I looked up at him. He as a very nice smile. He has freckles, too, ist like I have under the bleach cream, only is aren't hidden at all.

He said, "Maybe I'd better sit with you ntil your call comes. Just in case there ould be another effusive drunk coming in."

Well, I was sure Decker would call and I as afraid, so I said (still very coldly), Thank you."

He went to the bar and brought back his rink. (It was ale.) He sat down and we were oth quiet for a few minutes. Then he said, I know your name. It's only right you hould know mine. It's Ralph Mason."

I said, "How do you do, Mr. Mason." I elt a little easier though I was aching for Decker's call to come. Knowing his name ade it seem more proper.

Mr. Mason drank some ale. He said, "I ope your call comes soon."

"Oh, so do I," I said, perhaps too fer-ently.

Mr. Mason (he's twenty-four; I guessed wenty-five) said, "I know just how you feel bout having to wait in a place like this."

I lifted my eyes.

He said, "It's a place to relax. That's why come. I can't relax at the office or running round from court to court and I certainly an't in the packing box they rented me as a oom. So I come here and have an ale."

I considered that. It was understandable. said so. I said also, because it had puzzled ne, "Courts?"

"I'm a lawyer," Mr. Mason said. "I'm a ery minor cog in a big firm and the little cogs do the running around. Not that it isn't better than driving an ammunition truck in the Pacific."

He drank some more ale. I sipped my sherry and when I looked at my watch it was six thirty-five.

Mr. Mason said, very sincerely, "I'm sorry."

I said, "Oh, that's all right," but I felt badly that Decker was so busy he couldn't call that night either. So I left right then.

It rained all day Thursday and when I got to Mario & Pete's it was almost dark and I had on my yellow slicker with the hood. Mr. Mason wasn't at the bar. I felt sort of disappointed, but Riley said, "Good evening, Miss Ames."

When I got to the booth I gasped. Mr. Mason was sitting there, his ale in front of him and across the table was a glass of sherry, waiting.

That was nice and considerate, but I took out my purse as soon as I'd greeted him and laid Riley's money and tip on the table. Mr. Mason didn't make any objection.

He said, "Hadn't you better take off that slicker? It's dripping."

"I don't think I'll have long to wait," I said, "but perhaps I'd better."

Ralph got up and helped me with the slicker. He hung it on the hook at the side of the booth. When he sat down again he said, "That's a very pretty dress."

It is (my pink-and-blue), but I said, "Oh, it's nothing."

Ralph said, sort of solemnly, "It's very pretty."

I sipped my sherry and Ralph drank his ale. People came in, very wet, and lined up at the bar. All of a sudden it was six thirty. Ralph said when I looked up from my watch, "I guess it's because of the rain," and I said, "Yes, of course. It must be."

Ralph said, "Look, Ellen, if you're not going to be doing anything, let's have dinner together." He must have seen the doubt in my eyes for he said, "Dutch, of course. You can pay for your own. It's just not much fun eating by yourself."

Golly, didn't I know that? I said, "Here?" because I hadn't cared much for the food when Billy and I had eaten at Mario & Pete's.

Ralph smiled that nice smile. "They're all pretty much alike unless you ransom the food and I guess you and I aren't in that class yet."

That was when I thought, Oh my goodness, if I'm going to have dinner with Mr. Mason, why not be certain of something decent to eat? So I said, "Would you like to have dinner at my apartment?"

"It's from some attorney, John, and it's a portal to portal back-pay suit for eleven-hundred dollars from our baby sitter."

Ralph sort of frowned.

I said quickly, "There isn't much we'd need to buy. Chops or a steak. I've the rest."

Ralph said (I don't know why), "Forgive me, Ellen. I'd like to. Very much."

We went out into the rain, me in my slicker and Ralph in an old trench coat. We got a tenderloin on Third Avenue; two Idahos and some endive next door and next door to that we got three chocolate éclairs (custard, not cream), because Ralph said he was mad about them, too, and one wasn't ever enough for him.

Ralph carried the bags and we ran the last block. It was pouring so, but a warm, warm rain. I opened the door with my key and went up first and opened the door and turned on the lights. When Ralph reached the landing I had my slicker off. I took the bundles from him and told him to shake his coat in the hall and bring it in.

I had the kitchenette doors open when he stepped in and closed the door. He looked around. "It's grand, Ellen. It—it's a home." That was nice of him, wasn't it?

I said, "You make yourself comfortable. Go and wash up if you like. Take off your jacket and loosen your tie. My brothers always do."

He did just that. When he came back from the bathroom he had his shirt collar open. He sat down and took a pipe from his pocket and lighted it. He said, "Sure there's nothing I can do?"

I said, "Not a thing." I heard him sigh. Then I heard the radio and smelled the pipe. I was too busy getting dinner to look at him much. I was excited, too, because it was the first entertaining I'd done in my apartment and I love to prepare things.

I MADE the salad and the coffee while the steak was on the electric broiler. I set the gate-leg table with my blue-bordered cloth and blue-and-white china and it wasn't until I said, "All ready," that I remembered the potatoes. I was utterly ashamed but Ralph said, "I couldn't have waited for baked potatoes. I'm starved." I put a huge dollop of butter on the steak, slid it onto the hot platter and set it for Ralph to carve.

It was a lovely steak. We ate every bit and Ralph said, "Since there is no dog around I claim the right to gnaw the bone."

We had our éclairs and coffee and sat talking over more coffee while the rain pattered on the roof. It wasn't until almost nine that we did the dishes. Ralph comes from Ohio and won a scholarship to Columbia Law. The war took some of his time but when he passed his bar he got an offer to go with his present firm. He has no family except an older brother in Ohio. He likes New York too.

I thought it was still quite early when Ralph looked at his watch and said, "Work tomorrow," and got up. Golly, it was past eleven. He got his coat and then he came back in and said, "Thank you, Ellen. Thank you for a lovely evening."

"I enjoyed it too," I said.

Ralph turned his hat in his hands. "You'll be at Riley's tomorrow, of course?"

I just nodded.

Ralph said in that deep voice, "I hope your call comes. I do, honestly, Ellen. But if it doesn't, would you go to a show with me—or the movies?"

"I'm sure it will come," I said. "But if it doesn't, well—yes. I guess yes."

The call didn't come the next night. Ralph was waiting for me. This time I guess he had all the gray suit on and he looked ever so nice. I had on my green suit because the weather was just grand.

Ralph said, "That's a lovely outfit. Lovely." He was so definite that I didn't try to say it wasn't. I think it is too.

Ralph didn't say much. He just sat and fidgeted. Suddenly he jumped up. I stared at him, wide-eyed. Ralph was taking down his hat.

"Six-thirty," he said. "Let's go, shall we? Your call won't come now."

I said, "I guess not." So we left.

We had a sandwich and some coffee and went to the early show at Loew's on Lex-

He said, "Ellen, I ——" He didn't finish.

Riley bent over the table. "Phone call for you, Miss Ames."

I said, "Me?" Then I remembered Decker. I said, "Please excuse me, Ralph," and got up. I didn't hear him say anything but he did make some sort of sound.

I went into the booth, closed the door and picked up the receiver. I said, "Hello."

Decker said (I knew his voice immediately), "Hello—Trudie?"

I said, "Trudie? This is Ellen Ames."

I HEARD him laugh. Quite loudly. I could hear other loud voices in the background. Decker said, "Sure, sure, Ellen. Look, grab a cab and come on over. I'm having a party. I'll give you the address. Got a pencil or a lipstick? Eye pencil will do, ha-ha."

I stared at the mouthpiece. I know my eyes were wide. Decker saying "Trudie" like that and the way he sounded, like the drunken gentleman who had come into Mario & Pete's the night Ralph had been so considerate and saved me from insult, if not worse, made me suddenly realize everything. That Decker hadn't called me, not because he hadn't been able to, but because he hadn't meant to. That he'd put me in his little book with other girls, like that Trudie, whoever she is, poor girl, and was just calling me now because he was having a party and needed girls.

It made me so mad that I said, "I'm very sorry, Mr. Decker Stewart, but I am previously engaged and shall be previously engaged any other time you call me." Then I hung up quick.

When I got back to the booth Ralph was standing, waiting. I sat down and picked up my sherry and, golly, I was glad he was there. But Ralph didn't smile when I smiled at him. He said, "Ellen, I am going to Washington on business for the firm Monday. I—I don't know when I'll be back, so maybe I won't be seeing you again, but before I say good-by there are a couple of things I want to tell you."

I sat, dismayed, just looking at him. Ralph took a deep breath.

"I want to say you're the nicest, loveliest girl I ever knew and I think that guy"—he gestured at the booth—"is the luckiest so-and-so that ever lived, but I wouldn't let you sit a whole week waiting for a call. I'd be so close you'd never have to wonder where I was or when you'd see me. I"—he gestured—"I'd better go."

The tears were in my eyes. I couldn't help it. I could only say, "Now? I thought—I thought we could have dinner together. It's been such a lovely day so far."

Ralph sat down as if his legs had failed him. "You're not going out with him? That was the phone call you've been waiting for?"

"Oh, yes," I said. "But I'm not going out with him. I'm not going to see him any more. I just couldn't." I told him about Decker and Ralph didn't look mad at all, not even when I'd finished.

But he said, "Don't ever point this Stewart out to me, Ellen. Honestly, I don't know whether I'd kiss him or conk him."

Parlez-Moi D'Amour—But Tender

By Mary Norton Gordon

Darling, when you love me,
Tell me that you love me;
Leave to the novelists
Passionate surprise.
Leave to tin-pan alley the Provocative sally;
Let the poets speak
Only with their eyes.

Darling, when you come Home from work and find me
Faced with pandemonium
From cellar floor to roof,
If I do not drop the Omelet to kiss you
Please do not surmise that I have grown aloof.

Darling, when you love me,
Tell me that you love me;
A tender look of longing or Pressure of the hand
Is often lost on mothers
Busy at their housework—
But shout to me: "I LOVE YOU!"
And I will understand.

Have you that magic touch?

The way modern canning methods capture precious food values seems almost like magic.

Raw foods can lose flavors and vitamins so quickly – in shipment—in storage, and in the usual home-cooking methods.

But in canned foods you can be sure every means known to science is employed to bring you foods at the peak of their goodness.

You can count on the flavor and nutritive values – of foods packed in cans. The steel-and-tin container seals in this goodness to assure you of top nutritional value for your money.

When company comes . . . vegetable soup, tuna fish and mushroom soup for pie, green asparagus, grapefruit sections, tea, cherries for cake . . . and they all come to you in cans!

Fishing for Compliments?

With such a tremendous variety of delicious fish, meats, fruits and vegetables packed in cans, meal planning can be an exciting adventure. Each meal deserves a compliment, because you can count on canned foods to yield full flavor, full nutritional value—and full, deep-down enjoyment.

"Gardens" Grow on Grocers' Shelves

All these delicious fruits and vegetables are kept practically fresh-as-the-day-they-were-packed for you in cans. So convenient—so reasonable in price—so safe, canned foods are real value for your money. You know, each can is really an individual "pressure cooker" which locks in flavors and vitamins. No wonder women are proud to serve modern canned foods.

Tuna-Mushroom Pie—a la Magic

Line shallow pyrex dish with pie-crust and brown in oven. Let cool. Combine tuna fish and canned mushroom soup. Place combination in crust and heat in moderate oven. Then be prepared to sit down and watch your menfolks go for this melt-in-the-mouth flavor combination.

He stood there, very grave and handsome and Mrs. Broker suddenly smiled. "That would," she said. I gasped, not believing my ears. Mrs. Broker said, "Come down and take tea with me later. Both of you." She went out and closed the door.

Ralph took one step toward me. "Ellen—will you?"

So you see, I don't need a phone now, do I? I rather think it is good I didn't have one. And good that other girls like me don't have them, for if you have one and know some man like Decker (not like Ralph), then you sit home looking at the telephone, waiting for it to ring and are perfectly miserable. And no man who makes you do that is worth while, is he?

So don't feel badly about the phone. It is quite all right. And thank you ever so much for your letter and your regrets and believe me to be, ever so happily,

Yours,
ELLEN AMES.

IF you'd like to get an inside look at yourself sometime, try eavesdropping on your youngsters when they're playing house. You may discover that a great deal of what you thought passed over their heads really was filed away for future reference in their impressionable minds. Children love to pretend they are grownups, because growing up is their natural goal. But they aren't satisfied to grow up just any old way; they want to be like the adults they love, their parents. So if you see your small boy pushing his Teddy bear around, or your little girl pretending to shove junket into her doll's mouth—don't wonder why. Just check your diary to see if you haven't done something like that yourself.

A WEEK'S DINNERS for Four...@ 10.50

BY LOUELLA G. SHOUER

YOU can have good little dinners from a unicamy groceries. Counting pennies is still very important. It isn't easy to keep to a budget these days, and if yours is a moderate one, $10–$11 is the most you can afford for dinners for four.

After all, you want to send your family off with a good breakfast to start the day; and if you have two children, they may come home to lunch, and your husband may too. Even if the children have lunch at school, this cost must be figured into your food money.

Following are a week's dinners and the key recipes for each day.

The first menus on which we figured costs had first courses and a salad every night. The cost was out of bounds by prices as of January 3rd. Since then, prices of some foods have dropped, and may have dropped somewhat more by April 1st -much more, we hope, by summer. So you may have even more leeway. Now let's see how much good eating we can do on $10.50.

Sunday Dinner—$2.13

*Chicken and Rice
With Yellow Sauce—
Lemon Wedges
Carrots—Parsley Butter
Raw-Vegetable Slaw
Bread and Spread
*Graham-Cracker Torte
Coffee or Milk

The main course for this meal is a very simple one, but very good. You won't want to have chicken every Sunday, but in this week's menus the chicken does for two dinners. The cost of this dinner is based on half of a five-pound hen—the cost of the other half is in Wednesday's dinner.

CHICKEN AND RICE

Cook a fat 4½-5 pound chicken in water to cover—adding an onion, seasonings, celery tops and a few sprigs of parsley. When chicken is tender, drain it. Strain the stock and let fat rise to the top. Remove half the chicken from the bones. The rest will provide a good casserole for Wednesday's dinner. Leave the chicken in fairly good-sized pieces. Make a gravy from 2½ cups of the stock, 3 tablespoons chicken fat and 3 tablespoons flour. Add the chicken, season and heat. For your family of four, ⅔–¾ cup raw rice will make enough. Be sure to rinse it well with boiling water when it's tender and place in a colander over hot water, covering well with a cloth to keep rice fluffy. Fluff the freshly cooked rice in a ring in center of the platter. Fill this snowy-white ring with the chicken and rich yellow sauce. Arrange the whole parsley-buttered carrots around the edge and garnish with lemon wedges. It makes a lovely picture. The lemon has a purpose and isn't just for decoration. A squeeze of lemon over each serving adds a distinctive flavor to this dish.

GRAHAM-CRACKER TORTE

Mix ½ cup graham-cracker crumbs with 1 tablespoon sugar, ½ teaspoon cinnamon and 1 tablespoon melted margarine. Press half the mixture in a shallow casserole or baking dish. (A small rectangular one, 8x4x2, is best.) Save rest for top of torte. Beat 2 egg whites with a pinch of salt and ⅛ teaspoon cream of tartar. Continue beating until stiff. Fold 2½ tablespoons sugar, ½ teaspoon grated lemon rind and 1 teaspoon lemon juice into ½ cup prune purée. Fold this into the egg-white mixture. Pour onto the crumbs. Top with rest of crumbs. Bake in a moderately slow oven, 325° F., 35 minutes. Serve hot or cold with or without cream or top milk. Serves 4.

Monday Dinner—$1.20

Frankfurters With Macaroni
Buttered Spinach
Raw-Vegetable Relishes
Bread and Spread
Rhubarb Sauce—*Spice Cookies
Coffee or Milk

Tonight's dinner will be very easy to prepare if you make the cookies and rhubarb sauce in the morning. The cooky recipe makes 5 dozen small cookies. The cookies cost 37 cents to make. Only 1 dozen are figured in this meal or one fifth the cost. The rest of the cookies will be fine to have in the cooky the children's lunches and after-treats.

FRANKFURTERS WITH MACARONI

half of a 9-ounce package (1 cup) ow macaroni in 1½ quarts boiling with 1½ teaspoons salt. Cook until r—about 8 minutes. Drain and with boiling water. While macaroni king, combine 1 cup milk, 1½ tea- salt, a dash of pepper, 1 teaspoon stershire sauce and 1 cup grated ican cheese. Combine with maca- Pour into shallow baking dish. 4 frankfurters in boiling water 5 es. Slit lengthwise, cutting only dly through. Fill each frankfurter l tablespoon pickle relish. Arrange uffed frankfurters on top of maca- Sprinkle with ½ cup more grated e. Bake about ½ hour in moderate 350° F. Serves 4.

SPICE COOKIES

a ½ cup shortening and 1½ cups sugar. Add 2 well-beaten eggs and spoon grated nutmeg. Sift 2 cups with ¼ teaspoon baking soda. Add dry ingredients alternately with p sour milk or buttermilk; mix ughly. Now mix ¼ cup sugar with 1 oon cinnamon. Drop cookie dough a teaspoon into the cinnamon-sugar ure. Toss lightly until coated. Place es several inches apart on greased sheets and bake about 13 minutes oderate oven, 350° F. This recipe s a dozen small cookies—enough for ht with plenty left over.

Tuesday Dinner—$1.05

*Deviled Kidney Slices
Creamed Potatoes
Frenched Green Beans
Bread and Spread
Canned Pears
Coffee or Milk

DEVILED KIDNEY SLICES

2 veal kidneys. Remove hard connective centers and fat with sharp pointed scissors. Cream 2 tablespoons margarine with 1 teaspoon mustard, ¼ teaspoon paprika, a teaspoon salt, a pinch of thyme and 1 tablespoon lemon juice. When thoroughly mixed, melt mixture over hot water. Cut each kidney with it and roll in fine cracker bread crumbs—about ½ cupful. Place in shallow pan and broil about 5 minutes, turning often. During the broiling, sprinkle 2 tablespoons melted margarine over the top of the kidneys. Sprinkle with a few drops hot pepper sauce. Serves 4.

Wednesday Dinner—$2.10

*Scalloped Chicken
Buttered Small Onions and Peas
Tomato-Aspic Salad
Bread and Spread
*Pineapple Pudding
Coffee or Milk

ere's where the other half of the ken comes in. There'll be plenty for four, with a bread dressing. Be- the bones for a good stock base for soups. If you'd prefer to switch this meal with Tuesday's, that's O.K. See Tuesday's menu.

SCALLOPED CHICKEN

Separate chicken from bones. Leave it in as large pieces as you can. Make a custard by melting 2 tablespoons chicken fat (you'll have this on top of the jar of chicken stock you also saved from Sunday). Add 2 tablespoons flour. Blend well and add 2 cups hot chicken stock. Stir until thickened. Cool. Carefully stir in 2 well-beaten eggs. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Prepare 2 cups of your favorite bread dressing. It will take about 6 slices stale bread. We seasoned ours with ½ teaspoon sage, 1 teaspoon poultry seasoning, 1 onion, chopped, salt and pepper, and stirred in 3 tablespoons melted margarine. Place the dressing in a well-greased baking dish. Arrange the chicken on top and pour the custard over it. Sprinkle ½ cup fine bread crumbs over the top and bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., 35–40 minutes. Serves 4.

PINEAPPLE PUDDING

Add 2 cups milk to 1 package vanilla pudding. Cook over moderate heat as directed on package. Remove from heat. Stir in ½ cup drained crushed pineapple. Serves 4.

Additional lunch and dinner menus for Thursday

Thursday Dinner—$1.21

*Whole-Meal Bean Soup
Hot Biscuits
Vegetable-Salad Bowl
*Peanut-Butter-Bread Pudding
Coffee or Milk

WHOLE-MEAL BEAN SOUP

Soak 1 pound dry white beans overnight. Next day cook them in boiling salted water to cover until tender—about 1 hour. While the beans are cooking, sauté over low heat for a few minutes in 2 tablespoons fat, 1 medium onion, chopped; 1 small white turnip, sliced; 1 cup diced potatoes and 1 bud garlic, minced. Cut 1 can pork luncheon meat into small cubes, add to the beans with the sautéed vegetables, along with 2 tablespoons chopped parsley and 1 teaspoon paprika. Add enough more water for good consistency—about 1 quart. Season with salt and pepper to taste and simmer for another about ½ hour. Serves 4.

PEANUT-BUTTER-BREAD PUDDING

Spread 2 slices bread on both sides thinly with peanut butter. Cut into small cubes and place them in small greased casserole. Beat 2 eggs; blend with ¼ cup brown sugar, ⅛ teaspoon salt, 1⅔ cups milk, ¼ cup seedless raisins and 1 teaspoon vanilla. Pour over bread cubes. Let stand an hour. Sprinkle with brown sugar. Set dish in pan of hot water. Bake in moderate oven, 350° F., 1 hour or until set.

EGGS IN NESTS

6 slices of toast
6 thin slices of cheese
6 eggs
½ teaspoonful of salt
¼ teaspoonful of pepper
12 strips of bacon

Place cheese on toast. Separate eggs. Place whites in mixing bowl; leave each yolk in separate shell until needed. Season whites and beat until stiff. Heap on toast. Make a dent in each and slip yolk in center of white. Bake at 350°. Remember until eggs are set. Garnish with paprika and strips of bacon. Top with generous serving of KEYKO and serve while its fresh golden goodness is still melting.

What a dish for a cheery breakfast or a hearty snack! And as substantial as it is unusual . . . for KEYKO Margarine adds its full rich share of concentrated energy and goodness.

Compounded of the finest vegetable oils and pasteurized skim milk, its delicious, sweet "Farm-fresh" flavor makes KEYKO a popular spread, a delicate flavoring for cooking and seasoning, a revelation in baking.

Try KEYKO for economy. Use KEYKO as your standard for margarine comparison. Find out why KEYKO is America's finest margarine.

HUNGARIAN STUFFED PEPPERS

Cut off the stem ends of 4 green peppers. Remove the seeds. When you shop, select peppers that will sit up well when stuffed. Mix together ¾ pound ground lean pork, 3 tablespoons raw rice, 1 egg slightly beaten, 1 medium onion, chopped, 1 teaspoon salt and some pepper. Stuff the green peppers lightly with this mixture. Put 3 cups canned tomatoes through sieve. Melt 2 tablespoons shortening. Blend in 2 tablespoons flour. Add the sieved tomatoes and cook, stirring constantly until smooth and thickened. Season with salt and pepper. Put the stuffed peppers in the sauce. Cover and simmer about 1½ hours. A heavy pot or Dutch oven is the best utensil to use. If you wish to bake them in the oven along with bananas, use a covered casserole, moderate oven—350° F.—same length of time as above. Serves 4.

BAKED BANANAS

Peel 4 bananas and cut them in two. [illegible] in a shallow glass pie plate. To the j[uice] of 1½ lemons, add ⅓ cup sugar a[nd] tablespoon margarine. Cook a few m[inutes]. Pour over the bananas and bak[e] moderate oven, 350° F., about 20–25 m[inutes]. Baste frequently during the t[ime] with the sauce. These are good ho[t] cold. For some reason the bananas t[urn] pink in the baking and come out wi[th a] rosy blush. Serves 4.

Economy Angles

In these menus, coffee is planned f[or] persons and fresh milk for 2. Evapora[ted] milk, diluted, can be used for cook[ing]. Dried milk is economical too.

Use brown eggs. They are every[bit] as good as white eggs. Buy the medi[um] size.

New potatoes will still be more expens[ive] to use this month than the old potatoes.

Use the cheaper grade of canned tom[a]toes for the sauce for Saturday's dinn[er]. One No. 2 can of tomato juice is sufficie[nt] for the tomato aspic, though it is chea[per] to buy the 1-quart, 14-ounce size if y[ou] plan to use tomato juice for some of yo[ur] lunches and breakfasts. We couldn't affo[rd] to include tomato juice or other first cour[se] in this week's dinners at the given cost but if prices of many foods have dropp[ed] between January and April you may ma[ke] age a large can on your budget and ma[ke] some of your dinners more interesting wi[th] a first-course start.

Fruit and vegetable prices vary mu[ch] with the season. Now in the spring ma[ny] pennies that we had to spend in January f[or] the items called for, you may be able to h[ave] off your own bill. If markets have speci[al] buys on vegetables other than those giv[en] in the menus, by all means substitute the[m] but as a rule the vegetables given a[re] usually the cheapest in most any seaso[n]. You might wonder why we felt that spen[d]ing even 6 cents for a bunch of parsley w[as] economical. I believe it was well spent. [It] adds so much to the taste and looks [of] many foods.

For the money, a hen is a better buy tha[n] a male bird. It has more fat and the meat [is] usually juicier. A roasting chicken could b[e] substituted, but it will cost you more fro[m] the cash box.

Prepared salad dressing will cost a fe[w] cents less than mayonnaise. If you mak[e] your own, the saving is even greater. Mea[s]ured in pennies, these small savings coun[t]

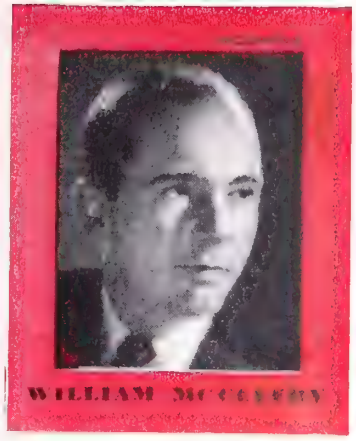
The Other Side of the Moon — A Complete Novel by Martha Gerard

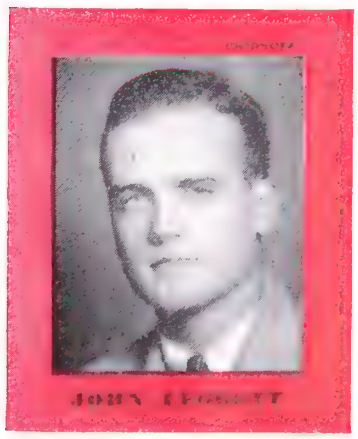


WILLIAM McCLEERY

"I was born thirty-five years ago in a thriving Nebraska village which is now a filling station," says Mr. McCleery, author of Wolf Story. "I came to New York shortly after graduating from college, and up until last year made a career of newspaper and magazine work. I've been most interested recently in my second Broadway play, Parlor Story, and in Wolf Story, which I wrote for my five-year-old son, Michael, last summer when we were separated for a few months. Wolf Story will be brought out as a book sometime in the fall. My son Mike was very pleased when I told him that, but then he is a very well-trained boy."

ROMA ROSE

"I've been thirty-one for so many years now that people are beginning to notice it," writes the author of Crack in the Armor. "I've got a husband who is nice but won't move to California, where I want to get rich and grow ulcers like other writers, and two unspeakably adolescent children, one of whom is crazy over horses, and the other crazy over the Yankees. We occasionally have conversation, but not communication. We live in an appalling antique 18-room house that would be a wonderful place to visit. Any discrepancy between this house and the one in the story is, of course, purely inevitable."



JOHN LEGGETT

While John Leggett is a promising young writer today, by next year he may be one of America's favorite movie stars. "I've been offered a Hollywood contract," says Mr. Leggett, who wrote The Girl Who Lived in a Tree while acting in summer stock, "but so far I've held out in favor of a three-act play I'm currently at work writing. When that's finished I may change my mind about the movies. I'm an ex-Navy gunnery officer, unmarried and live in New York, where my favorite recreations are squash, mah-jongg and parachute jumping."

Our Readers Write Us

Skirting an Insult

Northampton, England.

Dear Madam: I read in one of our newspapers that in the U.S.A. skirts will stay longer even if the women don't like them. Are your women a lot of sheep that can be told what to wear whether they like it or not?

Our women have got more individuality. They wear what they desire and not what dress designers say. I think longer skirts are revolting, an offense to the gaze, and an insult to a Maker who gave women legs to show, not hide. Yours sincerely,

E. G. HALL.

Legs were made, at least originally, for use. As to use, President Lincoln said all there can be said, answering a query as to how long legs should be. "Legs," said Mr. Lincoln, "should be long enough to reach to the ground." ED.

The Girl That I Marry

Brockton, Massachusetts.

Dear Editor: I am very much amused by the emphasis put on marriage in your articles, fiction and advertisements. Being married must be just out of this world!

Since I have read all these articles I have come to some definite conclusions about what I would ask of any girl I wanted to marry.

I think that you can consider the marriage relationship from three angles: social, economic and biological.

As far as the social relationship goes, I would expect my future wife to be interested, generally, in skiing, dancing and a certain amount of night life. This list could be extended indefinitely, but it boils down to the fact that husband and wife should share several interests if they are not to be going off on tangents all the time. I also believe my wife should be from my economic class and religious faith.

REPRINTED BY COURTESY THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

On the economic side, I believe my wife should accept certain responsibilities: keep our house clean, do the cooking and marketing, and also our laundry. When children come, she should also be responsible for attending to their needs. Where money is concerned, she and I should budget our money, and she should receive from me sufficient money to pay for household expenses, such as food. I expect to take care of rent, utilities and car expenses. If it is necessary for my wife to work to keep the marriage going, I expect that she split the costs of overhead 50–50 with me, but that the rest of her earnings are for her own use. I would help with the dirty work, such as dishwashing and heavy house cleaning. I also like to cook and might give her a breatheronce in a while. And when the baby arrives, I'd help feed him and look after him. When he (or she) gets to be four or five, I'd be needed on the discipline problem and would certainly help out there.

On the biological and sentimental side of marriage, it should be no harder to make an adjustment than in the other two aspects of marriage. If the husband and wife are frank enough to call sex "sex," there should be no trouble. A good book on the physiological aspects of the relationship would create a lot of understanding and enable them to get off on the right foot.

I would like to marry a girl who has an even temper, and who would talk over misunderstandings as they are bound to arise. She should expect the same of me. I do not expect to put her on any pedestal, as I don't think any girl deserves that much adulation. It's the quickest way to spoil them, and it's asking for eventual domination. I expect to remain faithful, and expect her to do so also. She should have a sense of humor and be able to take a kidding once in a while, and not be too dignified for a little old-fashioned roughhousing.

I expect her to keep neat and clean, and to wear attractive clothes when in public. But around the house, I don't care what she wears.

I think a matter-of-fact approach to the aspects and relationships of marriage might knock down the present divorce rate, and might lead women not to expect so much ecstasy from marriage. Marriage has a lot of hard work to it, a lot of responsibility, and ain't half so glamorous as the ads and love stories would lead you to believe. Yours truly,

Teacher Comments

Seward School,
Auburn, New York.

Dear Sir: The Auburn Teachers Association wishes to thank you for the splendid articles which have appeared in your magazine. They have aroused the public as never before and have presented the case of the teachers in such unusual and interesting ways that they have caused a great deal of comment. They will play a great part in making teaching the profession it should be by raising salaries. Very truly yours,

LILLIAN DONAHUE,
President, Auburn Teachers Association.

If the JOURNAL succeeds in helping teachers get salaries raised, its editors will feel they have partially paid off their debt to the profession. ED.

Journal in China

Bakersfield, California.

Dear Editor: In the summer of 1945 I was sent to China with the American Red Cross. While stationed in Tientsin I was fortunate in knowing the C. C. Changs. Mrs. Chang was an American girl and her husband one of the foremost Chinese surgeons. My family supplied me with magazines as long as I was there and I passed each one on to Betty. I promised to send Betty the JOURNAL each month after my return home.

Betty now writes her delight: "Especially I want to tell you how much everyone is enjoying the JOURNAL, for it has made the rounds of my friends, my hairdresser and my tailor." (Patterns are unknown in China. The tailor just looks at a picture, smiles, "Can do, missy," and turns out a superb creation.) "It's a wonderful magazine—a real morale lifter-upper. Just cannot tell you how we all appreciate them."

May I add my thanks to Mrs. Chang's.

Yours very sincerely,
ELEANOR BRADY.

Dear Mr. and Mrs. Gould: If I could only have one magazine, the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL would be it.

To begin with, I like your covers.

I love Gladys Taber's Diary of Domesticity because she loves cats and I love cats. Also, she makes the everyday tasks that every woman has to perform seem like fun, as they should be.

The next most thrilling thing is the series on Regional Houses. It is a revelation to every American to see these marvelous photographs of the historic homes in this country.

Since the first How America Lives, I have been a devoted reader of that feature.

The food articles are so mouth-watering I always want to start making elaborate desserts immediately.

her suggestions can be adapted by even the poor, like me.

Everything you publish on home decoration is beautiful. The series of lovely but homey kitchens which Gladys Taber has been describing are heart-warming. The articles on household problems, new equipment for kitchens, new cleaning devices, and so on, are very helpful.

I like the ads, but especially the linoleum ads and recently the linen ones.

Under-Cover Stuff is fun. If I wasn't already crazy about reading, it would make me want to read.

I haven't even mentioned the fiction and the wonderful illustrations done by people like Walter Biggs, Al Parker and Coby Whitmore. I like it all and think you strike just the right note; it is bright, pleasant and entertaining.

It seems mean to mention just one dislike, but I must. When If You Ask Me, by Eleanor Roosevelt, disappears, the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL will be absolutely 100 per cent perfect.

Sincerely yours,
MARY R. PRIDE.

Salem Open House

Overtaxed Women

Brooklyn, New York.

Dear Mr. Gould: I find that many of my friends, who like myself are husbands of professional women, are resentful of the unfair tax situation in respect to working mothers.

The mother who works is not permitted to deduct her expenses in connection with hiring a substitute in the home. And yet this expense is a necessary one if she is to work at all.

Many of these women are highly talented in their chosen professions. They know that they are better mothers if they can work at least part time at work that challenges their ability. Often their skills are also badly needed by society.

Here are a few case histories:

1. My wife is a physician, in whose profession there still seems to be a shortage. She began working five mornings a week, hiring an indifferent maid, but the best that could be found at a price we could pay ($1 per hour), to replace her in the home. She soon found that income tax, plus maid, took the lion's share of her earnings, leaving her little to pay for such added costs of working as transportation, lunches, better clothes. Only after she began working two afternoons weekly in addition, hiring a college girl at 50 cents per hour as afternoon substitute, could she begin to realize any net income on the transaction.

2. A college professor's wife works part time as researcher on important medical research. They find that it actually costs them money to have the wife work. Although they can ill afford it on a professor's salary today, the husband insists on her working since, he says, she is more agreeable to live with when she does.

3. A Red Cross office badly needed a woman to supervise a large number of woman employees. The wife of a friend of mine had just the qualifications for which they were looking and for which they had long searched. After figuring income tax and cost of a substitute to care for the children while she worked, my friends decided that they could not afford the financial sacrifice involved. Had they been able to deduct the cost of a domestic in reporting the income tax, the decision would have been different.

These few serve to give you an idea of the injustice of this ruling as contrasted with the ability of the salesman, for instance, to deduct costs of owning and operating an automobile when this is an essential condition of his employment. What must be the hardship in the case of a widow who has no relative with whom

ONE-THIRD MORE FOOD STORAGE IN THE SAME KITCHEN SPACE!

Thanks to General Electric's revolutionary advance in refrigerator design

Here's the great new General Electric Model ND 8. Big Freezer holds 20 standard packages of frozen foods, plus 4 ice trays (80 cubes). Bottle space big enough for 12 square quart-size milk bottles—also takes very tall bottles.

Ample, conveniently arranged shelves . . . big drawers for meat, fruits, and vegetables (fruit and vegetable drawers knee high) . . . to keep these foods market-fresh. What a refrigerator! There is nothing to equal it on the market.

Notice how the new General Electric 8 cubic-foot Space Maker model fits in the same space as the ordinary 6 cubic-foot refrigerator . . . yet gives you one-third more refrigerated food-storage capacity.

Now you can get a brand-new refrigerator that gives you one-third more refrigerated food storage—8 cubic feet of storage—in exactly the same kitchen floor space you'd need for an average 6 cubic-foot model!

And in this new refrigerator you'll have an extra-large Freezer that gives you plenty of ice cubes and plenty of room for storing frozen foods.

That's what General Electric offers you in the sensational new Space Maker refrigerator line.

The result of General Electric's engineering progress

Progressive improvements in design and engineering have made it possible to give you all the advantages of greater capacity, greater shelf area, more room for bottles and bulky foods, more space for frozen foods—without increasing the outside floor measurements of the refrigerator or decreasing the thickness of insulation.

Greatest advance since General Electric pioneered the "sealed-in-steel" unit

This increased refrigerated storage capacity is the biggest step forward in home refrigerators since G.E. pioneered another basic development—the famous "sealed-in-steel" refrigerating unit.

Now refined and made more compact and efficient than ever . . . the General Electric unit is a refrigerating mechanism permanently sealed up in an airtight steel case. Oil can't leak out; dust and moisture can't seep in!

In this unit lies the secret of General Electric's unmatched record in giving the vital service you expect from a refrigerator—constant, trouble-free refrigeration year in, year out.

More than a million General Electric Refrigerators have been in service 10 years or longer.

Go to your General Electric retailer now and see the amazingly compact Space Maker models. They're the answer to every woman's demand for more food-storage capacity inside the refrigerator with no increase in floor space. General Electric Company, Bridgeport 2, Conn.

to leave her children while she works to support them!

Other tax laws seem unfair to women. Think of the inheritance tax as it works out in some instances:

A woman worked with her husband to build up his business so that they should have an independent income for retirement. She worked at her profession, put money into his investments. But at his prime he suddenly died, leaving most of these holdings in his own name. She finds that what they considered their joint property is shrinking vastly since, at least under state laws, it is considered his, not theirs, and she has large taxes to pay on the "inheritance."

Don't you think these situations should be called to the attention of women?

Dear Editors: Just the other day there was a gentle tapping on the screen door, and there stood this beautiful creature.

Visitor from the forest.

His huge brown eyes kept watching me as I stepped out, put my hand on his head and called to my sister. He then very obligingly turned and faced the camera.

His reward consisted of half a grapefruit, three or four cookies, a piece of cake and a handful of oatmeal. Having finished, he slowly walked toward the cabin beside ours. Soon we heard a gentle tapping on our neighbor's screen door.

Sincerely yours,

Not Everybody Can Stay Home

Oklahoma City, Oklahoma.

Dear Editor: About the time I was expecting word that my son Bill would be released from the Army, we received a letter saying the commanding general of his field had selected him as his aide and personal pilot. We were not surprised, because Bill had over 5000 hours in the air, wears the DFC with four oak-leaf clusters and has been awarded the Air Medal six times. We were quite proud—but that was before we found out how the public now feels toward any boy who happens to stay in the service one minute longer than he absolutely has to!

Our friends soon questioned, "When will Bill be home? Surely he's out of the Army by now, isn't he?" Upon being told he isn't they answered, "Well, I shouldn't have thought Bill was the kind of boy who'd want to stay in the Army when everyone else is out—can't he get his old job back?"

After several months of this, we began to justify his staying in by explaining what a wonderful job he had, what good pay. They'd counter with, "Oh, but think what a life Army people live!" Others would say, "Yes, and to think we're paying for all that!" They are simply through with the armed forces now! A boy in uniform on the streets now is stared at in the same manner as one in civilian clothes was only a short year ago.

So I decided to see what was causing Bill to stay in. I remained at his field two

"It's going to be wonderful tonight!"

As Kathryn stood there, waiting for the boy she loved to waltz her into the glittering ballroom, she knew this was her night of nights.

Never had she felt so completely happy or looked so immaculately fresh and sweet.

Indeed that eternal freshness was one of Kathryn's charms. It was something that she strove for, recognizing it almost as a passport to the popularity she had known since her teens.

Just to look at her was to realize that here was a girl far too clever, far too fastidious to ever take chances with off-color breath (halitosis).

Can You Be Sure?

Can you say as much for yourself? Do you foolishly take your breath for granted? Well . . . don't!

One little offense (and you may not know when you're guilty) can stamp you as a person to avoid.

Follow the delightful precaution that countless popular people take . . . Listerine Antiseptic night and morning and between times when you want to be at your best. While sometimes systemic, most cases of halitosis, say some authorities, are due to the bacterial fermentation of tiny food particles clinging to mouth surfaces. Listerine Antiseptic halts such fermentation, and then overcomes the odors fermentation causes.

Keep Your Eye on the Ball

BY STRUTHERS BURT

IN football, in tennis, in baseball, in golf, in every game where there is a ball, there is one fundamental, underlying rule: keep your eye on it—the ball. In all ball games where there are two opposing sides, your opponent tries to deceive you in this respect. Either, as in baseball and tennis, he tries to put the ball where you are not, or, as in football, he fakes a play in one direction, and then runs in another. Unless you are alert and wary, you'll lose.

Words are even more deceptive than a ball. Especially big and all-embracing words. Political words. Economic words. Social words. Unless you know just what you are saying when you use them, the first thing you know you'll be way off balance, and all mixed up, and you won't know where your opponent is, or even who he is. Or, changing the figure, you won't know what it is you are fighting. The point you should attack. Where you should man your defenses. Furthermore, in every period, in almost every decade, there are especial pet words, and the unwary and ill-informed, the angry and the careless, also the sly and evil-intentioned, hurl them about with conscious or unconscious recklessness.

When you say a man is a communist, whether you know it or not, you are saying a certain definite thing. It is exactly like (Continued on Page 155)

Justice and Common Cause

BY DOROTHY THOMPSON

THERE is a new movement in America taking on supporters with speed, which calls itself by the attractive title "Common Cause.*" The merit of this movement is that it seeks to recall to the people of the United States the essentials of their own great tradition, and to remind them that this country, far from being the reactionary center of the universe, as so many people at home and abroad now describe it, was actually "brought forth upon this continent"—and not, historically, very long ago—as a "new nation," and a new type of nation, breaking radically with traditional European system.

"Here below to live is to change": neither persons nor nations nor civilizations remain static; they are always growing or they are certainly declining; and to resist all change is to resist life.

But it is also true that neither persons nor nations can fall out of their own characters with impunity, and that change and reform are constructive only when they evolve naturally out of the essential character and tradition of a people.

The United States of America was a new kind of nation and a new kind of state. It was a new kind of nation—and it is still a new kind of nation—because it broke completely with former parochial conceptions of the nature of nationhood. Some sort of race theory lies at the foundation of all European and Oriental states. A Frenchman bases his citizenship in France on the fact that he is "French"; that is to say, of a certain original race and language. Even the newest states of Europe could not cut themselves loose from that parochial conception. Indeed, they would be shocked at Walt Whitman's remark about "the ignominy of a nativity"; Whitman saw race and nativity as something to rise above, not to fix oneself into. Ever since the last war, the states of Europe have been busy getting rid of citizens, or subjects, who were not "born" Czech, or Yugoslav, or of a nationality that could be described as "kindred" as to language or race. And the Soviet Union, though it is a federation of many nationalities, is not a melting pot of them, but keeps them separate.

THE United States completely separated itself from this parochial concept of nationhood and was assisted in doing so because of a radical conception of the nature of the state as such. In the rest of the world, the state is of ancient lineage and its whole history is one of subjection: of the person as "subject"—to a king, a prince, a lord of the manor or whatever constituted the state; the person or his ancestors were born subject, and evolution to democracy occurred in stages whereby the people wrenched themselves free by degrees from that original subjection, often only to relapse into a new subjection later.

But in America the people antedated the state. When they broke with the foreign power which ruled them, they created a new form of state, and they created it straight out of mind and intellect. The concept which they introduced was that the state is a creation of the people; that the people are always supreme, and delegate to the state only certain functions; that apart and outside of those functions, the state has no sovereignty; and that, to put it in a nutshell, the state exists as the result of a contract.

In other words, the people did not struggle to take something from the state, because they were creating a brand-new one. They conceived of themselves as being the prime movers—as indeed they were—and decided just what to give to government and the various branches of it and what to withhold. And they withheld a lot. They withheld, among other things, the right of the state to exercise any control whatsoever over religion, or to tie itself to any establishment of religion, or to control the thoughts of the citizens and their expression of them, or to organize the police for the purpose of maintaining the government itself in power, or to institute cruel and unusual punishments, or to make arbitrary arrests, or to deprive people of their property without due process of law.

But the main thing was the concept that the state exists as the result of a contract with the people; it derives from them, and

Here's an idea that puts the super-deluxe in your old friend, the Baked Apple.

Secret number one is Club Aluminum Hammercraft Waterless Cookware—in this case a Dutch Oven.

Secret number two is this set of directions:

Core apples two-thirds through. Fill with sugar and seal with butter. Arrange in layers in your Club Aluminum Dutch Oven (or saucepan for small quantity). Cover and cook over low heat 15 minutes or until tender. Take out, top with whipped cream, and serve something that brings back the Garden of Eden to an apple.

Yes, Club Aluminum cooking is "Full Flavor" cooking—meats, fruits, vegetables. The kind that makes happier tables.

So start your Club Aluminum set from the nine pieces now available. And, make someone else "pot-happy" with a gift of silvery hammered Club Aluminum for wedding or anniversary. It's the famous cookware formerly sold through home demonstrations, now sold by leading retailers.

in them, and not in it, reposes ultimate sovereignty.

Not only do we Americans have a state thus built on contract; our whole society is a society of contract. It is much more accurate to call it that than to call it a "capitalist" or "private-enterprise" state. A true "capitalist" state would be one ruled by capitalists and existing altogether for capitalists, capitalists being the owners and controllers of all wealth and all politics, and all others being subject to their whims. That has never been the case in the United States, and is less so today than ever.

The essence of American democracy, as far as the political life is concerned, is that the state exists by contract with the people, who can enlarge or limit its powers through constitutionally provided procedures for constitutional change; that the system provides for checks and balances as a means of protecting the ultimate sovereignty of the people; and that within constitutional rules and restrictions decisions are made by majorities of elected representatives, but always without prejudice to the constitutional rights of the minority.

And the basis of our economic life is that every citizen is free to contract for his own labor—whether he contracts individually, or through an organization of other laborers, or whether he sells his services for a fee, or engages himself at a salary, or whether he contracts for the labor of others. Thus contract is the basis of our society, and also the basis of American liberty.

Immigrants by the millions came to this country freely to assume a contractual citizenship regardless of European nationhood.

Such a free society, based on contract between the citizens and the state and the citizens and one another, cannot set as its goal the guaranty of every person's security by the state, for it presumes the right and capacity of every adult to make his own bed and lie in it. No free society can guarantee anyone against his own errors, for if a man is to be guaranteed against his own errors, he must at the same time be deprived of the right to make his own decisions! The two things belong, in the nature of things, together. The state can, and should, make provisions for circumstances of misfortune which are beyond the control of individuals; it can and should use the power and means of the state to avert or temper the effects of great rises and falls in economic life as a whole, resulting from periods of overinvestment or underinvestment and other economic causes. It properly should regulate conditions of contract by law, as, for instance, in the Workmen's Compensation Act.

But the moment it infringes on the rights of the citizens individually or collectively to contract for their own labor or for the labor of others, it will destroy American society. For that is the basis of American society.

Now, the issue in matters of contract is always justice. The American concept is not that if we have general security guaranteed by the state, we shall have justice. The American tradition greatly distrusts the state except for the performance of limited functions. The American concept is that if we have a society of just contract we shall get general security with liberty.

American reform movements stray from the American goal and the American character if they lose sight for a moment of the goal of justice between free men in their contractual relations with one another. There is no injustice in a man or a group of men employing others on an enterprise aimed at profit. All economic enterprises, whether conducted by private persons or state bureaucrats, must aim at profit, for the opposite of a profitable economy is a bankrupt one. It is in the order of nature, also, and the variety of human capacities, that some men look for and take responsibility and risk, whereas others prefer to offer services in exchange for less fortune and less responsibility. The issue of justice comes into the matter of determining what are fair conditions: returns, fixed in contract, to the elements that create an economy or dustry: those who contribute their s those who contribute technical, scier managerial brains; and those who con labor.

Injustice occurs where there is not f reasonable distribution of returns, a element in the economy may suffer justice, not power, is the goal. In times and industries gross injustice h done to labor. But injustice can done—and sometimes has been—to o ements in the economy. Injustice es occurs when elements of extortion ar duced into the economy, whereby sor gets something out of it for nothing; to say, gets something that does not tice belong to him.

Almost invariably, totally unearn crement accrues through the political, economic, means. If, for instance, a growers' association is able, by or pressures, so to influence a state legi that it gives their members grazing ri public parks and other properties of domain free, or at a price below valu have managed a legal thievery. The belongs to the people; it has been pur by them for purposes of soil conser recreation and national beauty. If private individuals fatten their cattle which they have neither purchased no they are getting something for nothin is unjust.

I have always believed that all re of nature—the wealth which exists cause of the work or investment of m because of the bounty of nature—sho long at all times to the whole people does not mean tha natural resources or should not be dev by private enterpris it does mean tha must be leased, not that private enterpr not buy or sell th profit, but may only develop them for able profit, commensurate with furt investment in their exploitation.

In our days the discovery of atomic as a source of power must lead inexora a recognition of just and unjust own The scientists who discovered the fis elements cannot claim ownership of they but discovered a secret of natu atomic energy was there always—th not create it.

The question of the adequacy o compensation is another matter. Bu required also immense amounts of c which was furnished by a tax upo whole American people. This does no that in the future private enterprise not employ atomic energy as power. mean they must lease it, not own it, i is to be justice.

There will never be perfect justi there will never be a perfect social orde best man is not perfect, and no socia can be more perfect than the best ma the search for justice is the highest s of man and societies.

And it is only in the quest for justic all men, of all classes, can make co cause. If the quest is for power—the nation of one class, for instance, ov other—society must be divided into t terest factions, for the contenders wi know that with the victory of the justice for the other will cease.

Justice, the grave goddess, holds the Justice is equilibrium, hence peace.

And the sense of justice is an inbor in man. Every child has it. Let h punished for a wrongdoing, and he angry or hurt, but he will accept the ment. But let him be unjustly punish the wound will fester without healin the injustice is righted.

A sense of which all are sensitive which all are sensible is a bindin among mankind. Justice, and only can therefore be the creator and obje a common cause.

Even a small star shines in the darkness. —Danish Proverb.

Every month there is at least one good resounding nostalgic novel. THERE'S A SPOT IN MY HEART, by FRANK LESLIE (condensed in the December JOURNAL), is the May contribution—a hilarious account of life with Mother and Grandfather and Grandmother, Uncle George and McCloskey, the cook, in the helter-skelter well-to-do household of the Monahans a generation back.

Grandmother was pious and lived on terms of intimacy with several saints, the most frequently called upon being the patron saint of lost articles ("Good Saint Anthony, please find my garters!"). Uncle George was a "cyclone trapped in a barrel." Once he brought home a girl named Mildred to meet the family. After she had gone Grandfather said she was as "distinguished-looking as a pile of sand," and when months later Grandmother asked why Mildred had never come again, Grandfather answered, "I think that she got mixed in with a load of cement and is now part of the fifth floor of the Flatiron Building." Needless to say, Uncle George never married. Grandfather went all the way in underestimating the influence of a woman. "What a woman has to say above a whisper is seldom worth hearing" was one of his pleasanter axioms. In tune with Grandfather, McCloskey, the cook, recognized that she was living in a man's world. When serving at table she served Grandfather first, Uncle George next, then the lad (who reports all this) himself. Grandmother came next and Mother—whose brain, according to Grandfather, was still struggling to be born—was a permanent last. Guests were served as they fitted into McCloskey's philosophy, regardless of place at the table. If a priest came, all others present got only what amounted to a buffet supper.

Office girls test new napkin—
82 out of 103 report no chafing with new Free-Stride Modess!

East, West, North, South—the bright girls who smooth the path of business have made a smooth discovery for you!

It all started when stenographers, typists, clerks—girls who had suffered chafing with their regular napkin—were asked to test a new, improved napkin, Free-Stride Modess.

The girls weren't told the brand or name. They were simply asked to see if it gave them freedom from chafe.

Here are the astonishing results: 82 out of 103 girls reported no chafing with new Free-Stride Modess!

The secret of the chafe-free comfort which so many smart young business women found in Free-Stride Modess lies in the clever fashioning of the napkin edges.

Free-Stride Modess has extra cotton—extra softness on its edges—right where the cause of chafe begins.

The extra cotton also acts to direct and retain moisture inside the napkin, keeping the edges dry and smooth longer. (And dry, smooth edges don't chafe!)

So safe, too! Free-Stride Modess has a triple safety shield—a wonderful guard against accidents. And a fine, sealed-in deodorant to help keep you fresh as spring. No telltale outlines with Free-Stride Modess—it's silhouette-proof!

Try this luxury-comfortable, luxury-safe napkin now. Free-Stride Modess is on sale everywhere.

out to the Germans for a questionable peace, are now supporting another Munich, as far as Poland is concerned, according to the Ciechanowski book. This is the story of Poland's tragedy—Poland, who was first to fight the Germans, who never had a Quisling, who is yet abandoned by her original allies. Churchill openly gave up the Polish cause before the war was over, while Roosevelt, as far as the world could see, was putting off a decision. On this the Polish government placed great hope. But actually, as Molotov revealed in October, 1944 (again according to this book), Roosevelt had accepted the Russian plan of the Curzon Line nearly a year before (at Teheran), and had insisted on secrecy. Poland had thus been sold out to Russia far more baldly than Czechoslovakia to the Germans at Munich. Of course Defeat in Victory is partisan. But it contains many incontrovertible facts, and it lifts the veil of Washington diplomacy which we certainly, by now, have every right to have lifted.

Apropos of the not infrequent mutual attraction of British and Slavs, there is an excellent book, I MARRIED A RUSSIAN: LETTERS FROM KHARKOV, which is a collection of the letters written by an English girl, married to a Russian scientist and living in Kharkov from 1930 on. The letters are to her sister, and in them, sisterlike, she tells all—the good and the bad. Here is without the shadow of a doubt the unvarnished truth about how one family, at least, lives in Russia. And it is good to know that life, though often awkward, is not unbearable, and that this particular young Englishwoman, though she visited her English family occasionally during the years, was always glad to get back home to Kharkov. She isn't politically minded—really. She talks about food and babies and clothes and bedbugs. But she is 100 per cent behind the regime. One is especially sure of that from the very fact that she writes so little about it, and when she does, so casually, taking it for granted, much as we do Democrats or Republicans. Of course her husband must have been favored, being one of the nuclear physicists. Nevertheless, there are Americans who believe that all but the top ten in Russia want to get out of their country, and this is for the record, that they don't—not all of them anyway.

The Role of the Community in Preventing Juvenile Neglect

By Margaret Hickey

Editor, Public Affairs Department

JUVENILE delinquency can happen in the best of families. The "bad boy" or "bad girl" comes from the right side of town almost as often as from the wrong side of the tracks. Approximately one half of the children in America's better-off families, according to reliable statistics, grow up in homes lacking in emotional stability and plain "horse sense" about children's needs. Death, divorce, illness, constant moving—these are the factors which implant the germs of juvenile delinquency in any family.

Society has a tendency to point the accusing finger at the parents. "It's all the parents' fault—let them go and learn better," society says.

In San Francisco, a scheme to educate the parents has been in operation since May, 1943. This "school for delinquent parents" is administered by the public schools. After its first three months of existence, the school had prescribed attendance by parents referred from the juvenile court. Yet a careful sampling survey over a period of four months at the Parent Guidance Center revealed no "spectacular successes." Punishing the parents by sending them to school is not a complete solution for juvenile delinquency. The survey also failed to prove that any adjustment in individual cases was due to the parents' attendance at the center.

In an enlightening report on this project, the National Probation Association points out that special schools for parents of delinquent children may become community liabilities. It often proves humiliating for parents to be directed to the center. Further, parents of "bad children" may or may not themselves be inadequate, ignorant or delinquent. The development of a real program of education for successful parenthood should be made available and appealing to all. Attract the good with the bad parents, says the association, and the stigma of attendance will be removed.

> "New life is stirring in the roots of local community institutions; a new initiative is strengthening community agencies to promote the people's common interests—locally financed rural libraries, public-health services, town planning boards, county fire-protection units, state conservation boards concerned with stream pollution and public parks, and so on. These are but first returns of this burgeoning sense of community responsibility, which is but another way of saying an ethical concern of one man for the well-being of his neighbor."
> DAVID E. LILIENTHAL
> Science and the Human Spirit
> Before The American Library Association
> Buffalo, New York, June 21, 1946

But educating the parents is not enough. The community as well must be made aware of its danger spots for the breeding of delinquency. Such an attempt to reach community-wide has been made in Chicago by the Association of Family Living. They co-operate with church groups, P.T.A.'s, settlement houses and other community organizations. Last year the association worked with a total of 750 groups, reaching 13,823 parents. They try to interpret the ways and needs of children in the years of growing up. Workers counsel parents collectively, and offer individual interviews for a small fee. The staff offers leadership in planning child-guidance courses, programs in schools on premarriage education, counseling for the mature person, and further research.

Still another plan directed at once to parents and community has been followed by the New York State Youth Commission. Their program, "Prevention in Action," focuses attention upon the needs of "vulnerable children." They have worked through the schools first, where tests have been given by school personnel to over 5000 children from the third to the eighth grades, inclusive, in ten communities. Special consideration is given the child who is either markedly above or below average in intelligence, or handicapped by some physical or health defect.

The keystone of the plan is the Youth Bureau, set up in individual communities and locally sponsored by the several agencies of home, school, church, welfare, health and recreation. Juvenile delinquency thus assumes a major role in the municipality rather than a minor one handled by welfare or law-enforcement agencies. To the Youth Bureau come disturbed parents, school authorities, interested citizens. Recreation is often used as a pleasant foil for the necessary educational and psychological counseling youth needs. Each center has a full-time staff and a representative advisory committee of citizens.

Strengthen the home, correct early tendencies toward delinquency and create a healthy community environment, advises the commission. Like the old proverb, a stitch in time in the character-building of a child may save nine in the future.

Is the behavior of your neighbor's child your business? It may very well be. You and I create the sort of community our neighbors' children live and grow in. The bad child of today is the delinquent parent of tomorrow. Let's inoculate our communities against the disease before it becomes epidemic.

THE SMITHFIELD RECREATION ASSOCIATION

By Joan Younger

MARCELLO

A mountain of fun—built by community spirit.

THE events leading up to the crime were, in police vernacular, routine. The boy left school on his sixteenth birthday and went to Philadelphia and found a job. He lost it after two months and couldn't find another. He went home, where he was just one more mouth to feed and where there was little for a boy to do. He quarreled with his family and got into trouble in the neighborhood. Then one night he killed the man next door after roundly beating him.

"I knew that boy was a bad one," a state trooper said after his confession. "Two months ago I picked him up on suspicion and took him home. I told his father if he didn't punish him and hold him in check he'd have real trouble on his hands."

In its unpleasant way this story is typical of many juvenile-crime stories. The warning signs of restlessness; the lack of understanding on the part of the parents; the failure of the youth; the stern but vague voice of discipline saying "You be good or you'll get punished." Then the revenge, the brutal crime, confessed without emotion, without motive, without reason or driving desire.

It happened that this story's locale was Garden City, New Jersey. With variations, the same sort of thing has taken place in thousands of other American towns and cities.

But it has never happened in Smithfield, Rhode Island, and it never will.

These are strong words. But they could be said not only about Smithfield, but about many other cities and towns. "No news is good news," runs the old adage, and "Good news is no news" could well be said to be its modern counterpart. The homes where there are good will and understanding, the towns where there are serenity and high responsibility are infrequently heard from. Smithfield is one of the quiet places. (Continued on Page 102)

If You Ask Me

BY ELEANOR ROOSEVELT

Do you think the number of children parents plan to have should be influenced by the family's income? After all, a man doesn't know how much he'll be making when his children reach college age, so how can he judge?

It probably isn't possible for a man to judge how much he will be making when his children reach college age, but if he goes along and has children reasonably spaced, he is apt to have a fairly good idea of how he is getting on in the world.

Don't you think if people learned to say "cancer" without shuddering or whispering, more victims would consult physicians when the first significant symptoms appear?

Yes, I think you are right, and I think the sooner we learn that cancer is curable if recognized in time, the greater the chances of curing and saving more people who suffer from this disease.

My daughter has been working for about a year—since her graduation from college—and receives a fairly good salary. However, we still buy her clothes and frequently give her money for "extras." We can afford to do this, and if we didn't she would have to give up some of her week-end trips and various activities that she enjoys. But I sometimes wonder whether we're really being fair to her. If she marries someone of moderate means—as she probably will—I'm not sure that she will be able to make the necessary adjustment easily. What do you think we should do?

I think when a girl or a boy is through with her or his education and starts out to earn a living, it is very salutary to have to live on a salary. In fact, if a child earning a living has to pay something for board and lodging at home, I think it will give him a better idea of what living costs amount to, and even if the parents take the money and put it into a fund for that child to have in the future, I think it is a good experience.

In our freshman year at high school we had a course given by a public-health nurse covering many phases of health, and also some sex education. We liked it because it was the most wholesome and natural approach and we could ask questions which we hesitate to discuss with our parents. But the course was so short! Why can't all high schools have a semester of this kind of instruction, just when girls need it most?

If such a course is well given, I think the kind of instruction that you seem to have had is well worth while; but if it cannot be given well at school, then I think the parents should manage to answer the questions and a child should not hesitate to ask whatever is on his or her mind. This is natural curiosity, and knowledge is necessary for safety.

Should an elderly woman with no means of livelihood have a sense of guilt at having to take charity from the county? True, I'm not physically fit to hold a job, and my three daughters have all they can do to keep their own families. But I can't help that feeling that if people knew (besides the bank and county employees) I just couldn't face them. Is it guilt or false pride? I earned my own way since I was 13 years old, married at 17, widowed at 36, and lost close to $20,000 in the depression years. Maybe it's that word "indigent" on the check. I don't know. What do you think?

I certainly do not think you should have any sense of guilt. In a few short years I hope Social Security will mean that everybody who has worked during the best years of their life will have sufficient to live on from the time they stop work. In the meantime, I wish that checks did not have to carry the word "indigent"; but just forget about it, and certainly do not feel any sense of shame or guilt.

In my state only 8 per cent of the feeble-minded are in institutions. Do you believe the remaining 92 per cent who are at large should be allowed to produce children three times as fast as normal citizens? Would it not be better to sterilize the mentally deficient and prevent children from being born to feeble-minded parents?

I have always felt that in some way the objectives you are suggesting should be achieved. Just how to do it is the difficulty, since some states do not have the proper legislation, and in other cases there are religious scruples to be encountered, but it seems quite terrible to allow the mentally unfit to continue to have children.

Which of the many honorable and enviable jobs you have undertaken do you enjoy the most?

I think I enjoy most my service on the United Nations, though while I am actually doing the work, I find the amount of time consumed going back and forth leaves me so little time for myself that I feel a little driven and sometimes a little resentful! Nevertheless, the work is very interesting and I feel that if we succeed, this small amount of sacrifice will mean nothing to any of us. Almost equally, however, though for different reasons, I enjoy writing, so I am a fortunate person.

I am a retired teacher, 70 years old, with a pension which would keep me in comparative comfort—one room in a residential hotel in the heart of the city. My children are married and the gulf between us is wide. We don't seem to see eye to eye. I have no social life; was always too busy with my work and study to build one. Have very few friends and am no mixer. Homes for the aged require all our possessions. I cannot give them up, for I paid a high price for my independence. Now I wonder, is there any place for people like me? I am "not alone," I know that.

I think there are many people who are lonesome as they grow older, but I wonder if you could not do something to narrow the gulf between you and the younger generation. Usually we cannot see eye to eye because we grew up in different periods, and have different viewpoints, but we can listen understandingly to each other, and those of us who are older can provide patience and tolerance and interest for the young. When we get older we see more and more clearly that it is only through companionship with the young that we ourselves can stay young.

I am twenty-two and an unusually shy person. I am attractive enough and have nice clothes and I definitely am not conceited, but I don't seem to have nearly as many friends as those who are less fortunate than I. Please advise.

I really cannot advise you except to say that if you would stop worrying about yourself and think about others, and give them a good time, you probably would find yourself gathering more friends around you, and before you knew it you would have as many friends as you wanted.

Many things that were frowned upon by society in 1897 seem to be accepted by most people today. Do you think this is a sign of social advancement, or of moral regression?

It depends entirely on what those are. Some things that were frowned upon in 1897 can well be accepted today. Others we would be wise to continue to oppose.

THE SUB-DEB • • • • • EDITED BY MAUREEN DALY

BELIEVE in fairy stories? Well, here's an old-fashioned, little-girl tale that may interest you. It's about Little Red Riding Hood, the ingénue character who put on her red hood one day and plodded through the woods with a basket of goodies (fried chicken legs and sugar cookies, to you) for her grandmother. She was sitting on a tree stump, adjusting her ankle-strap sandal, when she heard a long, low whistle, and there, peeking from behind a tree, was a big, brown character with a bow tie, and a broad grin on his face. She took one quick look, picked up her basket and went off through the woods at a fast clip. The girl arrived at her grandmother's safe and sound, delivered the basket, and went home wisely by another path. All of which proves Red Riding Hood wasn't so dumb after all—she knew a wolf when she saw one!

And if the little girl in the red cape weren't so busy playing nursemaid to Grandma Hood, she might pass on this sound information to all other girls who go out for strolls alone, or even with their girl chums. It's a set of six rules to pin in your pocketbook next time you go out on a long, lone walk, or to remember even if you're just sauntering down to the local drugstore for a sundae with the rest of your Sub-Deb club.

Don't talk to strangers. In our modern dating system, a girl no longer needs a chaperon, a family tree and calling cards to strike up a boy-girl friendship, but don't think that "Hiya, honey!" is a formal introduction either. Make up your mind right now that you'll never meet Guy Madison standing on a street corner with a cigarette hanging out of his mouth, watching the girls go by. Boys worth knowing are too busy for that. On trains, in busses or at public gatherings, you'll have to use your own good judgment in deciding where to draw the line between casual conversation and pickup talk—but don't let your comments or attitude start anything you wouldn't want to write about in your diary afterward!

Don't accept a ride with a stranger. If you're waiting for a public conveyance or just walking on the street and something sharp on four wheels pulls up at the curb to ask if you're going his way, simply say, "No, thank you," and look the other way. Don't get huffy, don't antagonize the chap, but don't get into the car either. Most fellows think that a girl who is willing to be picked up is also willing, and some of those boys have the wrong idea about what is meant by "driver's license."

Don't be a pickup date. And that includes boys in drugstores, dance halls, on street corners, at roller rinks—even boys round your own neighborhood. You should know something about a boy before you accept a date with him! Most high-school girls have ample opportunity to get to know datable material without resorting to the pickup method. You meet boys in school, you meet them in church groups, you meet them through civic activities, and you meet them through friends. You may need personality polishing and a bright smile, but you can always find one boy who likes you. But as a pickup date, you are immediately typed—just another girl who isn't too particular who her friends are or where she finds them. And a boy will never forget that yours started as an "on the hoof" friendship.

Don't "hang around" public places. It's a great big world, full of interesting places to go; but if you must go around alone or with a girl friend—do try to look as if you're going somewhere, not just walking along waiting to be stopped. Even if you're at the public library doing an evening of studying, keep your mind on your books! A girl who is constantly seen in parks, parading up and down Main Street or just wandering around town will soon get a reputation for being "fast"—even though she's honestly just out for a breath of fresh air.

Don't stay out too late, don't visit "date places" without dates and don't walk down dark streets alone or with a girl friend. Most of the bright-eyed boys get home to bed early, so if you're out in the whee hours of the morning, your chances of running into trouble are greater. And if you go alone or with another girl to a place where most of the fellows and girls are in pairs, everyone will presume you came in looking for an easy evening. And remember, there is a difference between "being afraid" and "using common sense"—so keep away from dark streets or sections of town where you know you might run into loiterers.

Don't dress, talk, look or walk as if you want to be picked up. It may sound old-fashioned, but if you "behave like a lady" you will be treated as one—so watch your walk and your talk. And though all girls want to be attractive to boys, it doesn't take tight skirts, red sandals and sequins to do it. A fresh-and-healthy look is much more appealing—and will cause you less trouble!

IT COULDN'T HAPPEN TO YOU!

Oh, yes, it could! Why not be smart about all this? Misfortune, unhappiness or even violence could happen to you just as it could to any girl you know, hear about or read about in the papers. You're sure you "know" yourself—but you don't know all the people you see and meet every day. You won't have to be a snob, a coldhearted character or any kind of prude—but there is a difference between being easy-going and simply "easy." Just don't let yourself take chances with strangers! It isn't smart and it isn't safe. And since you should have a lot of good happy years ahead of you, don't spoil everything now! Just act as smart as you look!

LETTERS TO JOAN

This is the third in a series of letters from a mother to her daughter, in which standards of today are discussed, frankly and understandingly — to insure the success of tomorrow.

BY GLADYS DENNY SHULTZ

REST JOAN AND GIRLS:

at am I doing, anyway—conducting nar on Sex, by remote control? I'm e I have the qualifications! But I do could have sat in on the discussion ter on petting evoked.

principal objection, I take it, was plication that a girl should not "go nit" in her relations with men, and her naïve assumption that if she did, ght become pregnant. Various girls d out that birth control has changed
t. Women have desires and passions, men do—I admitted it. With birth l to protect us from the consequences ar to our sex, why shouldn't we, asks
:l, gratify them just as men do?

as interested in Shirley's comment: 's the trouble with the advice our rs give us. They always want us to virgins, and why should we?"

also in the point Jenny raised: what ng, if it comes to that, with having an mate child? It's an incontrovertible s she says, that there won't be husenough to go around for all the girls r generation. A great many will be motherhood if they wait for mar-intelligent women, perfectly capable porting and bringing up children.
houldn't they have babies too? Why any stigma be attached to this?

heaven's sake, Joan, don't apologize ssing these criticisms along. I realize ou youngsters are confronted with ons and with problems that we of my tion never had to face. Our society state of violent change, and perhaps oral concepts my friends and I grew are due to change with it.

all means let us look at these things er. I don't assume for a minute that w all the answers—indeed, I suspect he middle-aged are as confused as an possibly be. But on the other experimentation along these lines is new thing in the world. I dare say ll the possible variations of sex behave been tried, time and again. In etime, I've seen quite a few of these urricular arrangements and have d to the stories of many people. I least pass along to you the results, ou can use your own intelligence to e them in terms of human happiness.
what you girls are aiming at, after all, y of life, under conditions as they are
, which will give you the greatest hapand fulfillment as women. Correct?
ll for that, believe me. I'll try to get from prejudice and preconceived and give you the best thinking I'm le of. You girls jump on any weak in my argument. I'll welcome it.

I assume that, whatever the morals future are to be, none of you are to take on motherhood just yet. I st, therefore, that we start out by ng at birth control, since it has an tant bearing on these matters. Also subject on which I can give you facts, st opinions.

a point of departure in your own ng, you ought to know that birth ol is not as simple or as foolproof as it ls to the uninitiated. I am reminded reaction of the young son of one of iends, when she described to him all the various methods in detail, outlining the hazards, difficulties and relative merits of each one. She thought she was doing a bang-up job, in the best modern tradition, and I am sure she was.

"H'm," mused the boy when she had finished, "I should think it would be so much simpler just not to have intercourse!"

The fact is that any method of birth control now known either involves some apparatus, which on occasion may not be available, or else entails a rather large amount of self-control, and a very high sense of responsibility on the part of the man. The kind of man who possesses that much responsibility is inclined, I rather believe, to marry the woman of his choice rather than subject her to the risks of illicit love. That, however, is just opinion. (But I think it would be very interesting to know whether this sense of responsibility has declined in men as women have become more openly anxious for sex experience.)

Second, no method of birth control now known is completely infallible—medical literature will assure you of that. The most reliable one requires an individual fitting on the part of a skilled physician, otherwise it's not dependable. And even then accidents can happen. (Reputable physicians, I might add, do not, if they know it, give fittings except to married women or brides-to-be.)

As for the other methods, their efficacy depends to a considerable extent upon luck plus the potency of the man and the fertility of the woman involved. I had one friend who, having had one baby after another, was trying everything in a rather desperate effort to limit her family. Once more obviously pregnant, she met another friend on the street one day.

"Stay away from ——" warned the fecund lady, naming one of the most widely advertised solutions. "There's a baby in every bottle!" You'll hear many similar tales after you are married.

THIRD, human nature being what it is, and the romantic urge being what it is, couples are few, in and out of marriage, who do not at one time or another take a chance. Quite often there are no consequences. But both men and women differ widely in their degree of fertility. One girl may escape time and time again. Another may be "caught," as the old wives express it, at her one and only misstep. It's a thing that can't be determined in advance.

Even with all due precaution, there is some risk, and it's particularly high in the case of the young and inexperienced. More than one bride and groom, who had intended to wait awhile before starting their family, find themselves parents before the end of a year. Old married couples, too, have offspring they hadn't planned for.

I am not denying that birth control has greatly cut down the risk of pregnancy, and for many people it works without mischance. No doubt it has played a large part in the general loosening of morals. But I wouldn't be carrying my end of this discussion if I didn't warn you that it's by no means 100 per cent effective. Any normal woman who has sexual experience must figure that she takes some chance of becoming pregnant.

Fifty Years Ago in the Journal

IN May, 1897, imaginations were stirred by the chess match played by telegraph between our House of Representatives and the British House of Commons. Oscar Wilde was released from prison, and Cambridge University voted to refuse degrees to women. Twenty were killed when a tally-ho coach hit a Long Island train; and Harry Truman became a teen-ager.

In the May, 1897, JOURNAL, Editor Bok takes men to task for spitting. "The sidewalk in front of the rural general store or post office is made almost impassable to woman by this offense. She cannot keep her skirts constantly free of the sidewalk . . . yet this dangerous and filthy practice is allowed to go on without any attempt to check it."

"Family portraits should not be hung in the dining room," rules homemaking expert Sarah Tyson Rorer, who fails to give a reason.

"Stella: When it is necessary for a girl of seventeen to pay long visits to a dentist's office, she should be accompanied by her mother."

"Where one servant is kept and the laundry done at home, four or five dollars a week is a fair price for trained help," believes Mrs. Rorer. She adds, "Servants are only human beings, yet we expect them to go like machines from five in the morning until eleven at night. See that they get a full afternoon off on Thursdays."

"Bonnie: It is not in good taste, nor even proper, for young ladies to go alone to a hotel to dine with men."

"Verdant: At a matinee, there would be no impropriety in expressing gentle applause, but a loud clapping of the hands would be decidedly vulgar."

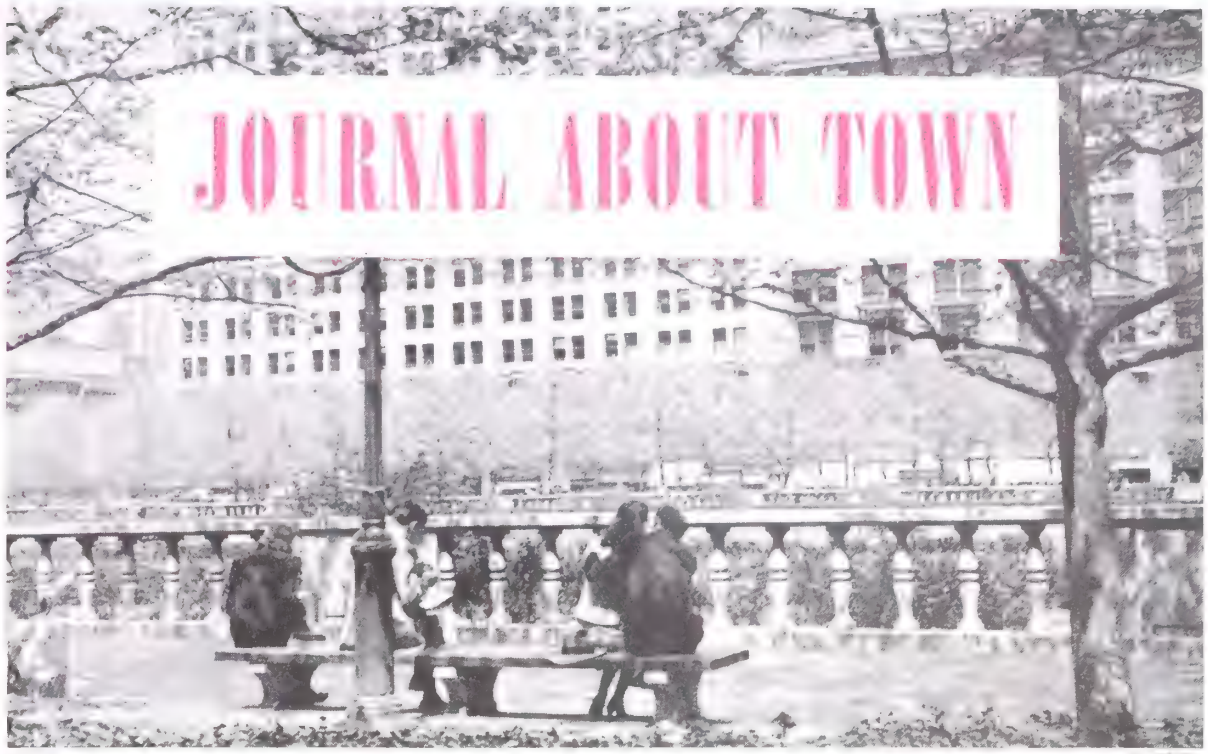
"Irene: No matter how long your gloves are, they should be entirely taken off at supper."

"Always address, in letters, a servant in the third person," admonishes Walter Germain.

"Netty: The word 'golf' is pronounced as though spelled 'goff.'"

New parasol: "A dainty protection from the sun is of pale blue silk."

JOURNAL ABOUT TOWN



In the spring—in Bryant Park—a young man's fancy lightly turns from Proust to love.

Gossip about people you know, editors you like and what goes on in New York.

ONE of the most literary parks we know, and one of the loveliest in spring, is the one down the street from the Workshop and right back of the public library. Very European in feeling, under its fresh green canopy of plane trees, with regiments of bulbs and formal balustrades, it makes an immense outdoor reading room, much nicer right now than the ones inside the building it adjoins. The funny part is the hush. People, if they speak at all, speak quietly, not wishing to disturb other people deep in practically anything from Plato to Proust—or even their own romances, on account of its being spring.

The talk we overhear in our elevators is daily becoming more polyglot, due to the fact that one of the places where they're designing the vast U.N. establishment is downstairs, and consultant architects are dropping in from all over—France, Belgium, Russia, Greece, Poland, Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia, Sweden, Uruguay, not to mention England, Canada and Australia—to work with Wallace K. Harrison, who's the architect in charge. Don't be misled by the blocks in the picture; they're just to indicate what surrounds the site. No sketches yet to show you. And surrounding the blocks, from the left, are Corbusier, France; Bassov, U.S.S.R.; Robertson, United Kingdom; Harrison, U.S.A., and the interpreter, who unfortunately doesn't function in the elevator. . . . Come to think of it, just ten years ago this month the JOURNAL exhibited at Madison Square Garden its House of Tomorrow, which appeared in the magazine that June; the architects being this same Mr. Harrison and the late André Fouilhoux. It's still the House of Tomorrow!

The veiling on the hat that Audrey Beck is wearing on this month's cover is just a handful out of the 600,000 yards of veiling Lilly Dache uses every year, doing wonders with it, for we don't know how many women—among whom you know Marlene Dietrich, Loretta Young, Joan Crawford and Joan Fontaine. If you don't yet know Audrey Beck, it may be because she just arrived from England—her first cover in this country.

Almost half of the 650,000 fires in the United States each year occur in private dwellings. . . . An Indianapolis woman recently discovered and paid a bill that she doesn't remember contracting—a $15 fee to the doctor who delivered her into the world. . . . There are fifty miles of canals in every human tooth. . . . There are now more than twenty radio shows on the four major networks in which the audience participates and receives gifts. . . . The 3,260,000 births in the U.S. during 1946 set an all-time record. . . . A Canadian woman, who's been practicing flying by jumping off buildings with a pair of homemade wings, has got her altitude up to twenty-five feet. . . . The latest in jewelry is a palladium ring with the large center stone detachable so that the gem can be changed to match the wearer's dress. . . . Only half of U.S. farmhouses have electricity, slightly more than a fourth have running water, a sixth have bathrooms and still fewer have central heating. . . . Recent statistics indicate that families are moving from the big cities to the suburbs at the rate of 1,000,000 a year. . . . American women are getting older, says the Census Bureau. Today women over 35 account for 55 per cent of the total female population, rather than 52½ per cent, as in 1940.

A man who's helping to put on the big international philatelic exhibition at Grand Central Palace this month, celebrating the centenary of the first U. S. postage stamps, told Bruce Gould there are more than ten million stamp collectors in this country, of whom about 75 per cent are very ardent juveniles, which should guarantee an especially big attendance at the show out of school hours. Told Mr. G. that next to the most famous stamp collector of modern times, F. D. R., comes the King of England, who's sending over his father's collection—all blue stamps. He'd certainly come himself, if it weren't for his royal commitments, as would King Faruk and Queen Wilhelmina—both feverish philatelists. There'll be all kinds of special collections—stamps depicting animals, birds, airplanes, and goodness knows what else, including musical celebrities, of which Vincent Lopez and Theodore Steinway have the finest in the world, but no stamp showing Lopez—yet.

Breakfast in New York, for most wives and husbands we know, is ordinarily a brief and fairly silent meal, but for two couples in particular it is anything but that. Every morning, Ed and Pegeen Fitzgerald, over on East Thirty-sixth Street, not only talk steadily for forty minutes, but let countless people with radios listen in to their conversations—considerably about cats, for almost five thousand of which they found homes last year—while having their orange juice and coffee. Simultaneously, each morning, up on Park Avenue, the Kollmars, over another network, converse their way through a much more substantial breakfast—you can even hear Mr. K. crunching his toast. A hardier couple, the McCrarys (she is Jinx Falkenburg) arise at six-thirty and motor in to their studio from Long Island, Jinx driving, Tex typing, both breakfastless; interview themselves and other celebrities till nine (while the Fitzgeralds and Kollmars are eating over their stations), then rush down to the corner drugstore and gorge.

THE OTHER SIDE OF THE MOON

By Martha Albrand

WHEN Norah Sedley was forty-six she did not look a day older than thirty. She aged abruptly when Lou Sedley died. After that night she had somehow frozen in her outward appearance, which remained what it became during those first hours of realization of her husband's death. The lines which then, for the first time, marked her face had neither deepened nor spread, and even now looked rather like the slight indications one can see on a newly born child's face, sketched in lightly at the very beginning as a pattern for life.

There was something mysterious and fascinating about this genuinely youthful beauty of a middle-aged woman: the perfect texture of her skin, the luster of her hair, the sparkle of her eyes, the clean contour of her profile and the lithe, weightless carriage of her long slim body.

"She'll never grow old," women discussing her would sigh; but though they were envious of Mrs. Sedley's beauty, she was popular with them. They liked her more than men did.

Men, though intrigued by her personality and apt to fall wildly in love with her, still resented her aloofness, her independence. "No sex," they said, their wounded egos seizing on an explanation which could save their vanity. "Pretty as a picture and plenty of brains, but no sex."

There was never any malicious gossip about Norah Sedley. The community in which she lived respected her for never giving cause for the slightest rumor, yet felt oddly thwarted that a woman with her looks, her graciousness as a hostess, her ability to make money should remain so spotless.

Many a man had wanted to marry her throughout the years. At first her remoteness was attributed to the belief that she had loved Lou Sedley so irrevocably and completely that she couldn't even imagine any other man as a husband or a lover. Then, too, she was absorbed in her son, young Lukas Fair Sedley, who was not quite nine when Lou died so tragically. Of course it was understandable that Norah might fear a painful reaction toward any man who attempted to take his father's place. But, when boarding school and, later, college took most of Luke's time and Mrs. Sedley was left alone in the big house on the hill, curiosity and speculation regarding her future started up again.

Norah Sedley was quite aware of all this interest. There were days when, sitting before her dressing table and brushing her hair with long swift strokes, her face in the mirror would suddenly attract her attention and she would think, What a waste! But she thought (Continued on Page 158)

"Since you came I don't know the meaning of loneliness," he told her. "It isn't just your being beside me. It's the peace that comes with you."

When Norah saw the girl, she thought: This is what I've feared for nearly twenty years.

Educating Children for Every year we train thousands of our youth toward disappointment that could be avoided. • By Henry F. and Katharine Pringle

OUR nation is still the land of greatest opportunity. The American boy enjoys his inalienable right to strive toward wealth and power. The American girl is not denied the dream that one day her name shall be spelled out in lights which add to the glitter of Broadway. Thomas Jefferson's phrase, "the pursuit of happiness," still shines in the Declaration of Independence.

But it has been a vastly misunderstood phrase. The declaration does not, obviously, guarantee happiness. Nor does it, in proclaiming that men are created equal, mean all are identical in brain power, ability, determination or ambition. What the document does mean is that all men are to have equal opportunity to make of themselves what they can. The misunderstanding has caused countless Americans, through all our history, vainly to pursue happiness down roads which lead only to disappointment and heartbreak.

This June some 1,200,000 boys and girls will graduate from American high schools. Too many of them will want to be doctors, lawyers, engineers and merchant princes. Too many will seek success as actresses and singers, dancers and models. Too few will realize, before their chance has passed, that the true road to happiness may lie in doing humbler work for which they are really qualified, and which will bring greater spiritual and possibly even greater material success. The men and women who fill these jobs, essential to the welfare of the nation, are not really failures, of course. Actually, they had no chance to enter the callings of their wistful choice. They would not regard themselves as failures had it not been for early influences which held out false hopes.

The cold impartial figures of the Bureau of the Census give convincing answer to the erroneous idea that fame and fortune can be won by any man if only he will work hard enough. In 1940, in round figures, 37,400,000 American males were employed, and of these only 1,900,000 were classified as professional or semiprofessional. Of the 12,000,000 positions held by women and girls, 1,500,000 were so listed—a far better percentage. Among the men, there were only 21,000 architects, as compared with 4,500,000 clerks; 150,000 doctors, as against 5,500,000 craftsmen and 1,600,000 chauffeurs and truck drivers. Some 19,000 lady writers contrasted with 361,000 trained nurses, 800,000 schoolteachers, 3,000,000 girls doing clerical work and 2,000,000 domestics. Only 4000 women were lawyers; 400,000 were waitresses.

In all of bustling Chicago in 1940 there were but 2400 civil engineers and 7000 lawyers, compared with 200,000 factory hands and 200,000 clerks. A fraction over 200 lady lawyers unraveled legal snarls in the Midwestern metropolis, contrasted with 16,000 schoolteachers, 180,000 clerks and 60,000 stenographers and secretaries. Census figures from all parts of the nation confirm this inescapable fact: not enough professional jobs with large salaries exist for the 2,000,000 young people who normally enter the American labor market each year. Neither their parents nor the country's educators are adequately preparing them to face the true situation. The American educational system is producing misfits, by the tens of thousands, each year in every state in the Union.

The nation's schools are changing, of course, but most of them—both elementary and secondary—have not modified their courses enough to meet the needs of business and industry. More serious, the courses offered are not in harmony with the radically altered pattern of today's social structure. In 1870, as the Harvard report, General Education in a Free Society, pointed out, the high schools had 80,000 students of whom three quarters went to college. But in 1940 the high schools enrolled 7,000,000 students, and hardly more than a fifth had either the ability or the desire for university training. Yet huge numbers of them are educated without due recognition of this change.

The labor laws of most states require that children must remain in school until they are sixteen. So millions of youngsters, destined ultimately to work in factories and commercial establishments, struggle to master Latin and other cultural subjects of dubious value to them.

"Many of our young people," observed Harold J. Dillon in a recent study for the National Child Labor Committee, "complete their secondary education insulated from the reality of what makes up the outside world."

THE time has come for realism. It may be that the school authorities of the United States should have more zealously aroused public opinion to the need for more widespread vocational training. After all, they have had the closest contacts with the masses of children. Yet to put all the blame—or even half of it—on our superintendents, principals and teachers would be very unfair. A large part of the responsibility must be shared by parents. Basically, it rests in the American misconception that it is somehow socially preferable to be a starving, incompetent architect or a bungling, dangerous doctor than a skilled mechanic or a well-paid carpenter.

The parent, of course, wants his son or daughter to live a fuller, better life than he did himself. Wherever we went, talking with high-school teachers and students, we heard again and again of the fathers and mothers who flatly refused to admit that their darlings could not rise above their own positions in life. There was, for instance, Maria, who was graduated from the Julia Richman High School in New York City four or five years ago.

Maria, of Italian parentage, was pretty, willing and a hard worker. She was popular with teachers and students alike, but she simply did not have the brand of brains required to get through the school's normal academic course, much less to enter college. So Maria was enrolled in the co-operative course, taking typing and comptometry. On graduation she was almost certain to find work with one of the fifty New York business houses which are closely associated with the school.

At first, Maria's parents were willing enough. Times were hard. There was no prospect of putting their daughter through college. Then her father got a war job. The money rolled in. In her senior year he notified the school that Maria must be transferred to the college-preparatory course. Her teachers and Miss Marion D. Jewell, principal of Julia Richman, protested. Maria was a wonderful girl, they told papa, but she could not do the academic work of her classmates. She would have to drop back two years. Promotion, even so, was doubtful. But papa was adamant; nothing was too good for his Maria. She was put in the sophomore class, with girls much younger. But she had been there only five days when her father came in misery to Miss Jewell. Maria would neither eat nor sleep, he reported. She did nothing but sit in her room and cry. Obviously, she knew how to handle papa, for she went happily back to the co-operative course.

Mrs. Bessie W. O'Brien, the school's placement adviser, told many such stories. She described her protests to parents.

"I'VE said it so often it has whiskers," she remarked. "If we made Peggy carry around a hundred pounds of books, I point out, they'd come screaming in protest. Yet they're asking her to carry a hundred pounds of books in her head, and she just hasn't the mental strength. But rather often, the parent just keeps repeating that Peggy will get the regular diploma, all right, if only she will work harder."

This reluctance to face the truth is probably even more pronounced among the parents of boys. In Baltimore we sat in a small ice-cream parlor and talked with some

WOLF STORY

"A little dinner?" Waldo urged softly. "A slight snack at my place? I've an interesting collection of feathers I'd like very much to show you."

"Listen," the man said. "I can't just keep talking all the time. Now and then I've got to breathe. Do you mind?" "Well—hurry up!" Michael said coldly.

BY WILLIAM McCLEERY

ONCE upon a time a man was putting his five-year-old son, Michael, to bed and the boy asked for a story. "All right," said the man. "Once upon a time there was a girl called Goldilocks."

"No, no," said the boy. "A new story."

"A new story?" said the man. "What about?"

"About a hen," said the boy.

"Good!" said the man. "I was afraid you might want another wolf story. Well, once upon a time there was a hen." The man stopped. "What is a good name for a hen?"

Michael looked thoughtful. "Make it Rainbow."

"Why Rainbow?" asked his father.

"Because," said the boy, "he had all different colored feathers."

"He?" said the man.

"She," said the boy.

"All right," said the man. "She was called Rainbow because her feathers were of many different colors: red and pink and purple and lavender and magenta"—the boy yawned—"and violet and yellow and orange ——"

"Daddy! Stop!" cried the boy. "Stop saying so many colors. You're putting me to sleep!"

"Why not?" said the man. "This is bedtime."

"But I want some story first!" said the boy. "Not just colors."

"Rainbow lived with many other hens in a house on a farm at the edge of a deep dark forest and in the forest lived a ——"

"A wolf," said the boy, sitting up in bed.

"No!" cried the man. "Not another wolf story. Anything but a wolf. A weasel, a ferret, a lion, an elephant ——"

"A wolf," said the boy.

"Well, all right," said the man, "but please don't sit up. Put your head on your pillow; shut your eyes."

"O.K.," said the boy. He turned his pillow over so that it would be cool against his cheek.

"So," said the man, "in the forest lived a stupid old wolf, too tired to do any harm."

"No!" cried the boy. "The wolf is fierce! Terribly, terribly fierce!"

"All right," said the man. "A terribly fierce wolf with teeth as sharp as butcher knives."

"M-m-m-m," said the boy.

"I suppose you like that about the butcher knives," said the man.

"I love it," said the boy. "Go on."

"Well, one night the wolf came slinking out of the forest. By the way, what is the wolf's name?"

"Waldo," said the boy.

"But Waldo's been in every story since Christmas. Can't we ever have a new one?"

"No," said the boy. "Because Waldo is the fiercest wolf in all the world!"

"Well, this wolf named Waldo came slinking out of the forest very quietly," whispered the man. "Very, very quietly." (Continued on Page 270)

JESSIE KNEW LOTS ABOUT PROBLEM CHILDREN, TILL THE DAY
SHE MET UP WITH HER HUSBAND'S DAUGHTER

Crack in the Floor

BY ROMA ROSE

I OUGHT to be ashamed, she said to the empty classroom. The students had gone home long ago, the boards were erased, the papers neatly stacked with rubber bands around them. Everything was done, and still she delayed. It was harder to go home each afternoon, because Angela was there. I will try to like her. I have tried. And I understand children—after all, she's barely eighteen. But it was no good. Her hands trembled as she picked up the stacks of papers.

Resolutely she closed the door marked with a little card: MRS. MORRISON, HISTORY. The halls were silent except for the sound of her own steps. The office was empty. It was Friday afternoon and the week end stretched ahead—the fourth with Angela.

It's true about stepmothers. And I'm one of them.

The outside door swung shut behind her and she stood in the late-afternoon sunshine, the safe refuge of the classroom gone until Monday. The orange tree by the school steps was in full blossom and the sweet scent filled the bright air. The building and the grounds were beautiful but she must go home now.

If only Angela had been like other young girls she knew—affectionate, or comradely, or even reasonably polite. Anything at all except the way she was.

Angela had telephoned one night a month or so ago from her mother's home, two thousand miles away, and her thin voice asked if this was Mr. Todd Morrison's residence, and who was this speaking?

"This is Mrs. Morrison," Jessie had said, puzzled. "Mr. Morrison is away until Friday. Could I—"

"This is Miss Morrison," the cool little voice said. "Will you please tell him to meet me on Sunday morning at the station at eight-forty-five."

"Why, yes, I'll tell him," Jessie said in surprise. "Is this Angela? Are you coming out?"

"Yes. This is his daughter. Just tell him to meet me. That's all. Good-by."

Since that Sunday morning when she arrived with a remote, "How do you do?" for Jessie, Angela's clothes had been scattered on the living-room furniture, her make-up littered the bathroom, her appetite was capricious, and when her father was home she sat on his lap every time he sat down. She never spoke to Jessie except to answer questions, and even then she acted as if Jessie were an inquisitive servant.

But surely we can learn to be friends. Jessie thought, dreading the approach to her own door. Of course, I am sort of an old maid, and not young and gay, but I work with young people all the time. I'll try.

She fitted the key into the lock of her apartment, and paused while she smoothed out her face and got ready to smile. Eighteen was such a nice age for a girl. Those high-school youngsters in her classes with their loose shiny hair, their wild exaggerations, their pretty skin, their absolute absorption in themselves—they were sweet and funny.

"Hello, Angela," she said brightly. "Are you home?"

The room smelled of perfume and nail polish. Angela was at the desk, a scramble of old envelopes and letters spread out in front of her, writing.

"Oh, hello," Angela said indifferently, without looking up.

A sweater, pajamas, slippers, stockings and underwear lay on the chairs and floor. The bed on the couch was still unmade.

Jessie walked to the desk to lay her papers on one crowded corner. At her approach, Angela covered her writing with her hand. It was done so deliberately that Jessie felt her face go hot. She looked out (Continued on Page 25)

Angela slowly turned her head. "I don't think," she said, "that I care to discuss it with you."

THE GIRL WHO LIVED IN A TREE

"VICHYSSOISE," Peter was saying to the waiter. "Vichyssoise, lobster thermidor, a salad—tossed green salad—profiteroles au chocolat and a large coffee." Peter put the menu back on the table. He was twenty-three, but a fair complexion and light brown hair that looked unfamiliar with the brush and comb gave him the appearance of a sophomore.

The waiter turned to Dan.

"Shrimps à la Russe," Dan said. He hesitated and ran his eye up and down the list of entrees. Dan was the same age as Peter, but he had the manner of a man twice that age, just a trifle weary.

"The lamb," the waiter said, "is very nice. Spring lamb, very nice."

"No lamb," Dan said. "My psychiatrist won't let me eat lamb."

"I am sorry," the waiter said, and cocked his head sympathetically. "Rognons? In a nice wine sauce?"

"What are rognons?" Peter asked.

"Kidney, monsieur. Very nice."

"No rognons," Dan said. "I will have the pompano."

"Pompano? Very nice."

"The avocado salad, pot de crème and a large coffee."

"Very nice," the waiter said. He picked up the menus and darted toward the swinging doors into the kitchen.

Peter leaned back into the heavy leather cushions and inhaled deeply. It was such a wonderful smell. From the kitchen where Peter glimpsed a row of shiny copper tureens, and the chef in white linens gesturing excitedly, came the steamy aroma of pink roasts and rich sauces. From the dozen or so women in the restaurant came tantalizing whiffs of heavy perfumes. "It is a frightening thing, really," Peter said.

"What is a frightening thing?"

"This gastronomic phase in our lives. It is a pastime for old men. At my age I should be interested in girls and in reforming the world and in the National League pennant. It is wrong. It is very wrong indeed that the thing that excites me most in this world is the anticipation of a good meal in a good restaurant."

"I have a feeling," Dan said, "that you do not know when you are well off."

"Me? Well off?"

"You may congratulate yourself that you are one of the handful of people in America who are wealthy enough to eat at the Napoleon and who are healthy enough to enjoy it."

"Perhaps, but I can't help feeling that my existence ——"

"If you were in love you would be very unhappy. Reforming the world is a thankless job, and I assure you the Dodgers have cinched the National League pennant."

"You are right," Peter said, and reached for his soupspoon as the waiter placed the vichyssoise in front of him.

It was at this moment, as Peter was reaching for his soupspoon, that she came in. She was the youngest woman in the room, yet she walked with such cool self-confidence that the captain was already making little bows with his head in her direction. She wore a white evening gown, a short mink jacket and no jewelry at all. A Twentieth Century-Fox vice-president who was standing at the bar asked the bartender who she was. The bartender didn't know. He had never seen her before.

Peter put down his soupspoon without tasting the vichyssoise. "Dan," he said, "that is the most beautiful girl I have ever seen."

Dan looked up from his shrimps. He studied the girl carefully. "Good bone structure in her face, but she's too healthy-looking. She looks as if she came in here on a pair of skis. I'm getting exhausted just looking at her."

The captain was indicating a wall table next to the one where Peter and Dan were sitting. The captain looked at the girl's escort, a spare, dark young man in a white dinner coat. The spare, dark young man in the white dinner coat turned to the girl. She nodded to him and he nodded to the captain. The captain ran ahead of them and pulled the table out from the wall. The girl brushed by the corner of Peter's table and slipped into the wall seat. The young man sat down next to her, between Peter and the girl, and the captain pushed the table in against their stomachs as if he were tucking them into bed.

"That girl," Peter said, "is the most beautiful girl I have ever seen." Peter had to whisper, for the elbow of the young man in the white dinner jacket was within a few inches of Peter's.

"You said that before," Dan said. "Finish your soup."

"I can't," Peter said. "Suddenly I have no interest in food."

The young man in the white dinner jacket was obstructing his view. Peter leaned forward so he could look at the girl again. As he stared at her she glanced up from her menu and looked at Peter. For a fraction of a second they looked at each other. A great lump formed itself in Peter's (Continued on Page 252)

Do Men or Women lead the harder life?

"By gorry, I'm tired."
"There you go! You're tired! Here I be a-standin' over a hot stove all day, an' you're workin' in a nice cool sewer!"

"IN general, who do you think lead the harder life, men or women?" The question sounds like a new phase of the war between the men and the women, but if you expect the battle to end in a deadlock, with neither side winning a stronger claim to the title, you're mistaken.

When this question was asked among a cross section of the country's adults in a recent JOURNAL survey, the women won handily: the people who think woman's role is the harder outnumber those whose sympathies are with the men, by two to one. Here's the way the people voted:

"Women lead the harder life," said 48 per cent.

"Men lead the harder life," said 24 per cent.

"There's no difference," said 23 per cent—and some added, "They all have a tough time!"

"I don't know," said 5 per cent.

Nor is this a case where women line up solidly on one side of the issue, the men on the other. As a matter of fact, considering the controversy implied by the topic, the views of men and women are surprisingly close to agreement:

Among women:

53 per cent think women lead a harder life than men.
19 per cent think men lead a harder life than women.

Among men, the situation is altered, but by no means reversed:

43 per cent think women lead the harder life.
28 per cent think men's life is harder.

In other words, nearly as many men as women concede that a woman's life is harder. But remember, this is a general statement; a husband may easily believe that most women have a harder time than most men—but object strenuously to the idea that his own wife leads a harder life than he does!

Especially if you disagree with the verdict of the people interviewed in the survey, you'll want to know just what arguments are dvanced to support women's claims. When people who believe that woman's life is harder than a man's were asked to explain how, iese were the reasons they gave:

Maybe the man brings home the bacon—but it's

"Because women have to care for the children and bring up the imily," said 26 per cent.

"Woman's work is never done—longer hours, or harder work, or ore work," said 24 per cent.

"They have more responsibilities, or cares, or worries," said 22 er cent.

"Housework and running the house—it's monotonous, it's endss," said 14 per cent.

"They bear the children," said 13 per cent.

"Women are more tied down," said 8 per cent.

"Women are greater worriers, they're more emotional; their ental or physical make-up makes their burdens harder to bear," id 6 per cent.

"Women have less independence," said 2 per cent.

Plus a wide variety of other specific arguments amounting to 7 er cent.

If you bother to add up the percentages, you'll find that they total ell over 100 per cent. This is because many people mentioned sev-al ways in which a woman's life is harder than a man's; in fact, ie reason for the belief that women's lives are harder is the feeling iat women are required to function in more capacities than men—woman's duties and responsibilities are more numerous, varied id continuous. This underlying attitude is a connecting link between ie individual points.

Let's look at some of the categories in more detail:

Caring for the children and bringing up the family. Not many eople feel that the care of her own children is in itself any parcular hardship for a woman. However, they (particularly women) el that the duties of a mother also involve a heavy responsibility. irther, both the responsibility and the actual tasks are continuous, compared with a man's working day, which ordinarily has a finite end.

Although "the care of the children" was mentioned by almost ual proportions of men and women as one of the reasons why a oman's life is harder, here we find one of the subtle differences in e point of view of men and women. Men are inclined to think of ild care as difficult mainly because it is endless; women are much ore likely to be impressed with—or depressed by—the responsility they must assume as mothers. Said one, "Men leave the entire sponsibility for bringing up the family to their wives—anyway, ost men do."

"Woman's work is never done." The old saying summarizes general attitude; these very words echoed and re-echoed throughout e interviews. Be it noted again that the feeling underlying this gument has a lot in common with the one before—it's the lack of ime limit on the job that is difficult, rather than just the job itself. me people do feel that women have more or harder work to do; t the more typical point of view is that of a housewife: "Women id the harder lives, because though men work harder while they're out it, women work longer."

More responsibilities, more worries, more cares. The words of e person explain the point of view of many others: "A woman has twenty-four-hour responsibility. She's got the house to run, the ildren to raise, a man to please—all the troubles of the whole nily; men only have a job to worry about."

It's on this point that a man, even one who feels that women's lives e generally harder, is most likely to take issue with the ladies. A man sympathizes with them for being tied down, he's aware of the tedium of housework—but only one man in six feels that the wife bears a disproportionate share of the responsibility, as compared with one woman in four who voices this belief. Maybe there's a clue in this comment: "A woman's life is harder, because by nature she worries more. A woman's mental make-up tends to cause self-pity." And it was a woman who said it!

Most of the arguments are so closely related that they are almost inseparable; people have discussed different aspects of the same underlying problem. No system has yet been devised for compressing a housewife's work and worries into a forty-hour week. Add to this the fact that many women find their duties dull and monotonous, and you have the story. As one of them said, "Women have to put up with the same work, day in, day out. And they never get a vacation!"

There is one other striking aspect of this bill of particulars: if you look back at the table, you will see that most of the discussion applies primarily or exclusively to married women. A woman's life is harder because of the duties and responsibilities that go with being a homemaker!

Yet another question in the same survey shows that the great majority of women as well as of men believe that marriage and children are far more important sources of personal happiness for a woman than money, friends, owning a home or having a job; with marriage slightly ahead even of children!

THE OTHER SIDE OF THE ARGUMENT

Incidentally, the survey suggests that men value their family life more highly as a source of personal happiness than women give them credit for. When people were asked their opinions about sources of happiness for men, husbands ranked marriage far ahead of satisfying work as a source of happiness for men, and put work only slightly ahead of children. (This doesn't mean, either, that they get more happiness from their jobs than from their own children: the question was asked in general terms.) Wives, on the other hand, rate work almost as important as marriage to men's happiness, and far ahead of children!

Now let's look at the men's side of the case, as presented by people who believe men have the harder life. Here are the reasons they advance:

"Men have to work all the time, they're the breadwinners," said 42 per cent.

"They have greater responsibility," said 32 per cent.

"They work harder," said 16 per cent.

"Men are not sheltered, they're under a greater strain," said 6 per cent.

"They have to please a boss and a wife!" said 2 per cent.

And again miscellany, totaling 3 per cent.

If you again total the figures, you will see that the advocates of the men's case advanced fewer arguments!

The words of a few people put the case for the whole group who believe a man's life is harder: "If finances aren't provided, nothing clicks," said a man. "Men have to go out and work all day; they have the responsibility for the household, but not much chance to enjoy its pleasures."

A woman expressed pretty much the same idea in different words: "A man has to face the business world all the time; on top of that, he has the greater responsibility for the family's happiness," she told the interviewer.

The Little Willow

BY FRANCES TOWERS

THE first evening, Simon Byrne was brought to the house by a friend of Charlotte's, one of those with whom she would have to settle an account after the war—unless, of course, he didn't come back. The stranger stood on the threshold and took in the room, and a look of such extraordinary delight came over his face that the youngest Miss Avery's heart gave a little leap, almost as if, independently of her mind and will, it greeted of its own accord another of its kind.

It was, of course, a peculiarly gracious room, with its high ceiling and Adam chimney piece. The shiny white walls were painted with light and dim reflections of colors, and a thick black hearthrug smudged with curly pink roses—an incongruous Balkan peasant rug in that chaste room—somehow struck a note of innocence and gaiety, like the scherzo in a symphony. That rug, and the photographs on the lid of the grand piano; the untidy stack of books on a table; and a smoky pseudo old master over the fireplace, with the lily of the Annunciation as a highlight, a pale question mark in the gloom, gave the room an oddly dramatic quality. Lisby had often thought, It is like a room on the stage, in which the story of three sisters is about to unfold.

The passing reflections of Charlotte in red, Brenda in green made a faint shimmer on the walls as they drifted about, as if a rose garden were reflected momentarily in water.

"Charlotte dear, I've brought a friend. He was at Tobruk. Comes from South Africa, and doesn't know a soul over here," said Stephen Elyot. "He's just out of hospital."

"I am so glad!" said Charlotte glowingly, giving him both her hands. "You must come as often as you like."

His eyes dwelt on her dark, lovely face, and he said, "You don't know what it feels like to be in a drawing room again."

"I can very well imagine. It must feel like the peace of God," said Brenda, in that soft, plangent voice of hers, which was so perfect an instrument for the inspired remarks that seemed to fall so effortlessly from her lips.

She could say the most divinely right things without a throb of real sympathy, and would spend pounds on roses rather than write a letter of condolence. As for her cello playing, it was strange how deeply she could move one, while she herself remained quite aloof. It was because she knew what the music was meant to say and was thinking about the music all the time, and not of how she played or how she felt. It was a great charm in her.

Lisby said nothing. She had no poetic conception of herself to impose on the minds of others. However, she had her uses. She cut the sandwiches and made the coffee and threw herself into the breach when some unassuming guest seemed in danger of being neglected. And unassuming guests often were. Charlotte and Brenda had such brilliant friends—musicians and artists and writers. The truest thing about those girls was that they were charmers. Every other fact sank into it significance beside that one supreme truth. Though each had her own strongly marked individuality, they had this in common: that by lamplight they acquired, in their trailing draperies, a timeless look, as if they might have stood for types of the seductive woman in any age. Not a modern girl; but the delicate creature who through the ages has been man's rose of beauty, or his cup of hemlock.

Always, destroying friendship, there was this allure—the glow, the fragrance, the what-you-will, which, sooner or later, ensnared every young man and made him the captive of one or the other of the two elder Misses Avery.

"Charlotte, dear," said Stephen Elyot, wandering about the room with his coffee cup in his hand, "I wonder, with your exquisite taste, you let that picture hang there! It's all wrong, my dear, as I've told you before. A Watteau, now, or a Fragonard, for this eighteenth-century room. And yet your décors for the stage are so perfect! You are quite my favorite designer."

"Lisby would die if we banished the picture. It's been in the family for generations," said Charlotte.

"It has been loved by people who are dead, for its . . . holiness, not for aesthetic reasons; and that makes it spiritually precious," Simon Byrne said in a low voice to Lisby, by whom he chanced to be sitting.

SHE gave a little start. The thick white paint of the lily, and its golden tongue, had fascinated her as a child, making all lilies seem not quite earthly flowers. How did he know so quickly that the dark picture in the white room brought spiritual values into it, brought her mother saying, "Yes, darling; perhaps the angel has a queer face—perhaps he is a little bit like Miss Nettleton. How interesting that someone we know should have a face that an old master chose for the Angel Gabriel! I shall always think of Miss Nettleton as a very special kind of person"?

It almost seems as if he might be my kind of person, she thought. Perhaps one would have thought his face unremarkable if one had not caught that look on it. He has known horror and violence, and is terribly vulnerable to beauty, she had said to herself, with one of her flashes of insight.

Brenda played that evening, and Simon Byrne never took his eyes off her. In her long green dress, with her gold hair like an inverted sheaf of corn, she held him spellbound. Or perhaps it was the music.

When she went to bed that night, Lisby caught herself hoping quite desperately that it was, after all, the music; and for such a foolish reason. Because as he was leaving he took her little willow tree in his long thin hands.

"So cool," he said, "and watery. Willows and water—I used to dream of them."

"In the desert?" she asked.

"When I was lost," he said, "and parched with thirst, and terribly frightened."

"It's the loveliest thing I have," she said.

It was made of jade and crystal and it stood on the lacquer cabinet in the hall. She had fallen in love with it in an antique shop and had expended on it, with wild extravagance, her (Continued on Page 143) aught herself hoping quite desperately that he would see her. That some miracle would happen and he would turn from Brenda and join her.

From one man's lips came another man's words, telling of a love that there had not been time to tell.

Someone to talk to

The art of listening will win more friends and influence more people than the art of conversation— says the latest scientific theory! . . . By Gretta Palmer

"BE a good listener" is a piece of sound advice handed down from mother to daughter throughout the centuries. Women have always known that brilliant conversation is not the way to a man's heart: he would rather do his own talking and good listeners turn into early brides. They are rewarded in other ways: invitations rain down on those who practice listening as a drawing-room extension of the Golden Rule. Most of us enjoy talking: the woman who gives those about her more than their share of this pleasure is popular for her courtesy. And the same woman, like as not, is a particularly perceiving and successful mother: she finds that by letting her children prattle away and reveal their secret reveries she is better able to guide them in the difficult job of growing up.

Women's intuitive understanding of the importance of listening has lately been substantiated by a mountainous body of scientific fact. Courses in just listening are now taught at Princeton University, at the Universities of Wisconsin and Chicago, at Harvard and Radcliffe undergraduates and at Harvard Graduate Business School executives-to-be. The social scientists who teach these courses can now explain why all of us desperately need someone to talk to: research studies by anthropologists, psychologists and other learned men can give us rules for better listening.

Do we talk in order to communicate information to another person? Not always. Talk has at least three other purposes.

The desire for mutual communication is very deep and strong in most men. One motorist cited by the Harvard students as typical: a man stalled in the dust of the road, steaming hot under the hood. A stranger comes ambling along and says to him, "Having trouble?"

Logic: the stranger is an insensitive ox to ask for information: he can see that the driver is having trouble. Why does he bother to talk? Because men and women are social beings, who often use words to express that simple fact. If we analyze the meaning of the stranger's remarks, they are something like this: "I don't know you, but to pass you by like a log of wood would be unnatural and unfriendly. I don't know anything useful to say to you, so I won't say anything that is useful to the point. But I can speak a word to you—and with a word or two—and we'll feel better than if I had kept quiet. People like to talk, even when there's nothing much to say."

A good deal of the conversation that goes on in the world is of this type: don't criticize it too harshly on the grounds that it doesn't add to our stock of information. It isn't meant to. It's just an expression of man's friendliness to man.

Another large portion of day-by-day talk is an effort to get rid, at any cost, of an emotion that is plaguing us—especially anger. Such rage may have no relation at all to the person on whom we "take it out." This is unreasonable, but it is the way all of us behave. A wife who judges all that her husband says from the viewpoint of a person is being unkind and unfair: she did not marry sheer intellect.

TROUBLES PUT INTO WORDS OFTEN DISAPPEAR

One of the teachers of counseling says, "Suppose that a man who has cheerfully eaten tomato soup for ten years of married life suddenly says some evening, 'I hate tomato soup. Always have. Why do you serve it?' Instead of telling him that his remark is ridiculous, the wife who understands listening will realize that he hates something else at the moment—something quite different. If she's quiet and sympathetic, he'll get around to telling her what it was that went wrong during the day. Wives have landed in the divorce courts because they got angry at the words about tomato soup and didn't give the man a chance to pour out the real anger that lay behind the foolish words."

Men who are not encouraged to get rid of their unhappiness by talking it out at home often carry the unexpressed emotion back to work with them. An industrial nurse reports that employees never come to her for the removal of splinters or the bandaging of small

NEW ORLEANS

BY RICHARD PRATT

Architectural Editor of the Journal

YOU can see what Thackeray and Mark Twain meant when they called this a Paris in America—which it isn't exactly; but the flavor of the famous old Creole Quarter is decidedly French provincial; and for a flavor of another sort you encounter in farther parts of the city occasional countrylike plantation houses that are marvelous in the moonlight; while in what they call the Garden District, where the air is scented with sweet olive blossoms, and the houses give off an aroma of ante-bellum elegance in settings of almost tropical lushness, you find still another flavor, that could be called crinoline. Altogether, it makes a unique and romantic potpourri, French, Spanish, English, named New Orleans. With the accent on the Or.

OBINSON HOUSE . . . In the Garden District, as well as the Quarter, many ouses decorate themselves with delicate ironwork like lacy overlays for a valentine.

THE COURTYARD of the Gauche house tinkles with the splash of the tall fountain, and the air that rustles the big banana leaves is fragrant with flowers. A gallery above connects the main house and the guests' and servants' quarters.

The shutters, ordinarily closed for coolness and quiet, were opened as a favor for this photograph.

THE GAUCHE HOUSE IN THE VIEUX CARRÉ

IN the days when the Vieux Carré was almost exclusively Creole, and the Old Quarter was the special domain of the haughty French-Spanish set, John Gauche built this house at Esplanade and Royal, and hung its simple foursquare outside walls with cornices and galleries lined with lacy ironwork. The tallness of the windows gives away the wonderful ceiling heights within, upstairs and down. And inside, the present owner has given her rooms the French elegance they must have enjoyed at the hands of John Gauche in the Fifties, when only French furnishings were considered suitable for Creole homes.

THE DRAWING ROOM here is one of two on the first floor, which further contains the immense dining room and the large study of the owner, Miss Mathilda Gray, who says that her house takes a party for six or six hundred, at will.

THE BEDROOM of the owner recalls the splend of earlier Creole days in New Orleans, but of th monde of France itself, for much of the furnitu brought by Miss Gray from her country house n

In the old days the main central part of the house was the domain of the parents and daughters; the wings were the garçonnière, or quarters for the sons of the family and for the steady stream of guests who came by horse and carriage from the city and from plantations surrounding the countryside.

ORMOND PLANTATION

A FEW miles up the Mississippi River from New Orleans in a wide sweeping bend of the river, this plantation house, as you approach it from the road below the levee, appears very much as it must have looked when it went up, although the brick wings were added later. Built by the Butler family in the 1780's, its wide galleries clearly show a Spanish influence; its columns are typical of Louisiana.

THE LOWER HALL leads from the entrance through a broad archway into a kind of casual sitting room that in turn leads out upon a garden stretching off into the distance between two great rows of camellias.

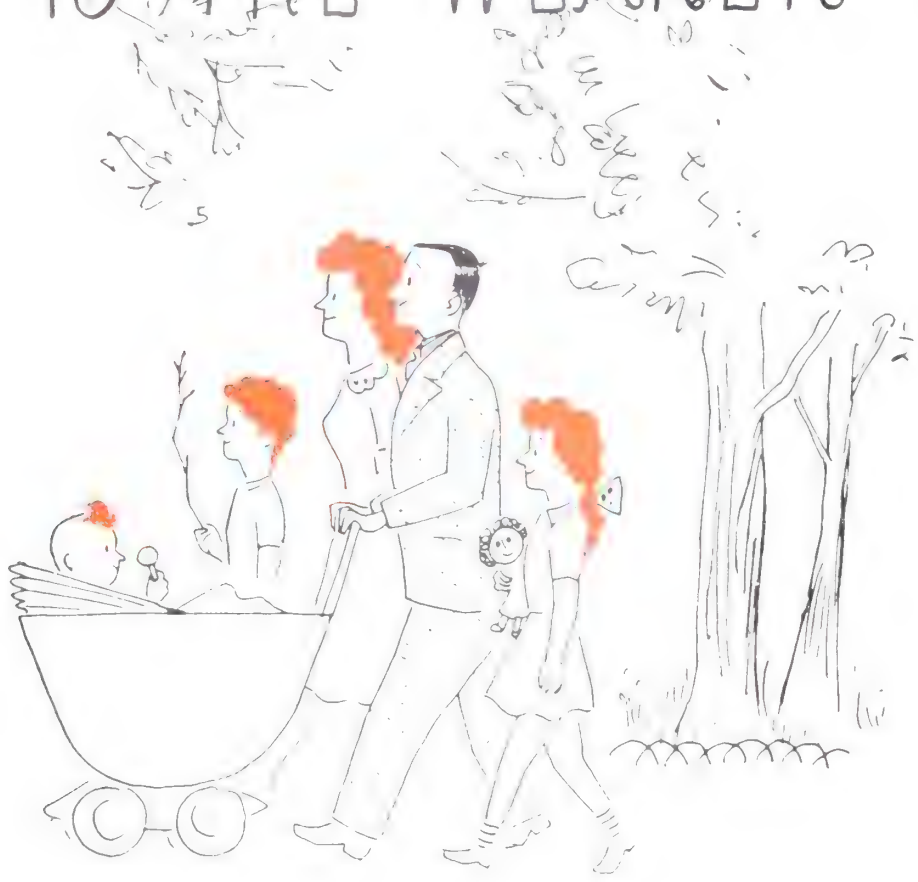
STRACHAN HOUSE

This handsomely porticoed home in the Garden District is the house where Jefferson Davis died. Ionic below and Corinthian above, the columns of this double gallery create an architectural effect familiar in the neighborhood, while indoors the woodwork and furnishings are notable, even for New Orleans.

HURST PLANTATION

A house that was moved to the new residential district from the banks of the Mississippi, five miles away. After its journey this fine old plantation house was given a setting its tradition and beauty deserved. An extraordinary Coromandel screen dominates the drawing room.

WHICH IS THE WEAKER SEX?



SCIENCE VIEWS THE SEXES THROUGH MODERN EYES, AND CONCLUDES YOU SHOULD NEVER UNDERESTIMATE THE POWER OF A WOMAN!

BY ALBERT WIGGAM, D.SC.

BOTH men and women have always taken for granted that woman is the weaker sex. But recent discoveries in biology and psychology, as well as the unquestioned success of women in business, industry, politics and even engineering, have brought this assumption into serious question.

Your first thought, of course, is that men are, on the average, bigger and stronger than women. True, but you see only the exceptions to the rule—the males who were strong enough to survive being born. You may ask, "How can these be exceptions, since a hundred and six boys pull through this ordeal to every hundred girls? This surely proves the males are the stronger sex." It might do so, were it not for an astonishing set of facts, only recently discovered. Let us examine a few of the most striking.

Prof. Samuel J. Holmes, eminent biologist of the University of California at Berkeley, has shown that if you go back through the prenatal life of babies to the moment of conception, from 150 to 200 males start the race of life to every 100 females. Yet even in this superprotected uterine environment, 40 or 50—probably 80 or 90—of the males perish before birth, owing to their inherent weakness. As a final result of this "battle of the sexes," only those males endowed with almost heroic strength ever see the light of day.

Other facts assembled by Professor Holmes show that the male is nearer than the female to the apes in his anatomy, especially in the head and sex organs. The sex organization of the female is far more elaborate and powerful than that of the male. Furthermore, her astonishing capacity to reach a climax in the sex union many times more often than the male—in some authenticated cases, 100 times as often—is additional proof of the greater organic vigor of the female. All these facts have led anthropologists to conclude that the female, not only in man, but in all animals, has, owing to her organic vitality, been the leader in the struggle for survival.

Let us once more go back through the prenatal history of babies, and read, with Professor Holmes, the amazing facts revealed by the records of premature births, both natural and induced. In Budapest, 3781 premature births showed 152 males for every 100 females had failed to survive. In Vienna, among 2608 premature births, 197 males to 100 females perished before birth. Combining the figures from many countries, 162 males to 100 females perish before birth.

Even this does not reveal fully the drama of life which has been going on. As we go back nearer and nearer to the moment of conception, the higher is the proportion of males who perish. In one sample of premature births that took place at the seventh month, there were 116 males to 100 females; but back at the fourth month—three months earlier—229 males were prematurely born and perished to 100 females. In another sample there were 112 males to 100 females in the sixth month, and 180 to 100 in the fourth month. All evidence, therefore, indicates that not far from 200 males are conceived to every 100 females; but since only 106 boys to 100 girls reach birth, evidently about half the males are too frail to live, even in the protected prenatal environment.

Your Money

HERE'S HOW YOU CAN MAKE YOUR MONEY GROW

By Sylvia F. Porter

THE average "lifetime" of a $25,000 estate left in the hands of a woman is less than seven years! Every twelve months, more than a billion dollars of insurance benefits flow into—and flow out of—the pocketbooks of American wives and daughters. Only one in four families plans its savings today; one out of every four families doesn't save a cent; more than half of us spend our incomes first, save only what's left. And as a result, millions of Americans who should be free from worry as they approach middle and old age are living instead on the edge of poverty and dependence. The truth is frightening. The records are a challenge to our own instinct of self-preservation.

Avoiding the risks of losing your savings is frequently harder than earning the money to begin with. It wasn't too long ago that I tried getting rich quick through the stock tips and rumors that a person in a position like mine hears all the time. I had accumulated some cash through putting aside a few dollars a week and I was feeling mighty pleased about it.

Then one of my Wall Street friends telephoned. "I thought I'd let you know that XYZ Corporation looks like a sure bet. It's selling at $20 a share and it should go to $40."

It was a terrific temptation, and I didn't resist it. I withdrew my savings and became one of XYZ's owners. You can guess the end. To a painful degree it was not a sure thing. When I finally needed some money for an emergency, I was forced to sell out at $8 a share. My savings had been virtually wiped out.

SPECULATION VERSUS PEACE OF MIND

But I learned one lesson from that harsh experience. I know that the way to family fortune is not through stock tips and rumors, but through common sense and saving. I realize now that only the person who can afford to lose can afford to speculate in stocks or in real estate or in anything—and that eliminates 99 per cent of us. And I find that what I've done since is not only more productive, but also a lot easier on the nerves. Worrying about the stock quotations or the ups and downs of a stranger's business to see whether I'm worth $500 or $5000 is not my idea of peace of mind.

At a wedding party a few weeks ago a group of us gathered in the bride's room for a strictly girl chat. Suddenly the voice of one of the women cut into a silence:

"Sure, I know what I want. It's the security I'll feel when Dave and I know we'll be independent in our old age."

The bride's sister interrupted, "I want that, too, but how am I going to get it with two youngsters to raise on $75 a week?"

Mary, another of the group, added, "I'd like to hear a few hints for me! I don't know if I'll ever find my man, but I'm working and I suppose I should be saving somehow. But all the advice I ever hear is for wealthy widows with $100,000."

Right here, let me tell you about my own program, under which I'm moving steadily and easily toward future independence. No matter who you are, if you can save a few dollars from week to week you can take over this plan for yourself.

STRETCHING $18.75 TO $102

Every month I buy a regular Government bond—one of those $18.75 savings bonds that 85,000,000 of us bought during the war and that tens of millions of us own right now. These bonds are the best, the safest bargain in the world. What's more, over their ten-year life, they pay interest of almost 3 per cent; which means that a decade from now, my $18.75 bond will be redeemed at $25, my $3 investment will come back to me as $4.

Now, since I've been buying these bonds every month since 1940, my first E bond will mature for $25 three years from now. But in 1950 I'll still want to work; and if not, I expect I'll be able to put aside $18.75 a month. So in 1950, when my Government starts handing me $25 a month, I intend to take that $25, add it to my usual $18.75-per-month saving, and put the entire sum in bonds. Actually I'll be putting up only $18.75 of "new" money, but my investment will be $43.75.

But thirteen years from now I still don't plan to retire. So in 1960, when my $43.75 investment is coming back to me as $58.33, I'm going to reinvest the $58.33 and buy my usual $18.75 bond in addition. Remember, I'll still be saving only $18.75 "extra" a month—but I'll be investing $77.08.

At the end of that ten-year period, I presume I'll be ready to try out my dream of days without time clocks. And I'll be able to, for during the next ten years my bonds will be bringing in $102.77 a month. From $18.75 to $102—imagine it!

Because I have a job, I'm also under the Federal Social Security System—along with (Continued on Page 153)

Your Life!

HERE'S HOW YOU CAN MAKE YOURSELF GROW

By Louise Paine Benjamin

THIS piece is directed chiefly to young businesswomen. It is written because, in my opinion, they usually receive very dull and unprofitable counsel concerning what to do with their hard-earned dollars.

Did you, for instance, ever hear of a girl who, upon receiving her first pay envelope, was advised, "This can be your first step toward a wider, richer life. Do start planning now to have some perfectly grand fun!"?

Probably not. More likely she received a sober lecture on thrift. Starting something like this: "Now that you are a wage earner, you should begin at once to save for a rainy day. Remember, bad luck hits everybody sooner or later."

A nice cheery philosophy with which to start a beginner on a business climb!

In present-day fields of education and child discipline there are fewer don'ts, more do's. No modern leader tries to frighten young people into learning, or into good behavior. Why try to frighten them into saving?

Not that I am against saving. I think it has innumerable delightful, as well as practical, uses. But I am firmly against a penny-pinching program, undertaken because one is terrified of unknown disasters, or simply as an end in itself. No one ever got rich just from saving. Furthermore, the practice of stringent economy over a lifetime is a warping experience. Relentless scrimpers pay a high price in personality.

This article, however, is not written to encourage spendthrift habits. As a matter of fact, a good way to put money in its proper place is to do your level best to acquire enough of it so the mention of it doesn't touch a sore place in your mind. But why be long-faced and unhappy about something that can provide a lot of fun in small doses while you are working toward larger operations?

RULE NUMBER ONE ABOUT MONEY

As you climb the financial ladder, stop from time to time to catch your breath. Look around and enjoy the view. Otherwise, you lose your perspective. Even if you don't expect to stay in business forever, do get intelligent fun out of your earnings as you go along. This not only gives more flavor to your life, but it will give more flavor to you, assuring your personality of seasoning; a priceless asset, no matter what sort of niche you hope to fill eventually.

From the moment you receive your first earned dollar, fix firmly in your mind this basic idea: You are not going to work for money. Money is going to work for you.

Once you accept this fundamental precept, your emancipation has begun. You will never be a wage slave, no matter how small your salary. You may not easily be able to change the amount of money you receive, but you can decide what you are going to do with it, at least with some of it.

THE UNCOMMON-SENSE APPROACH

Your second rule is: Don't let yourself be bullied by a budget. Too many otherwise clever people live in constant fear of these monsters which they themselves have created. The real test of a business girl's budget is not whether it is full of common sense, but whether it contains any of the uncommon variety.

Common sense might suggest, for instance, that out of a forty-dollar-a-week salary, sixty-five cents a day be set aside for a hot, filling lunch. Uncommon sense might substitute milk, or soup, and a sandwich at a counter three times a week, with an apple in the office afterward; or might even prompt a lunch box from home. With this saving of a dollar or more a week, enough accumulates by the end of a year for a real splurge: a week-end trip, a new party dress, a series of concert or theater tickets, or a substantial addition to your travel fund. All these are delightful, soul-cheering experiences, and something to remember and enjoy long after the taste of the sacrificed luncheon dishes has been forgotten. Naturally, only a very silly girl would go to extremes and cut luncheon down to coffee and crackers. Any wide-awake girl can work out a simple, balanced lunch that will protect her health—and her figure too!

I know a girl who saved ten dollars this way, then blew herself to an experience she had always wanted to have: a meal in a dining car. She bought a round-trip ticket to a city a couple of hours distant, went there one Saturday, did some sight-seeing, then got a thrill out of her dining-car dinner on the way back. She pretended she was a celebrity arriving in town for the first time. That's the spirit! What better way of investing ten dollars than in adding to one's geographical and social knowledge, and at the same time deriving a sense of adventure?

"It's ridiculous to think of Clay looking at another woman," she said with certainty. "In spite of everything, I know he's still wild about me."

IT IS LATER THAN YOU THINK

By Dan Sensney

ILLUSTRATED BY ROY SPETER

THE lawyer, whose name was Mr. Larch, wanted to know why she had decided upon a divorce. Well, that was natural, she supposed. He couldn't simply step into the courtroom one fine day and say, "This client of mine wants a divorce, your honor. Will you give her one, please, as a favor?" Even out here, judges weren't that accommodating. But the difficulty was in putting her reasons into words. After all, Mr. Larch was a stranger; he didn't know Clay. On the other hand, Mr. Larch was on her side.

She had sat there, across from Mr. Larch at his expensive-looking and efficiently barren desk, feeling perfectly at ease while he went through the preliminaries. She was certain that her new gray suit was trimly tailored and most becoming, that her hair made a dramatic golden aureole between her face and an amusing hat, that she was looking her best and most appealing—certain of all the things a lady needs to be certain of when she consults her lawyer. She smiled tolerantly when he asked, "Your full name is?" because he surely knew it already from the letter the lawyer at home had written to him. But lawyers were funny, she realized; they liked to hear you say things yourself, so she answered:

"Olivia Grant Manners."

He wrote it down on a printed form. He was a youngish man, in his thirties, with a precise little mustache, and he had done this sort of thing so often it no longer embarrassed him or even interested him particularly.

"And you're staying at The Cottonwoods," he said. "What was your former address?"

She gave him the number and the name of the street of the apartment in Rochester.

"Your husband's full name?"

"Clayton Hugh Manners."

"His present address?"

"Why"—she hesitated—"I suppose he's still at the apartment, but I really don't know. We didn't talk about—about his plans. He may have decided to sublet and move to something smaller." That would be like Clay's thrift, his so-irritating thrift, but the possibility disturbed her. For some reason, she wanted to think of him staying on in the apartment. "One thing, I'm sure he must still be in Rochester. He works there, and he wouldn't think of giving up his job." Not Clay, though the heavens fell.

Mr. Larch said, "Just so we can reach him by mail. You see, he should appear in the case—not personally of course, but through a power of attorney—to answer the complaint. Otherwise we'll run into delay. I take it you don't expect him to contest the suit? He has agreed to the divorce?"

"Yes—he agreed to it." You could say, she supposed, that Clay's words amounted to agreement. "All right, go!" he had said—his face tense with weariness and anger, his black hair wild from the plowing fingers. "You say you can't stand it any longer—well, I can't either. So finish it, and let's pretend it never happened!" That was agreement, surely, though it had been spoken in thoughtlessness and rage.

Mr. Larch was still asking questions and making notes. "You arrived this morning," he murmured, "so we can file the action on—let's see, six weeks—on the second of October. And when were you and Mr. Manners married?"

"The sixteenth of June, nineteen-forty-one." In All Souls, with the organ playing Oh Promise Me, and mamma weeping and daddy putting the best face possible on something which definitely was not his own idea.

"Are there any children?"

"No," she said. "None," and was disconcerted for the first time, wishing that she had let it go with a single negative, because Mr. Larch glanced up at her. On her side or not, he was a man, and it seemed all men thought a woman's one duty was to have children. Yet it was beyond question a good thing—a very good thing—that she had held out against Clay in this respect, since children would only complicate matters now. She had no wish to be one half of those marriages which were kept together solely because of the children.

"Well," said Mr. Larch cheerfully, "all right. Now, Mrs. Manners, suppose you tell me a little about your marriage, and why you decided upon a divorce."

If she knew exactly what he expected—what he wanted—it would be easier. There was no one reason; there were so many reasons. She laid her gloves across her knee, smoothing their white kid out straight with intent movements of her hands.

"It was just . . . a mistake," she said carefully. "We stopped being happy together. We spent all our time quarreling."

"You were incompatible," Mr. Larch suggested, and dismissed his suggestion. "But unfortunately, incompatibility isn't grounds for divorce. Quarreling about what, Mrs. Manners?"

"Well—money. Quite often about money. And he wanted us to have children, though we couldn't afford them. And he was always criticizing me."

"I see," Mr. Larch said thoughtfully. "You disagreed about money. He accused you of being extravagant?"

"Yes, he did." She looked at him, faintly surprised and displeased that he should have guessed it. "When I tried so hard to be economical! But the point was that there was no need for me to be economical. My parents have plenty of money, and they wanted to help us, but he wouldn't let them. You see, they opposed our marriage to begin with, and Clay never got over that."

She could have added, he hated them. Hatred was the only possible explanation for the way he (Continued on Page 111)

Morning in their Eyes

These were the lost ones, too young to be left, but too old to be led by delusion.

BY I. A. R. WYLIE

HEINI woke from deep sleep. At the bottom of his sleep, way down in the dark, was the dream. It was always the same dream. But when he floated up to a sunlit wakefulness, he had forgotten it. Sometimes he would lie with closed eyes and fish for it as he fished with Helmut and Trüdchen and Fritzle for perch in the black pond under the willow trees. (Fritzle was only a flop-eared puppy, but he had learned to sit quiet and watchful.) And once Heini had caught something. It was as though his line had tightened. Cautiously, in breathless excitement he had drawn a face, blurred featureless by the riffling waters, almost to the surface. A hand had reached up to him. It was a strong-looking hand, but it was asking him for help and he had plunged his own hand down to meet it and had felt it close gratefully on his. Its strength and gentleness had flowed like a warm tide up his arm to his heart—all over him. He would never forget the feel of it. It began to draw him down into the dream itself.

Then Fritzle had jumped on his bed, licking his face, and he had become wide awake. The hand that had seemed so strong weakened and let him go, sadly. It sank back into the dark. His throat hurt him as it did when he was trying not to cry.

This morning Mütterchen stood by his side and shook him. He called her "little mother" because that was what she had taught him to call her. But really she was a big woman, strong as a plow horse. She had light blue eyes in a weathered face. Sometimes they were soft and kind and smiling and sometimes hard and cold as steel. This morning they were bright with angry fear.

"Get up, Heini, you must get up at once. The bad people have come at last. They are asking for you."

She helped him with expert hands. All the time she talked to him. She said the same things over and over again, for though he was ten years old he wasn't like other children of his age. He couldn't always understand what was said to him or say what he wanted to say. His mind was like a trick box with a false bottom. Somewhere in it, like the dream in the deep places of his sleep, was a secret treasure.

"They are cruel people, Heini. They will want to take you away from me and beat and kill you. They will ask you the questions." She held him away from her. Her fingers bit into his thin arms. "Do you remember the answers?" she whispered to him.

"Yes," he said.

"Repeat them to me."

He obeyed, slowly, painstakingly, and her fingers relaxed. She ran her hand through his thick,

THE SECRET OF HOW TO GET ALONG WITH PEOPLE: DON'T ASK SENSELESS OR EMBARRASSING QUESTIONS. ★ BY HUGHES MEARNS

QUESTIONING one another is the distinguishing mark of Americans everywhere. The English have always taught that it is ill-bred to inquire about one's personal affairs, and this is also the general view of other cultivated persons outside of this country. Foreigners who really like us remark that we do not seem to have any deep sense of privacy. We do not converse; we quiz.

Most of our questions in ordinary conversation, however, represent merely a careless national habit. Admitted that Americans are conspicuously quiz-minded, they don't always seem to care what sort of answers they get. We greet one another with, "How are you?" The answer is "Fine. And how are you?" Then comes, "Fine. And how are all your folks?" . . . "Fine. And how are all your folks?" . . . "Fine." As the answer is always "Fine," there is really not much point in asking. In fact, the chap who replies by reciting all the family aches and pains is rated unsporting and a bore.

Useless questions pound upon our ears. Going to an old vacation spot, we are met with, "When did you come up? How long are you going to stay? When are you going back?" Once would mean nothing, but every native and every winter resident holds the newcomer with the same machine-gun drilling. It drives him to resolve to go next year to a place where nobody ever heard of him.

Elevator attendants and receptionists tell me that they use up most of their early energy thinking up replies to serious and facetious morning quizzes. These vary from, "How are you feeling this morning, big boy?" to "How do you manage, girlie, to look so beautiful every day?" From nine to ten-thirty the average is about one hundred such bombardments. Add to this the procession of "Good mornings," each one a distraction from the work at hand. However, these buffeted persons notice with relief my innocuous "Hello." "Hello" requires no searching for appropriate words of reply. The answering "Hello" is easy and restful, and it is wholly impersonal.

"Hello" is first on my agenda of social reform; it has dozens of friendly intonations characteristic of the really considerate attitude of our people; it breaks down class distinctions and superiorities. Think of the difference in effect between the standoffish "How do you do?" and the free-and-easy American "Hello." I am recommending it everywhere as one of the best devices for opening up good and profitable communications.

But questioning may be something much more than an unthinking habit. Children sense early that home questions are often devices to gather evidence against a culprit. "Where have you been all afternoon? Who were with you? Did you have anything to eat?" Such cross-examination drives even good children into the minor immoralities, into evasions, silence and prevarication.

IN the school and in the home, therefore, questions have earned a bad reputation; even the most innocent of them suggest a probe, an insinuation or a rebuke. Convincing parents of this fact, we have had good results in persuading them to ask their children fewer and fewer personal questions. This does not mean that mothers and fathers are not still eager to hear every bit of trivial news about their own; but once made aware of the dangers of forcing private disclosures here, they listen to us and learn to wait. Eventually they hear from willing lips everything that they need to know.

Deep wounds of grief are needlessly stirred by thoughtless inquiries. Questions that give distress could be avoided by a little considerate thinking. It is dangerous to inquire directly about the absent unless one is confident all is well with them. One should survey the ground cautiously even with our most intimate friends. After a short absence I once greeted an old acquaintance jocularly with, "How is the good wife?" He came back promptly, "Which one?" One must be strictly up-to-date in these swiftly moving times.

The place to start this personal and social reform is at the beginning of any casual or customary meeting; that is, between parent and child, husband and wife, friend and friend, between business associates, and especially between the boss and those under him. This, we have found, is the spot of greatest sensitivity and that is where most of the later trouble originates. Begin there to cut down questions if not to avoid them altogether.

Instead of the customary quizzes, for example, one could learn to have something pleasant to say about oneself, about a recent happening, say, or something wished for. The helpful slogan here is, "Don't ask; tell."

Portrait of a Woman painted about 1830 by an unknown American artist

The fascination of American primitives is to be found very often in their use of distortion. Here the artist has caught his sitter in a moment of self-communing, the kind of mood one longs to destroy, almost instinctively, with the old byword, "A penny for your thoughts." To convey this lady's self-absorption, her staring into space, the artist has apparently tried to rivet our attention on her eyes. This he does with three distortions, each so subtle that it does not violate our sense of actuality. The eyes are made abnormally large, their highlights are given exaggerated prominence, and one eye is drawn on a diagonal slant to help to call our attention to this part of the face through its surprising asymmetry.

Next to the eyes, the ear is the most prominent feature of the portrait. This is rendered with exaggerated clarity and slightly distorted into a frontal view, instead of being drawn in perspective against the head. Here the painter seems to have been interested in the ear as abstract form, in its sinuous pattern. Notice how the curves of the ear are echoed in the sinuous edge of the dress, the contour of the side of the face, the lips, the eyebrows, the main mass of the hair and its separate strands. Thus the design of the painting is, in a way, analogous to a musical composition, with its major theme a certain sinuous curve, which we notice first in the ear, and which we find repeated with variations in the other features. The distortions, which help to create the mood and the design of the picture, may have been unconscious, even accidental, but they give the portrait its distinction, place it closer to the great tradition of painting than the photographic copying of appearance arrived at by more academic painters of the same period.

A Baby Finds its Hands

Until now it's been a pink rattle, a fluffy blue bunny with silver bells on it, or a handful of multicolored circlets bouncing about on a piece of string, suspended in the air by . . .

Someone. Then Someone gets tired and moves off, and the bright bit of intrigue disappears, as does everything else, into the big strange world lying beyond the even bars of a crib. . . .

But today there's a new toy, nothing at all like a rattle, or a rainbow on a string. A funny toy that waves, and sweeps, and curls, and makes a hundred shapes—and never two the same. . . .

What's more—it stays there for as long as you want it. And no one can tire and move away, because it's a pair of small hands, and the Someone who holds them up is—You. . . .

Sleep if you have to; it doesn't matter. When you awaken they're still right there. Take a bath—it's even better. Hands in water make waves, and splashes, and beautiful sounds. . . .

Touch things. Some are warm, and some are cool. There are soft things and hard things, and smooth and rough things. Finger your face. Until today you didn't know you had one! . . .

Ownership is an interesting business. It gives you that sense of responsibility they're always writing about. It says, "This is yours, and you're the guy that's in charge here!" . . .

And think of the future possibilities. After all, you've been around this town for only sixteen weeks. Envision the magic of sixteen months. Imagine the wonders of sixteen years! . . .

No one can tell how high they may reach. They may be the hands that will build a bridge, or play the piano. These might be the hands that will bring back the stars and recapture the moon!

WHAT I'VE ALWAYS WANTED TO DO

By Judith Chase Churchill

EVERYONE has a right to dream. And all of us, regardless of profession or success, have a secret desire to do something else. It may be a pure flight of the imagination or a down-to-earth ambition which, for some reason or another, isn't possible.

To find what their daydreams are made of, we queried these thirty-five celebrities as to what they've always wanted to do.

Here's what they answered. If you think your own daydreams are extravagant or even unusual, just take a look at theirs.

Ever since I was a little girl I have had two conflicting urges in the direction of self-expression. One was to be a writer; the other was to be a painter. Well, I became the writer—of sorts—which eventually led me into the path of politics. I stopped drawing and painting after I was fifteen. But I still have this urge, and someday I hope I shall fulfill it.

There is little time in a busy woman's life for daydreaming, but occasionally I do daydream of the time when I shall be able to daub away in oils on bits of canvas. I think I shall paint pictures of children. Sad children like the brave, heartbreaking little ones I have seen in Europe and Asia. Gay and round and fat ones like one sees, thank heaven, so often in America.

—Clare Boothe Luce.

My secret ambition is to write.

My avowed ambition is to write.

Practically my sole ambition is to write.

But a corollary ambition is to do it in a Size 16 dress, and without ever having to let out a seam, on three meals a day which shall consist exclusively of the rich forbidden foods that never make the reducing menus. —Fannie Hurst.

My secret ambition—or, rather, ambitions, since there are three, are very simple. I have always wanted to own a ranch, preferably a county, in a magnificent mountain country, the road into which is known only to myself and a few intimate friends. This ranch would run itself automatically; all cattle and other stock would be perfect from birth; and all ranch hands and foremen would be intelligent, loyal and feverishly energetic. Mail, and especially newspapers, would arrive only once a month.

I have a ranch in a magnificent mountain country, but everyone knows his way into it.

Second: like all writers, on this ranch I would like to write beautiful and earth-shaking novels merely by lying on a bed, thinking and then waving my hand. No pencils, no typewriters, no editors and, above all, no dead lines.

Third: and again all writers feel the same way, at regular intervals there would be brought to me all those who do not understand what I say, and all those who write me letters pointing out mistakes. By another wave of my hand, I would knock all their heads together.

I suppose none of this is practical, but it's a lovely dream. —Struthers Burt.

I'd like to be the poor man's John Kieran. I'd like to have the photographic memory that retains all the wealth of information to which we're exposed during a lifetime and that only such a man as Kieran can store in his mental warehouse. That's for me. Then I'd surely know all the answers. —Morton Downey.

If the present torrent of historical novels continues—and it shows no signs of stopping—I would like to write a book that will provide an escape from escape literature.

—Max Shulman.

Some people have a secret desire to throw a raw egg into an electric fan. Not me! I've always wanted to find out what would happen if, at some highly proper tea party, I raised my hand, the fingers spread wide, and brought it down—wham!—into the middle of a huge, puffy, cream-colored Mocha tarte. Just how far would it splash, I wonder? And which rule of Emily Post would help the consternation of my hostess? —Jane Cowl.

I've always wanted to write a novel that would make me live as Dickens (my favorite of all novelists) has lived. I've always wanted to invent a dish that would be so wonderful that it would go down to posterity with my name on it. I've always wanted to save somebody's life and be a heroine. I've always wanted to be the very best anybody could possibly be at something. This is an honest answer and I'm afraid it proves what I've always suspected—that I'm just an old show-off.

—Mary Margaret McBride.

I'd like to contribute to an economic revolution in my native South, especially in my native Mississippi.

I'd like to grow vegetables and flowers as pretty as those in ads. —James Street.

When I go to a very serious play, at the most serious moment of the play, when the audience is hushed and reverent, I always have a wild desire to stand up and scream!

Also, I wish that just once, when a radio announcer is going through his sirupy commercials, I could say, "Aw, keep quiet," and he would hear me! —Joan Bennett.

I'd like to look like Hedy Lamarr, be able to act like Ingrid Bergman, sing like Maggie Teyte and have the mind of Dr. Margaret Mead, anthropologist, with my own sense of humor. —Elsa Maxwell.

Be the smart-cracking, superintelligent sort of woman that my press agents have made me out to be, just because I happen to have played a few roles of that type. I wish I always had a handy wisecrack, but I don't.

—Rosalind Russell.

I've always wanted to be an ambidextrous baseball pitcher—Walter Johnson with my right hand and Grove with my left.

I always wanted to be flyweight boxing champion of the world.

I've lived out of my time. I've wished that I could turn time back to the days of the Crusades, and be present at the joust between Richard the Lion-Hearted and Saladin.

I want to rise up some night in the Stork Club, pull out my gat, Old Betsy, and cool off everybody that I don't like. And then plead guilty. —Stanley Walker.

I should like to be a ballet dancer (but just for the season, mind you) and a nun and a soldier and a poet and the best cook in the world and the matro of an orphan asylum, and a pin-up girl, and Whistler's mother and Winston Churchill and my own mother and Gypsy Rose Lee.

—Elisabeth Cobb.

I have always wanted to be able to dance—not for professional dancing, just dancing for my own enjoyment. Due to an early injury to my spine, my walk was always a little jerky and this was accentuated when I danced. If I couldn't do it well I did not want to do it at all. It was the grace and charm of dancing that I longed for.

I am telling you this because after all I haven't needed dancing to live a full and rich life. Perhaps I have had a richer and fuller life because of my handicap. I had to find other means of expression, other ways of companionship. I like my life. It has had plenty of good things in it.

—Alice Tisdale Hobart.

My secret ambition is to sing a hot boogie-woogie number with President Truman at the piano. —Cass Daley.

I should like to be beautiful instead of having to chatter amiably and listen eagerly in order to say the right and intelligent thing. I should like to sit in utter muteness—not alone, of course, not unnoticed, but on the contrary an object of interest and wonder. "Who is that divine creature?" everyone is obviously saying. "What a strange and fascinating personality. What is she really thinking about?"

If I am not the mild little man who wants to be a bullfighter, I am afraid I am the cheerful wholesome housewife who would like to be Greta Garbo—or perhaps only the cagey woman who wants to charm without effort.

—Ethel Vance.

I'd take the job of writing lyrics for a musical version of some Jane Austen novel.

—Phyllis McGinley.

My ambition since the age of eight—up to then I wanted to be a mermaid—is to be the assistant curator of a zoo. Secretly, of course, I would like to be curator, but I'm afraid that's too high-flown a desire. —Neysa McMein.

Weather unsettled? Just settle for SOUP!

Here are three taste-tempting Campbell's Soups to build 'tween-season meals around

And suddenly it's Spring! But you're ready for it, and for those nip-and-tuck days when you're Campbell's Soups on hand. Be the weather sunny or dismay, hot-stove lunch or supper soup that warms the heart and comforts the hungry. Here are three ideal dishes to keep in mind—and on your shelf.

THIS HEFTY SOUP got its start in Scotland where appetites are rugged. Adapted by Campbell's to American tastes, it's mouth-watering meat stock, crisp with many fine vegetables, good barley, tender pieces of mutton. Campbell's Scotch Broth is a substantial soup for the hungry of every age.

Campbell's SCOTCH BROTH

IT'S NEW AND IMPROVED! Like green pea soup? Then just taste Campbell's new, improved recipe for 'tween-season meals. This new, improved recipe for Green Pea Soup gives you peas, young and tender, made into a smooth puree with fine table butter. Add water for a tempting pea soup; milk for an extra-nourishing cream of pea.

without being nipped? A friend of mine came home last year all black and blue behind. Can you imagine?"

Penny began to laugh. "Well, I think when Geneva sends you on a mission into Italy, you'd better invest in a bustle. Put it on your expense account. Call it your International Underpinning."

"Stop laughing like that, Penny! You aren't even funny. And you shouldn't laugh at your own jokes, anyway, when they are so bad."

"The worse they are, the better I like them," Penny said cheerfully. "If you won't take my advice, why not ask mother?" she added mischievously.

At that moment Mrs. Lorrimer, in her marabou-trimmed gown and a boudoir cap which covered her hair entirely, entered. "Moira, what are you doing here? You should have been in bed by this time. It is almost midnight. Did I hear that you wanted my advice about something?"

"Oh, I was wondering about the color of my new dance frock. I think I'd like blue for a change," Moira said quickly.

"We can discuss that at breakfast," Mrs. Lorrimer said. "Now, to bed with you." She turned to leave the room. "Good night, Penelope," she said severely as she went into the hall.

Moira looked angrily at Penny, who had caught up a cushion and, holding it behind her back, was limping ostentatiously around the room. "Good night, mother," Penny called. She ignored her sister's undignified face twisting, and said much too gently, "Good night, my sweet." The door closed with a satisfactory bang.

"Moira!" her mother said warningly. And then the murmur of voices, and the footsteps died away.

Penny threw the cushion back onto the bed, went to the window, pulled the curtains aside, and leaned on her elbows as she stood at the sill to watch the night sky. The soft wisps of cloud traveled over the stars, hiding and then revealing them as the night wind drove on. There was the brilliance of the North Star, and down there was the south, and four hundred miles south was London. London. She kept repeating the magic name.

She would walk about the streets, and look and look and never get too much of looking. She would see strange things, and meet strange people. She would have a room of her own, where none would come unless she invited them.

And of course she would work; she would be able to paint and think of painting without Moira and Betty and mother all pulling her away from it. And if she could get working well enough, perhaps there would be some success. London would be the gateway to a whole new world. She would travel and be independent. She could live on an island in the Mediterranean, or paint in a village high among the Alps. She would see Paris and New York and Vienna. She would see Everywhere. She shivered with happiness.

Penny went over to the bookcase, and searched for the atlas in its bottom shelf, turned the pages quickly until she found London and the southern counties. She measured carefully with thumb and forefinger and consulted the scale of miles. Why, Oxford was quite near London, nearer than she had imagined. About seventy miles, roughly. That was nothing at all!

She rose, put out the light quickly, slid into bed. The linen sheets were c was like bathing in a mountain Penny was too excited to sleep. She think about today. FIRST WOMAN DOCTOR

Today there are over half a million women in medical and health services, 7500 of them doctors. But the title of matriarch of medicine in America goes to Elizabeth Blackwell, the first woman doctor, who received her diploma from Hobart College in 1849—after she had been refused admission by twelve other medical schools. Despite professional prejudice and stodgy conservatives who viewed with alarm the prospect of a woman physician, she built up a large practice in New York. With her sister, Dr. Emily Blackwell, the first woman surgeon, she was cofounder of the New York Infirmary for Women and Children, one of the three U. S. hospitals staffed exclusively by women.

"Sorry, father. I didn't mean to waken you. I was trying not to."

The shadowy face against the white pillows smiled. "That's all right, David. I wasn't asleep, anyway. Did you have a good holiday?"

"Fine. I'll tell you all about it tomorrow." David crossed over to the heavy wooden bedstead. He lifted the thin hand which stretched over the counterpane to meet his, and said as he pressed it gently, "Let me draw down those blinds. That lamplight is keeping you awake."

"No. I can't breathe when the windows are covered. That keeps the air out."

"It's pretty warm tonight," David agreed. He heard the light clatter of heelless slippers on the wooden stairs. "That's Margaret," he said with a smile, "coming to give me a row about wakening you."

DAVID'S father smiled, too, as Margaret appeared in her cotton kimono at the doorway and said, "David, you can see father in the morning. This is a dreadful hour to come home."

For a moment the two men enjoyed the shared feeling of innocent conspiracy against female authority. Then David said, "Good night, father." He suddenly bent over the bed and kissed his father's gaunt cheek.

Margaret closed the door impatiently. "Really, David!" she said. "We've only one article of furniture in this hall, and you had to fall over it."

"I had forgotten how narrow the hall was." David pulled one of the long dark plaits of hair which hung over her shoulder. "How are you?" he asked affectionately. "You look about fifteen in that rig-out."

Margaret's thin face softened for a moment. She tossed the plait out of his reach. "I'm all right. What about a cup of tea or something?"

"You'll probably curse me, but I should like some tea. And a sandwich. I haven't had anything to eat since midday."

"Well," Margaret said shrewdly, "they say beer is nourishing."

He laughed softly, and followed her toward the kitchen. Same old Meg, David thought.

"Why didn't you have dinner on the train?" Margaret's slippers clopped over the linoleum floor from sink to gas stove.

"I didn't feel very hungry."

Margaret looked at him quickly. "The check?" she asked.

He shook his head. "Lady Fenton-Stevens will no doubt tell her secretary in a day or two," he said bitterly.

"Oh." Margaret sat down on the other kitchen chair. Disappointment chased away that young look; suddenly she seemed much older than her twenty-five years. Now you noticed that she was too thin and that the sloping shoulders were round. "No Cornwall. No holiday," she said. "She'll probably forget all about it."

"No, no. After all, she came asking me to take on the job. I didn't go begging her for it. Don't worry. I'll give you the money which I set aside for Oxford. The check will surely arrive in time to keep me solvent."

"What were they like? The boys you tutored, I mean."

"Decent enough. But between you and me, Meg, there were moments when I thought they were solid teak above here." He placed his forefingers across his eyebrows.

"So it wasn't all holiday," his sister conceded. She rose to deal with the bubbling kettle. She was in good humor again; she was reassured about Cornwall. "What is Scotland like?" she asked. "Whom did you meet?"

David brought some cold mutton into the kitchen, and the small brown crock which held butter floating in salted water. "I'll tell you all about it tomorrow. You go up to bed, Margaret. I'll have a sandwich and then turn in too."

"I'm going to have a cup of tea. It's too warm, anyway, to be able to sleep, so we may as well talk."

David thought of the letter he wanted to write and post so that it could reach Edinburgh by tomorrow night. The quickest way to write it would be to eat this food, talk to Margaret and go to his room. So he began to tell her about Loch Innish. He talked, too, of Inchnamurren and Doctor MacIntyre. He knew instinctively that Margaret would be antagonized by the idea of Penny. She had sulked for weeks when she had learned about Eleanor Fenton-Stevens: a cool, calculated sulking to show her disapproval. She had never given any reason for it, even after Eleanor and the sulking period were both over.

"IT must have been wonderful," Margaret said. "How I envy you, David. You get all the luck, don't you?"

"Well," he said, and then smiled and said no more about that. "Perhaps we'd better turn in now. You will have a lot of packing to do tomorrow."

"I've packed everything already. I don't need so very much for two or three weeks. Just as well, isn't it, considering the state of my wardrobe? And Cornwall is so very quiet."

"Well, why not choose a gayer place, if you want it? You will have money enough for a decent holiday," David said, trying to keep his voice even.

"Oh, it is all settled. Florence is expecting me. She has been having a miserably lonely summer, and she would never forgive me if I didn't go. She is counting the weeks until she can be back in London. She will probably be qualified by next spring."

"Qualified as what?" David couldn't resist asking. "A piano mover?"

Florence Rawson, the large, rawboned daughter of a country doctor in Cornwall, had met Margaret at the College of Music in their first year as students there. Florence was going to be the composer, Margaret the concert pianist. Time had altered Margaret's plans. When her mother died, she had had to come home to look after her father, and she could manage to attend only an occasional class. But no time would ever make Florence a composer: she had never had an original idea in her head. Whenever she visited this house, David made his excuses ar for his life.

"You don't need to be so cruel about l ence," Margaret said in swift de "She's as clever as you are, perhaps erer."

"That wouldn't be difficult," Davi lightly. He rose, and cleared away th and saucers. "Come on, Meg. I am l ning to feel exhausted."

She said suddenly, "You are going Oxford the week before term starts, you?"

David looked at her in surprise. "I know yet. I might stay here until Oct At the end of September Penny would riving in London.

"But you said you were going up ea Oxford this term. You said you want work."

HE looked at her worried face. "Com Out with it. Why do you want me to go a week earlier than necessary?"

She was disconcerted by the unexp question. She hesitated, then came out the truth flatly. "I've asked Floren to come here for that week."

David stared at her. "You mean s is going to have my room?"

"Until she finds new digs. Her lan last year was horrid. Objected to the being played."

David restrained his rising temper. "Did you ask father about this? I don't im an invalid particularly enjoys a str crashing all over his house."

"Florence won't disturb father. Bes you might remember that if it weren't f this house would exist. Who looks it and keeps it goi

There's a secret—did you know it?—to frying bacon perfectly. For instance . . . do you start your bacon slices in a cold frying pan? Do you have the heat set at low? Do you pour off extra fat as it accumulates? Do you cook it until it is just crisp? If you can answer YES to all these—your bacon is tender—crisp but not brittle—perfect!

Bacon with Pineapple Slices. Place bacon strips in cold frying pan and fry over low heat for about 8 minutes, turning frequently. Fry drained canned pineapple slices in the bacon fat for a few minutes until lightly browned. Serve piping hot for Sunday breakfast and get ready for rave notices!

Speaking of Compliments . . . You can take a bow at dinnertime, too—when you team bacon with vegetables. Creamed Spinach, for instance, tastes really good with crisp bacon crumbled over the top just before it's served. And the same goes for broiled tomatoes!

Glory Be—Less Shrinkage! Armour Star Bacon doesn't shrink away to nothing—because it's dry sugar-cured in its own natural juices! Since no water or curing solution is added, there's none to cook away. And the quality of Armour Star Bacon never shrinks either! Each bacon side is hand-picked—and smoked to perfection over hardwood fires!

Like Romeo Went with Juliet—bacon goes with rarebit! And the best-tasting rarebit you ever ate is made with Cloverbloom American Cheese. Semi-sharp, mild-tasting, it comes from the heart of America's dairyland! And if you fancy yourself a cheese connoisseur you'll try Cloverbloom Wedge-Cut American Cheese with crisp crackers.

"Thank you, David. You shouldn't have bothered." She was embarrassed, conscious of the change in her tone of voice. "I'm sorry I was cross." She turned away suddenly. "Good night, David," she said in a muffled voice.

"Good night." Poor Meg, there wasn't anything wrong with her which a legacy of a hundred pounds could not cure. That was all most people needed: just a sense of a little security. They could face their problems more easily then.

In his room, he unpacked his writing pad and placed his books in their proper place beside the others in his bookcase. Then he sat wearily down on the hard chair at his desk. He pulled the crumpled letter from his pocket. There was also that other one which he had written from Loch Innish. So there were two now which he hadn't posted. He tore both letters into pieces, and then burned all the scraps, slowly, in the deep ash tray. He suddenly felt miserably tired and unhappy.

He wrote a very simple note, beginning, "Dear Penny" and ending with, "Yours sincerely, David Bosworth." He thanked her for the pleasant day he had enjoyed in Edinburgh, he hoped he would see her in Oxford or in London.

He read the note again. Suddenly he added a postscript. When would she arrive in London, and what was her address to be? Would she let him know? You thought you were a fool, he told himself, because you let yourself see her again. But you would be a bigger fool if you hadn't—or if you don't. He kept thinking about her even after he had fallen into a restless sleep.

Margaret had gone to Cornwall and the month passed pleasantly in Cory's Walk. David and his father agreed that it was perfect picnic weather and arranged their meals accordingly. Mrs. Trumble, Margaret's weekly stand-by, now came in for an hour each day to wash up and dust around. Certainly life had become very simple. Mr. Bosworth seemed to enjoy it. And David was happy: his work was going well and the odd hours spent with his father in the garden were pleasant for both men.

It was easy to be happy with this new background of elation to all his thoughts. He was writing twice a week to Scotland, and twice a week he had his replies. He would have written every day if Mr. Lorrimer had not to be reckoned with. Penny reported that a letter even twice a week was raising eyebrows in one half of the family, and amused comment in the other half.

David no longer tried to rationalize or justify his summer madness. He was content to feel the excitement which raced through his blood when he saw her neat, decided writing on an incoming envelope, or to hold the happiness which swept over him when he took his pen and pad and sat down to write her. Sometimes he wondered how strange it was that, having met her only twice, he should miss her so much. And he knew instinctively that if he once let her slip he would never find her again.

September came at last, with its grayer skies and cool evenings. Margaret's visit to Cornwall had been extended to four weeks, and she came back with a new store of energy which she proceeded to use putting the house in order for Florence Rawson's coming.

It was bad enough, David reflected, to have his routine completely upset and his work made more difficult because of interruptions, without being conscious of the fact that all this was happening because of the Rawson woman. Margaret had not thought, before, that his room needed new curtains and that the desk had to be repainted, and that the furniture needed oiling and waxing. It was no good saying what he thought, either; when he tried that, he was shown that he was unreasonable and selfish. If it weren't for his father, David thought, he would find a room of his own somewhere else.

"What's wrong, David?" she asked him one evening.

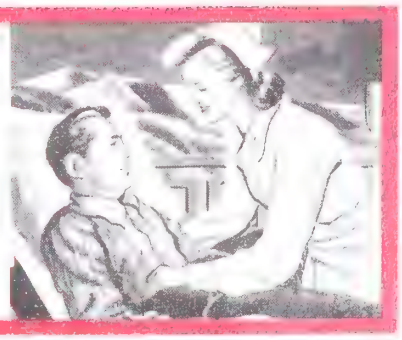
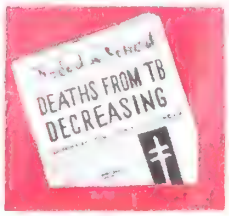
Can you answer these questions about

TUBERCULOSIS?



Q. Is there hope of conquering tuberculosis?



A. Indeed there is! Since 1900 the yearly death rate from tuberculosis has been reduced from over 200 per 100,000 to under 40! Many authorities say that by continuing a well-planned, forceful campaign—with public co-operation—deaths from tuberculosis may be almost wiped out in the next twenty years.

Q. What are the important steps in this campaign?

A. First: constant effort to find and treat more cases in the early stages when the disease is easier to control. Second: adequate treatment for active cases, preferably hospital care, which will help to avoid infecting others. Third: proper care for people who have had tuberculosis, including medical supervision and occupational guidance to prevent recurrence. Fourth: a drive to eliminate poor health habits and conditions which invite tuberculosis.

Q. Why are periodic examinations so important?

A. Tuberculosis, especially in the early stages, often has no symptoms. Its discovery then depends on a thorough medical examination, aided by X-ray. Such examinations are particularly important among adults, especially older persons, workers exposed to silica dust, and other special groups which have high tuberculosis death rates.

Q. How is medical science fighting tuberculosis?

A. New X-ray equipment and techniques are making examinations easier and less expensive. Studies with streptomycin and other new drugs give promise for the future. There are indications that a vaccine may provide a measure of immunity against tuberculosis. But these drugs and vaccines are still experimental, and as yet there is no substitute for standard methods of treatment.

Don't let tuberculosis frighten you

Today, through modern medical skills, most cases of tuberculosis can be controlled if caught in time. The earlier that treatment is started, the better are the chances for a prompt and lasting cure.

If you should have tuberculosis, your physician will recommend treatment, probably in a sanatorium. Once the disease is brought under control you can usually return to a normal way of living, with periodic checkups to make sure the disease does not become active again. You should faithfully follow your doctor's instructions in order to speed recovery and maintain good health afterward.

Regular medical examinations provide comforting reassurance even if you don't have tuberculosis, and suggest immediate treatment if the disease should be detected. For further information about such examinations and about the disease itself, ask your physician, public health officer, or local Tuberculosis Association.

when he had been with his father, he had said he was worried. But were the reasons he had given the only true ones? Or wasn't he also afraid because the limits of Cory's Walk were still holding him? That was why he had never discussed his future plans with anyone except his father, Chaundler at Oxford and, strangely enough, MacIntyre at Inchmurren. And Penny in Edinburgh. But with no one else.

If he were to fail, he would be thought overambitious. If George Fenton-Stevens were to fail, his friends would laugh and say, "Poor old George. Too bad. Better luck next time, old boy." But if David were to fail there would be no second chance, for his own belief in himself would be gone. When you came from Cory's Walk and aimed high, you had to be so good that there was no possibility of failure. That was why he wouldn't discuss his plans or ambitions with his friends. That was why he was always so vague about them. That way, the laughs and the sneers wouldn't be so loud if you failed, and the pity wouldn't be there, either. "Well, David didn't manage it," his friends would say, "but I don't think he was very serious about it. Never mentioned it very much, did he?" That was right: keep quiet, never mention it, and then if you failed it wouldn't seem such a blow.

Yet he had told Penny. Strange how he had suddenly blurted it out while they were leaning over the wall of Edinburgh Castle, as if he had set himself to impress her, win her admiration. The mating display, he thought suddenly. Did I really behave like that? But she had not laughed at him. She had listened with her large blue eyes watching him sympathetically as if she really wanted to hear him talk. As if she really enjoyed being with him.

He moved away from the window, and sat down to write her. This was the third letter this week, Mr. Lorrimer or no Mr. Lorrimer. As he dated the sheet of paper, he looked at the calendar and said to himself, Another week, and I leave for Oxford. And then, after that, Penny arrives here. Blast that Rawson woman. If it weren't for her, I could have seen Penny every day until term started.

THEN he began thinking how he might see Penny on the day she arrived, at least. He tried to imagine the surprise on her face when she arrived at King's Cross Station and found him waiting to meet her. Then he glanced at his watch, and noted the time, and stopped all his wondering and imagining and began writing. It was "Darling Penny" this time, and he didn't even notice how naturally he had written it.

The notice board, three porters and a ticket inspector had all agreed that the train from Edinburgh would arrive at this platform in five minutes. David was still only half persuaded. He watched the giant hand of the station's clock as it jerked eagerly to each new minute, and debated with himself whether he should stand at the gate to the platform or whether he should use the platform ticket which he had bought. He decided to use it, and yet keep near enough to the gate so he could not possibly miss her.

The notice board, three porters and the ticket inspector had been right after all. The train was pulling in exactly on time. And suddenly the deserted platform was filled with people. The crowd was much bigger than he had imagined it would be, and his nervousness returned. It would be easy to miss her after all in this millrace. He didn't even know what clothes she would be wearing, and she didn't know he was going to be in London.

And then he saw her. There was a man with her, too, a white-haired man dressed in well-cut navy blue. He was carrying her small suitcase and talking to her in a grave, pleasant way. David walked over so that he would stand in their path. Penny was happy. Her eyes were dancing; she was missing no details on the crowded platform as she listened to her companion. Well, London, here I am, she seemed to be saying.

She saw him suddenly, stared blankly, halted, and then, without a word of warning to her companion, ran forward. "Oh, David!" she said. And there they were, holding each other's hands, gripping them, not shaking them.

"Well," the white-haired man said as he reached them, "I'm glad to see someone did meet you. Yours, I think," he said with a broad smile as he handed the suitcase over to David.

Penny remembered her manners. "Thank you so much for making the journey so pleasant."

"Not at all, not at all. The pleasure was mine." He raised his hat neatly and left them, still smiling, to merge into the stream of people flowing slowly through the narrow gate.

"Who on earth was that?" David said as they, too, joined the queue.

"A captain. Navy. He has just been retired. He is sweet, isn't he?"

"Oh, a friend of your family," David suggested.

"No. I don't even know his name. I met him at one of those small tables in the restaurant car."

"Penny, you are ——" He didn't finish the sentence, but smiled instead and shook his head slowly. He took her arm and led her out of the station. Penny was the kind of girl whose suitcase was carried for her, whose arm was held as she crossed a street. "You know," David said, still smiling, "you really shouldn't talk to strangers."

"Don't you?" She laughed. Then she halted and drew in a deep breath of air. "London! It smells and sounds so good!" she said.

"Only Londoners are supposed to think that. But"—he tried to make his voice sound more severe—"men are different. They can talk to strangers without complications."

When you see a good man, think of emulating him: when you see a bad man, examine your own heart. —CONFUCIUS.

Penny laughed again, and said, "David, this is the most wonderful surprise. Did you come up all the way from Oxford?"

"No, I just happened to be wandering on the platform ready to challenge the whole blasted fleet." He looked down at the suitcase he was carrying. "And am I to be called 'sweet' too?"

"No," Penny said decidedly. "You are much, much, nicer than sweet." Then her color deepened and she pretended to be interested in the long row of crawling traffic.

"Where's the rest of your luggage?" David asked, as he managed to get a taxi.

"The trunks were all sent on in advance."

She settled back in the taxi. She had never been happier in her life, she thought. She studied David's face as he gave the driver her address. David had come especially to meet her. Everything was wonderful: London and the smell of petrol and the multitude of noises, the swarming traffic and this wheezing taxicab. And David.

"We'll dump your case at your address," David was saying. "And then we'll have dinner at a little place I know, and after that we'll take in a theater. How's that?"

"Marvelous." Everything was marvelous. "But I shall have to report or something at this women's residence. I'm sort of nervous inside, David. I keep trying to imagine what it will be like."

"It is a place for women, run by women, so you'll have chintz and dainty salads and rice puddings and gay girlish laughter all around you. You'll find it pretty awful, I expect. What on earth made you take a room there?"

"Father and mother. They let me come to London only on the understanding that I'd stay at this place. They think it is 'safe'! And because it is expensive, it must be good!"

She stared doubtfully at the row of four houses which had been converted into one building, before which the cab had drawn up. It had a basement surrounded by iron railings, and a bridge of steps to the front door on the ground floor. There were three stories of uniform windows above that, and attic windows set into the steep sloping roof with its lines of chimney pots. A large polished brass name plate informed the ignorant that it was Baker House, Residence for Women.

"I'll wait in the cab for you, Penny," David said as he deposited the suitcase in the hand of a stiffly starched maid with a measuring eye. The door was shut firmly in his face.

When she came out, at last, he could sense her disappointment. She greeted him with too determined cheerfulness.

"Well, did they show you your cell?" he asked.

She smiled. "No chintz, at least," she reported. "Just faded green baize. Walls distempered at least five years ago in a safe cream color. And the trunks have arrived." With the two trunks standing in her ten-by-eight-foot room, there wasn't an inch of free space. There was not much space to put anything, except on the blank bare walls. "I've a window, too," she said. "One of those up there on the top floor."

"The very top floor?" David asked. "Do they use the attic too?"

"They use every inch. There was another room vacant on a lower floor, but it would cost two guineas a week more." She laughed suddenly. "It isn't only the Scots who count every penny, seemingly."

"Look, this wasn't exactly what your parents planned, was it?"

"Hardly," Penny said, and went on laughing. Not at three and a half guineas a week. "Anyway," she said when she had recovered some seriousness, "I am in London."

After that, she didn't talk very much, but David made enough conversation for both of them.

He paid off the cab in Piccadilly Circus, and guided her through the swooping traffic to the little island in the center. Below him, the flower girls strewed their bunches of sweet violets invitingly. Like the ancient sibyls that they were, they guarded their mysteries impassively until David's offering clinked into one of their capacious pockets. Then the omens were good, it seemed: Penny became a pretty lady, and David was God-blessed.

> It was said of a man who was always conjuring up gloomy chimeras and saw only the dark side of everything: "He builds dungeons in Spain." —CHAMFORT.

The restaurant he had chosen was in lower Regent Street. Dusk was beginning, and the lights were going on. Penny had recovered her first enthusiasm. There was a gaiety in her smile that caught the eye. Several men and women looked at her sharply.

"That's the fifth man we've passed who wishes I would drop dead," David said. "Here's the place. We'll have Hungarian music to help us digest the goulash."

Penny halted. A little place I know. It certainly wasn't the kind of place to be little in price. "Oh, David. Really—it looks awfully expensive."

"It isn't," David said cheerfully, as he caught her arm and guided her through the doorway. "Besides, I've been promising myself this evening for the last six weeks. Come on, don't thwart me. I'm a dangerous man when I'm thwarted. I fall down and have fits."

She smiled, and offered no further resistance.

"Well," he said when they had settled themselves at a comfortable table for two, and had ordered, "this is slightly better than a tavern in an Edinburgh side street, isn't it?"

She looked around at the decorative tables with their white linen, silver and flowers, at the white-and-gold-paneled walls. "I like it," she admitted. "But a man probably enjoys himself much better in the other kind of place. Doesn't he?"

He watched her, wondering at her good sense. And tact too: It looks awfully expensive. And when she had seen that he was set on this place, she had made no further objections but had come in here looking happy, charming and absolutely delighted with his choice.

"I find you very unsettling," he said. "Your eyes were puzzled. And blue, so very blue above the simple gray dress. Her hair was smoothly brushed and its warm red lights gleamed under the small piece of blue velvet. "I believe," he said slowly, "that you would be just as charming if I had taken you to a cheap café."

She smiled. "That could be fun, too," she admitted. "If one were enjoying oneself that is."

"And are you?"

She nodded, pretended to look at a group at another table, picked up the bunch of violets and held them to her face.

"No perfume, I'm afraid," he said. "Violets that look so perfect out of season could be expected to smell nice too. You can't have everything, it seems." His eyes caught hers and held them. "Only sometimes," he added, his voice now quite serious, desperately sincere. Only sometimes, perhaps—by the most miraculous good fortune.

But an efficient waiter chose this moment to serve them with much elaborate hovering like an inquisitive hummingbird. David concealed his annoyance as the waiter assisted in his routine.

Penny, with a smile in her eyes as she watched, began to talk of things to which even a waiter might listen. Her father had won a mixed-doubles tournament at Northwick, and then spent two days in bed recovering. Moira was still showing signs of strain from three weeks of International Students' meetings, and she was receiving constant letters from some one who had gone back to Italy. This had been very useful, really, in diverting the family's interest from Penny's own correspondence. Mrs. Lorrimer had become the president of the new Rambling and Health Club (which had to persuade girls from shops and factories to spend Sunday on their feet too); treasurer of the committee to set up Clubs for Bonnier Bairns and member of a Citizens' League for the Preservation and Protection of Ruins.

"The idea," Penny said determinedly in spite of the waiter as he fussed over the coffee cups and emptied the ash tray for the third time, "seems to be that ruins should look like ruins without being ruins any more. They are all to be cemented up efficiently so that they will stop falling down."

Then, from discussing ruins, they turned to elder statesmen—which, in the condition of the world in 1932, was quite a logical development for such a conversation.

"I'll pay this, and then perhaps we will get some peace," David said as the bill was unostentatiously presented. He added a more than adequate tip. "And," he added firmly to the waiter, "we shall take half an hour over our coffee, and we don't need any more ash trays emptied. We like the ash as they are. Is that quite clear?"

It may have been the tip, or the benevolent look which had suddenly appeared in David's eye, but at any rate the waiter removed himself to another table.

"Well," David said as he lit another cigarette with enjoyment. He looked at her with pleasure. "You are wearing earrings. And lipstick."

"They can't be as obvious as I thought," Penny said, "or you would have noticed them at once." She touched the small pearl studs in her ears to make certain that they were still secure. "My gesture of independence," she said with a laugh. "I put them on just as the train was crossing the border."

"Gauguin setting out for Tahiti?" David suggested. He was smiling too. "And did you put them on before or after lunch?"

"Before." And then she remembered. "David! Really, he was the nicest ship's officer imaginable!"

"I am imagining hard," David said, his smile broadening. Strange, he thought natural, how pleasant all this is. Strange how we can talk and laugh, and there is no irritation, no sense of being criticized or of criticizing, only this deep feeling of ease and contentment.

"How many times in our life have we sat together like this, talked and laughed together?" he asked suddenly.

She didn't answer, but her eyes met his.

"Or am I talking nonsense?" he asked with a good pretense of lightness in his voice. "Must be this music bringing out my gypsy blood." There he was, already backing away from the serious into the facetious, afraid of saying too much in case she would be amused or pitying or polite.

She said in a low voice, "It isn't nonsense, David."

Watching her eyes, he believed her. He touched her hand.

The waiter drew near once more: there were still other tips to be earned this evening.

"Let's go," David said quickly, and helped her with her coat. The moment was lost. She was talking to him in her natural voice again as they stood for a moment looking at the clear stars which shone in the crisp autumn sky. "Now, what about a theater?" he asked.

"Might we walk, first of all?" she asked. "It is a heavenly night, and I've been sitting in a train practically all day. It would be fun. Besides"—she smiled up at him as they fell into step—"I've had a lovely time already. You are spoiling me, you know."

"Let me worry about that. Penny, you are the strangest girl."

That was what her mother often said, but David made it sound like a compliment. She said in embarrassment, "I ought to worry about it, David. Because you give too much." She thought of this journey to meet her as she looked down at the violets which she carried.

"No one ever told me that before," he said, which was true enough. He had never met any attractive girls who had not accepted everything quite calmly as if it were their due. And then he began to worry: had she meant she didn't want so much from him, didn't want to accept anything more than she was willing to return?

PENNY was doing her own share of wondering, as she thought over his words. On how many girls had he spent so much thought and time and money as he had spent on her today? And why should she use the past tense? How many girls now of which she was one? Men wrote letters to women, asked them out; and it generally meant little more than a diversion, an amusing way to escape from boredom. She wondered, then, why she had not thought of this before, why she should ever have been so confident that David was different. Because she had wanted to believe that? She still wanted to believe it.

They walked on in silence, each aware of it, each worrying that it confirmed their fears. The gray massive buildings looked down on them coldly. The broad immaculate street, the solid buildings, the richly lighted rooms behind the screened windows, all culminated in the feeling of expensive restraint. David quickened his pace unconsciously.

"I'm sorry," he said, as her ankle twisted and he steadied her by the arm. "I've been walking too quickly."

"No."

He looked at her, wondering what he had done to frighten her away from him again. He halted beside one of the large monuments which decorated Waterloo Place. In front of them were the broad steps which led down to the Mall with its green park and its spaced trees, now a mass of black and blacker shadows.

"Penny," he said, "Penny, look at me. What's wrong?"

"Nothing," she said, and smiled to prove it.

"Penny," he said, and grasped her arm. "Look, I know this may sound madness, but it isn't madness to me. I can't go on with all this hesitating and shying away, this feeling of everything being all right because we understand each other and then suddenly

"I do believe you are more conventional than I am!" Penny said with a smile, as she looked back over her shoulder at the comparative peace of the Mall.

"All I am looking for is a quiet spot where we can talk in peace and hear ourselves think." He looked round at the busy traffic. "And this bedlam isn't much help either. Let's cut down Whitehall to the river. Or what about someplace with music?"

"Not tonight, David. I have to be careful about the time. We are all locked up for the night in Baker House at eleven-thirty. They insist on our beauty sleep, it seems." She pretended to be amused at the idea, but it still rankled. "Besides," she went on, "we couldn't hear ourselves think in a night club, either. We probably could not even hear what we were saying."

TRUE enough, David thought. Why should it be made so difficult for two people to be alone with each other? What did a man with little money do if he wanted no blasted interference? If he didn't want to share his girl with a hundred or a thousand other people?

Penny waited for his answer, but when it didn't come, she said gently, "I'm sorry, David. I ruined all your plans for this evening. But I did want a walk. And I still do. I am loving this, David. Really, I am." She looked around them at the changing shapes of silent buildings, and then toward the sky, dark, cool and clean. "Don't you like it too?"

He answered her this time by smiling, by taking her arm again even if they were in an austerely public street. His feeling of having arranged things so badly disappeared; he relaxed and felt perfectly content.

And Penny, conscious of his arm through hers, conscious of the smile on his face, was happy too. Her heart was singing. And in her joy she gave her pity generously to all the women she passed, who could not have David walking beside them.

They reached Gower Street ten minutes before Baker House barred its door for the night. So they walked slowly around the quiet Bloomsbury Square, unwilling to leave each other a minute before they must.

"When am I going to see you again?" David asked.

"When would you like to see me?"

He laughed. "The difficulty is I am as tied down by rules and regulations as you are. Sunday is the only day I have free from lectures or tutorials. We'll meet early on Sundays, so as to get as much time together as possible. Is it a good day for you?"

Penny nodded. Even her ideas about the days of the week were going to be changed in London: Sunday had always been a day of church, family dinner, duty visits in the afternoon and, in the evening, supper to which were invited the dullest sons of mother's dullest friends. Sunday looked now as if it were going to be the day in the week when she was happiest.

"Then Sunday is our day," David said. "You'll keep them free? All of them?"

"Yes."

"And I want you to come up to Oxford too. We can walk there. Not just on pavements, or dodging traffic and crowds."

"It sounds marvelous."

"It will be." He looked at his watch. "Almost time now, I'm afraid." They walked quickly back to Gower Street. At the corner, he halted. "Take care of yourself," he said suddenly. "And have a good time."

She smiled a little as she wondered what time would be good if it were not spent with him. But she said nothing. She seemed half afraid, somehow, as she waited.

He kissed her.

"David!" she said instinctively, glancing toward the forbidding front of Baker House. But her voice was happy, happy and relieved. This good-by was not like the other two: then they had never been sure that they would meet again; now they did know, and good-by wasn't good-by at all.

"Better get used to it, Penny," he said, and took her arm toward the green door. "On Sunday, then. I'll write you about train times."

She ran up the flight of stairs, turned to wave as she waited for the door to open. He waited, too, and waited until it was closed.

He looked up at the row of unlighted attic windows. He looked at his watch. He crossed the street slowly and halted at the corner. At last a light appeared in one of the topmost windows. He turned away then, smiling. He began to walk quickly toward Tottenham Court Road. He glanced at his watch again, and began to run for the last train.

By February, the strangeness of Penny's new life in London had settled into the appearance of routine. It seemed simple enough on the surface, falling into three neat separate worlds: there was David, there was her work at the Slade, there was the group of new friends and acquaintances. But it was David's world round which the two others circled.

At Christmas, in Edinburgh, she had tried to introduce the subject of David. But the family, somehow, had always so much to tell her about Moira's great social success this winter, about all the fun that Penny was missing by living in London, that she had stopped trying. Secretly, Mrs. Lorrimer was inclined to worry about the number of letters which Penelope had received and about the much too casual way in which David Bosworth had been mentioned. Still, better to cut off all conversation about him and show that he was of no importance. Mrs. Lorrimer was of the school of thought which firmly believed that if you didn't talk about the nasty pain it would just go away.

> Through not spending enough we often spend too much.

And so Penny returned to London after New Year's, convinced that as long as she appeared to be the same girl in voice, face, health and mannerisms she would always be considered the same. When she arrived in London this time, and saw David on the platform waiting to meet her, she thought of the difference between the Penny who had arrived in September and the Penny who was getting off the train in January.

Strangely enough, the things she had been most assured about—her work at the Slade, for instance—were those that had caused her the greatest worry this winter. And what she had worried about in September had become completely decided by January: once the major change of Penny-without-David into Penny-with-David had been made, there had been no doubts left, and life had become a steady progression of excitement and joy.

But her work at the Slade had been otherwise: here, there had been changes with a vengeance. It had taken her until February to arrive at the state which she thought she had already reached five months ago. For after some weeks of proving that her work was not so bad after all, she found that nothing she was painting pleased her. It was still the same kind of work, developed, of course, which she had done last year. But it did not please her any more. It was then that she realized that she herself had changed, and that was the whole trouble. Somewhere, somehow, she had adopted ideas and little tricks in painting which had seemed to make her work promising. Now she was finding that these had carried her as far as they ever would. There was no possibility of growth in them.

That was a very upsetting admiss make. Still more upsetting was the d to start almost at the beginning ag give up much of what had once giv most pride. At first it was disheart She had abandoned ideas which we tainly as good as any of those held average students. And it seemed as had found nothing to replace them.

Then, gradually, something began velop. Symington, the teacher whom spected most (his own work was ex and, strangely enough, was admired n by his fellow artists and pupils, but the public), was an interested observe this. Because he was a good teacher, as a good painter, he did not upset h advice. But he gave her a good help—more than he usually gave to students.

By February she was happy in he again, although she knew she was only very beginning. And she knew that s still to find out whether it would be a as she wanted it to be; and that gave h enough uncertainty so that her mi open and willing to learn.

She would have been both pleas amazed if she had known that Sym had already picked her out as good m with more than average possibilitie she would have been more than am have heard his comment on her to on colleagues: "The pity of it is, she will Then no more painting." Like every woman, she would have been indignan not marriage and painting?

Penny might have been amazed an nant, but it was perfectly true that, al she still took her wo complete seriousne had begun to thi and less of win scholarship to st Rome. Or to live an abroad which woul rate her from Davi hadn't reached th yet of admitting that to herself: s reached only the halfway stage of about visits abroad, holidays to b ured in weeks or months but not, years.

And it was not only her future an which David had altered. There w strange reaction in making new After the first week, when the stude eyed one another, hesitated, circled around, given offhand smiles, tried ou casual remarks, and then suddenly gun to form little groups, Penny had share of masculine interest. There w someone who would drift over tow place in the classroom and look at h and begin talking. Or there would oblique approach to the lunch table she sat. Or accidental meetings at t lege gates, which happened so regular the casual greeting became extraord funny to Penny. She was flattered, t that didn't let her fall into the delusi she should accept invitations "just kind," as so many of the other girls lo it. What kindness was there in letting waste an evening on you when you him dull? For that was the troub liked several of the men, and some w tractive, but none gave her what Dav her, and so they were dull in comp That was the trouble; she would alwa that comparison now.

Extra care where? In breeding a distinct and different character of kernel into Del Monte Brand Corn!

For corn at its best, you must start with kernels plump and firm enough to keep their shape—yet thin-skinned and tender at the same time. In cream style, this kernel character is especially important.

We've bred over 10,000 hybrids to make sure of qualities like this in Del Monte's exclusive strains of corn. And this search for a better product never ends. Flavor is our responsibility—to you and to our brand. We know every bit of extra care we take means greater enjoyment for you.

You just can't go wrong with this cornpatch goodness!

Taste either Del Monte Cream Style or Del Monte Whole Kernel Corn, plain or "made-up"! Get that full, young-corn sweetness? Those tender, juicy kernels? That's corn for you! Prove it—in either version of this delicious

CORNPATCH CLAM BAKE

- 1 7-oz. can minced clams
- Milk
- 3 tbsps. butter or margarine
- 4 tbsps. flour
- 3 eggs, beaten
- 1 cup Del Monte Cream Style Corn (Golden or White)—for dish at left
- OR 1½ cups Del Monte Golden Whole Kernel Corn—for dish at right
- 1 tbsp. chopped pimiento
- 4 tbsps. chopped onion
- 2 tbsps. finely cut parsley
- 1 tsp. celery seed
- 1¼ tsps. dry mustard
- ½ to 1 tsp. salt
- 1 tbsp. lemon juice

Drain liquid from clams into measuring cup; add milk to make one cup. Use to make white sauce with the butter and flour. Beat eggs; add corn, minced clams, seasonings, lemon juice. Stir in white sauce. Bake in 1½ qt. casserole in moderate oven (350° F.) 50 min. or till sharp knife inserted in center comes out clean. Top with additional hot, seasoned corn. from her letters to her family, giving them the news of life in London (with mentions of David slipped in here and there to prepare them for the idea that she and David were in love), Edinburgh now seemed a part of her life which had been amputated and thrown away. How strange, she would think, and would reproach herself. It was difficult, however, to remain self-reproachful for any length of time, for she was too happy. Life had become much too wonderful an adventure.

On this Saturday in February, Penny was standing at the window of her small bedroom in Baker House. She was all ready for Mrs. Fane's party except for the dress, which lay on the bed until she could press it out. Neri, the Indian student who lived on this floor, was in occupation of the communal ironing board, and it took a long time to iron a sari.

Penny was thinking that she did not in the least want to go to this party. And yet she must. Mrs. Fane had been at school with her mother. Mrs. Fane had asked her to tea on a Sunday, and Penny had had to refuse. Her mother kept writing, "Haven't you visited Mattie Fane's new house yet? She will be so disappointed if you don't." That, considered Penny, was rather an exaggeration. Still, Mrs. Fane's new house was only a few hundred yards away from Baker House. Mrs. Lorrimer kept remembering that in her letters. And Penny, perhaps even Mrs. Fane, had slight spasms of guilt about it, when they had time to think of it. She had probably said this morning, "Must do something about Mary Lorrimer's girl," and then had got her daughter, Carol, to telephone. And Penny had said, "Thank you very much. That sounds marvelous." It had seemed a good idea at the time.

Penny looked at the glistening pavements, wondered if her stockings would be ruined by ugly black splashes before she arrived at the party, wondered what she would wear for David's visit to London tomorrow, wondered if it would be decent weather then. It wouldn't matter, of course, if it did pour with rain. Nothing could ruin Sunday.

> Good and bad men are each less so than they seem.
> —COLERIDGE.

The door of her room opened, and a tall girl with fair hair, brushed smooth in the current Slade School fashion, entered. "I did knock," Lilian Marston said, "but you were dreaming." She was slender as well as tall. Her eyes were large, gray-green and very direct. Her wide, slow smile was lazy. Her movements were slow, too, deliberately so: she moved with a grace that did not seem calculated, but gave the appearance of being controlled. Her face was well shaped, and she liked to keep it quite pale without any hint of color except in the bright, generous lips. All this had considerable effect on the men she met.

MARSTON was wearing her gray-green suit today, with a dark-red chiffon scarf folding softly into its neckline. She never wore jewelry except bracelets, but these she liked to clasp in heavy rows around one wrist.

"Fun and games, I see," she said as she looked at the black dress on the bed. She settled herself comfortably in the armchair. "Or haven't you made up your mind yet whether you are going out? Hideous day. I've been sleeping practically all afternoon."

"I'm waiting for Neri," Penny explained.

Marston laughed. "Everyone does. I think she irons one of these saris every day. The joy of living on the top floor: we have one ironing board and Neri. These bloated plutocrats downstairs have two ironing boards to each floor and no Neri or her dresses."

"They aren't dresses. They are works of art," Penny said. "What a nuisance they must be in London, though. Imagine six yards of the thinnest embroidered muslin trailing over city streets in February rain."

"I wonder why she bothers to wear a sari in England? She catches cold so easily. And in any case, the effect is quite ruined when she adds that brown cloth coat with its piece of fur at the neck. That was certainl designed to cover a sari."

"Well, she will look charming in she doesn't die of pneumonia before Penny said. She was watching th anxiously. She looked down at her see if it really needed pressing. particular wisdom in the way Marston arranged her own life. This consisted of frantic bursts of work, punctuating weeks of fun. You could always tell when the affair with Tom had ended: she worked for ten days as if she were driven by a demon. Then the affair with Dick would begin. You could tell when it ended too: she worked. And then the affair with Harry. And then work.

"I don't quite follow," Marston said. "I thought you were acting under orders."

Penny shook her head. "I am perfectly free to do what I want. And I do what I want. I am really rather happy just this way."

Marston stared. "'Struth," she said. "I do believe the girl means it." She spoke with real seriousness. She looked worriedly at Penny. "Frankly," she said slowly, "I've never known a man who didn't go out with several girls, even when he thought he was being serious about one. It is rather a harsh fact about life, but it is just as well to guard against it. Men are realists, you know. They will write poetry to your eyes, swear eternal devotion and then sit enthralled through one of those Hollywood musicals because they like the shape of the legs in the first row."

Penny laughed. "But I like them too."

Marston shrugged her shoulders and then smiled. For a moment she could find nothing else to say. She was too busy thinking that the extraordinary thing about people was the way they surprised you.

Penny said, "Have you ever thought, Marston, that if his one girl accepts invitations with other men, that might be the reason why he is so realistic, as you call it? That's very human, you know. If you hurt me, then I'll hurt you."

"Look, I was the one who was giving out advice," Marston said sharply. She rose, brushed some lint off her skirt, and looked critically down at the way the material covered her slender thighs. "Well," she said, suddenly businesslike, "I take it you aren't going dancing tonight? Poor old Derek will be disappointed. I'll tell him you have the vapors. And that's as good a description as any."

She walked to the door, turned to give one of her slow shy smiles, raised one eyebrow. She did this unconsciously now, ever since Derek—the Derek of some three months ago, that was—had told her she looked very much like Garbo. Penny thought it quite remarkable how Marston seldom actually said either "Hello" or "Good-by," and yet one always remembered her coming and going.

WHEN Penny did eventually arrive at Mrs. Fane's, there were already enough people to fill two rooms. She had, from Carol Fane's brief invitation over the phone this morning, hardly expected this size of party. She found herself engulfed in a sea of strange faces and voices.

The small groups of men and women gave her a brief glance as she passed them slowly, and then seemed not to notice her. Where's my hostess? she wondered, and then saw her, and went forward with a good deal of relief. There was another agonizing moment, however, when Mrs. Fane seemed unaware that another guest had arrived. She was talking to three men near the fireplace. In her tight-fitting black suit she looked quite young from a distance. No wonder it had been rather difficult to recognize her. A crescendo of chatter came from the nearest gr guests as Penny introduced herse Mrs. Fane (she was much deafer th would admit) said, "How d'ye do? you could come." For a moment he stare gave away the fact that she caught the name; and then she beca efficient hostess again. Last Rites

By Ruth Branning Molloy

Her day was long, her work was hard;
She only saw its bright design.
She found a rainbow in her yard
And used it for a laundry line;
She smoothed green icing on her cake,
And fluted edging on her pie,
And any garment that she'd make
Was spangled up to catch the eye.
Her quiet household often smiled
To hear her color-crazy schemes;
She had the pleasure of a child
In striped and polka-dotted dreams.
She died, as housewives often do,
After her family was fed.
They buried her in pink and blue,
And set a Maypole at her head!

her a split-second stare, "You are an American, aren't you?"

"No," said Penny, "but I am a foreigner of sorts, I am told."

Billy overheard that remark as he returned. He began thinking of all the foreigners he had met in the last few months, but this still did not help. He had the feeling that she knew him too. She was enjoying some little joke of her own.

"Now do go on telling me about your father's place in Chile," the white-faced man was saying.

Penny managed to control herself in time. "Which one?" she asked, matching innocent stare against innocent stare.

"The smallest one. The one with the golf course and the ski run." He was watching her with expectant interest.

"Oh, it's so tiny really," she said. "Besides, I haven't visited it for years. I was sent to London. For my health. Lots and lots of fog, the doctors ordered. I simply must have fog."

"And in summer?"

"Labrador, usually."

Billy smiled easily at both of them. He hadn't the faintest idea what was happening; but still, if he smiled and held his glass nonchalantly, and looked interested in a polite vague way ——

"Talking of retrievers," the self-considered wit said, "the mistakes in Malvina's new play are simply ghastly. There's the man who invented them." He nodded to the author who had accompanied Malvina to the party. "He needs a little cheering up, I think," he said, with a sudden gleam of interest in his colorless eyes. He moved away as quietly, as inconspicuously and crabwise as he had arrived.

Then Carol Fane appeared. Penny would not have recognized her if Billy had not said, "There's my sister," in a slightly apprehensive way. Her voice was recognizable, though: it still was rather too high in pitch, too thin, too anemic.

"I'm sorry," it was saying coldly. "I'm afraid my brother has been monopolizing you. Billy, Eleanor is here. She and George arrived ages ago."

"Oh," Billy said, looking round the room. "Why, there's old George. Can't see Eleanor. I'll go and find her." He smiled hesitatingly at Penny. "I'll bring George over. He'd like to meet you." Then he felt a wave of supercharged annoyance emanate from his sister, and he left them hurriedly.

Carol was about to leave, too, and then she hesitated. There must be someone suitable to introduce rather than have George come over. Yes, there was Mrs. Bigsley, the almost invisible wife of that awful Labour member. Heaven only knew why father, even if he was a publisher, had to have his parlor pinks to a party. "Ah, Mrs. Bigsley," Carol said, lightly trapping her by the arm as she passed by, "how nice to see you."

"I MUST leave, I'm afraid," Penny said quickly, and smiled with relief as she saw that Carol had found someone she really wanted to talk to.

"Oh, really?" Carol said, and lost all interest in Mrs. Bigsley, who went on her way toward the safe shadow of her husband.

"Good-by, Carol. It has been a most amusing party," Penny said and took her first step toward the door. She could not resist adding, "It has been ages since we met, hasn't it?"

"Yes, hasn't it?" Carol said, and concealed her bewilderment admirably.

Penny relented. She was about to say, "I'm Penelope Lorrimer, you know." But at that moment George Fenton-Stevens appeared at her elbow.

"I thought it was you," he said with a wide smile. "And how is Inchnamurren?"

True knowledge is modest and wary: 'tis ignorance that is bold and presuming. They that never peeped beyond the common belief in which their easie understanding were first indoctrinated, are strongly assured of the truth and comparative excellency of their receptions; while the larger souls that have traveled the divers climates of opinions are more cautious in their resolves, and more sparing to determine.

It was at that moment, too, tha Fane brought Essex Rockfort to meet It had taken her a very adroit half h maneuvers to achieve that. Essex R had reached the stage of success where not paint a portrait unless he was int in the subject.

"Carol," Mrs. Fane said with a w sweetness in her voice.

talk." For once she was at a complete loss for the right sentence for the right guest. "Parties are always such crowded things. Quite mad."

"It has been a most amusing one. Thank you so much for asking me," Penny said.

Mrs. Fane looked sharply at her, decided she must be quite serious, and added, "We must have lunch together someday."

"Delightful," Penny said, and smiled at the vagueness of the invitation, at the bewildered stare still clinging to Mrs. Fane's face, at George's total innocence of the effect which his remark had produced.

They passed a group of men talking to Carol and another fair-haired girl. Penny looked at the girl with interest; she really was a beauty.

"That's my sister," George said. "You did not meet her in Scotland, did you? Have you time now?"

Penny's eyes followed his glance, looked at the girl beside Carol for a brief second, and then smiled at George once more. "I'm frightfully sorry," she said, and a sudden coldness made her voice elaborately polite. "But I really am rather late."

So that was Eleanor.

Penny walked thoughtfully down the smooth sandstone steps into the street, and then as she saw its length stretch before her toward Baker House she began to hurry. Her excuse to George had been quite honest. She was late.

She arrived breathlessly in the entrance hall as the gong gave its final warning. Marston was waiting near the notice board. Around her, moving slowly toward the dining room, was the usual Saturday-night crowd, some dressed to go out, some dressed to stay in.

"That looks simply marvelous," she said, eying Marston's long black dress and red brocade jacket. But Marston was looking worried.

"He was here," she said, "an hour ago. He could not manage to come tomorrow, so he came tonight instead."

"David?"

"Yes. I heard the maid trying to find you, so I dashed down to the waiting room, just in case it was he. And it was. We introduced ourselves, and I told him you would be back around seven."

"Why didn't you telephone me?"

"Darling, it is good for him to find you aren't always sitting about, waiting for him. I told him you were at a party. And I also said that I thought you might be free this evening, but I didn't know. There was a dance at College which I had been trying to persuade you to go to. I thought it would do him a lot of good to realize there are such things."

Penny looked at Marston. "Where did he go?" she asked, trying to keep her voice even.

"Out. Don't worry. He will phone any moment, and try to persuade you not to go to the dance."

Penny shook her head miserably. "Not David," she said. "Not David."

"Look, Lorrimer, I was only trying to help you."

"I know." That was the trouble: people trying to help. But Marston couldn't know just how much time or money it cost someone, who had little of either to spare, to come up to London. Nor had she remembered that the Fanes' invitation had come that morning, so that David had not heard about it yet.

"What about dinner?" Marston called. She had been worrying ever since David had said, "Oh. Well, tell her I was here," and then had left quickly, hardly saying good night to her. She had worried still more as she noticed Penny's face. Now, watching Penny walking so slowly up the stairs, she became angry with herself. Then, as Penny did not answer her, had not even heard her, she turned in annoyance and went into the dining room.

Absolute nonsense, she said to herself. Really, how tiresome people in love can be! They aren't normal.

It's everybody's night out—the Smithfield Recreation Association throws a dance

Its quiet is the quietness of a man doing his best. It was in June, 1943, when the headlines, big and black and ugly, were first making the phrase "juvenile delinquency" a household word, that Smithfield took stock of its young people. There was no Juvenile Court in Rhode Island at that time (it was established in July, 1944), but Smithfield had a few "bad boys" even if they were not delinquents—yet. There was one boy who left school (truants are now delinquents in Rhode Island) after being scolded for trying to trip the teacher. There was another boy who told lies about the smallest occurrences and whose father maintained he was a "born liar," although the boy said he didn't know how his father could tell: he was intoxicated most of the time. There were many restless children; many homes in which mother worked the day shift at the mill, father the night shift. There were more smashed windows in the neighborhood; more loafing on the street corners and in the ice-cream parlors. And in near-by Providence, where Smithfield's teen-agers went to high school, small gangs of hoodlums were forming: kids who found excitement in breaking into a store and stealing a handful of ties, or rifling the cash register; bobby-sox girls who hung out at the bus station ogling the servicemen.

In many communities, restlessness persists. The seventeen-year-old who had a job during the war is now unemployed—too old to go back to school, too young to go on to college. The boy who stuck it out through high school now wishes he hadn't; he can't get into the college he can afford, because it's crammed with G. I.'s. The girl who had a wartime job has been laid off because the returning G. I.'s get the first chance. The veteran and his young wife and child are finding life a tough and tedious business.

The threat that hung over Smithfield never materialized. It never will. Today the people of Smithfield have a sense of responsibility and of belonging in their community as a whole; their fellowship in play has helped give them roots in the four villages which make up this "town." You'll find the kids running the town's football teams, taking in dues at the local teen-age club, helping the little ones act out Jack and Jill, sledding down the hills—and if you catch one in the principal's office, he's likely to be there talking about how the playground will operate this summer. And you'll find the adults working and playing together in the community's name.

This is the story of how Smithfield licked its threat of trouble.

It begins on June 21, 1943, when Cornelius J. Mahon called together representatives of Smithfield's five churches, four schools, several businesses (most of them worsted mills), labor unions and the civic-minded so that he should get a good turnout. Mr. Mahon came right to the point. He told them that it was his feeling that Smithfield had a real trouble maker in its midst: the lack of something to do. Summer was coming on, he said, and last week he'd gone down to the river swimming hole with some of the kids and there was a "No Trespassing" sign there. They went on to another spot, he said, and he got to thinking about whether the water was polluted or not and what would happen if a boy got a cramp.

"I took the kids swimming to keep them out of mischief," he said, "and then I got to worrying about whether I was taking them into danger. The state beaches are closed because of gas rationing; the best water spots are being bought up fast by the city people. The baseball field was closed last week end. We've got to do something—we've got to keep the kids off the streets, and out of danger."

Looking back now, the men and women who pioneered what was later to become the Smithfield Recreation Association recall how, from their own varying viewpoints, they agreed with Mr. Mahon. The town judge,

MARCELLO

Joseph Wholey (now clerk of the state Juvenile Court), saw the need of planned recreation as vital to the prevention of juvenile delinquency and crime. Robert Tobin, personnel manager of Smithfield's largest mill, felt the same way, only he phrased it differently: "I felt that if you don't do something to entertain kids, you've got no kick coming if they get into trouble."

Raymond LaPerche, superintendent of schools and a father of three, didn't need any persuasion either. He knew that if the town would do something about recreation, home life, in school and out, would be a lot easier. Many boards of education include recreational programs and equipment in the maneuver. The SRA feels it belongs to the town, and it does. Even its meetings are so public that any citizen who feels interested can sit in and take part.

And by now, the annual Playground Days which wind up the season at each playground are full-fledged shows with everyone in on them. The mothers make the costumes; the older children help make the scenery; the kids act in the show, and father comes to clap. As well as the dramatic show there are "The Most Beautifully Dressed Doll" contests, the Pet Show ("anything from goldfish to collie dogs welcome"). The town turns out for the playground shows. There are four, because the town wanders over a wide territory, embracing four villages, each with its own school.

Summer playground supervisors include teachers, students in social service and trained mothers, each of whom gets $25 for a six-hour day, a five-day week.

The winters are not dull either. The SRA has its ice-skating program—a small dam makes a pond out of one field, flooding a tennis court makes a pond in another. There are ice-hockey teams for the doughty, closed-off hilly streets for the sled-minded. And a program of holiday dances for the old and young alike. Smithfield believes adults have a right to recreation, too, even if the kids have got a corner on the market.

Their corner is the teen-age canteen. It's complete with dancing, table tennis (T-shirts for those who make the teams), bowling, card games, crafts, and visiting "lectures" from parents who are hobby-minded. Two nights a week—Monday and Saturday—it runs with country-club charm at the mill's pleasant community house.

It is impossible to enjoy idling unless one has plenty of work to do. —J. K. JEROME.

Matthew McDermott, the SRA's all-year-round, though part-time, professional director, concentrates on teen-age activities. He's highly praised by the SRA and the kids alike for "encouraging the kids to do what they want to do—properly." His talents include teaching jitterbugging, and his direction includes learning how to drive and what the traffic laws are, how to shoot and what the game laws are, how to waltz and what the social rules are, and the usual stirring up of football teams, baseball teams, hockey teams and the like. The canteen club elects its own officers and leaders, pays dues to cover refreshments (hot dogs and soft drinks) and the kids report personally at SRA meetings on what's cooking.

Smithfield is also now looking to enlarge its facilities for young-veteran groups. Back in March, 1944, the SRA was "sold" an attractive four-acre plot for $250 by the philanthropic-minded Dr. Gideon Burgess, a retired Episcopal pastor. It's the SRA's prize ace in the hole now; an ideal spot on which to put in—in due course—a public country club and all the trimmings. Right now it boasts only a good football field and tennis courts, but you can almost see bleachers rising and club walls going up when Doctor Tyng, the SRA's Burgess Field committee chairman, starts talking about it.

"We've got plenty to do, but we've done plenty, too," Mrs. Christopher, the current SRA president, said. "We've got community support now, and we're getting a little more of the know-how all the time. Best of all, we've got the realization that you can't leave community welfare up to the other guy—whether he's a parent or a police officer or a teacher or whatever. Everybody's got to help."

And the kids, catching a little of the same feeling, admit cheerfully that sure, they used to be "wreckers" and now they're "rec-ers" (catch, chum?) and they like it better this way.

"What's a street corner got that the canteen hasn't, is what we'd like to know," one fourteen-year-old boy said. "The SRA is okay." THE END

The breast-fed baby is the best-fed baby, according to medical research. Don't let trivial obstacles cheat your child of this food.

Your Baby's Best Food—Mother's Milk

BY DR. HERMAN N. BUNDESEN

President, Chicago Board of Health

IF you are an expectant mother, you may be wondering and worrying a bit about breast-feeding your infant. Perhaps you had difficulty about this with a revious baby. Or someone has told you at bottle babies do just as well as those n mother's milk—so why tie yourself own?

It's true that medical science has proced excellent formulas. But are these bstitutes as good as the real article?

I should answer that this way. There are few mothers who cannot and should not try to nurse their babies. They include, in the main, women who have tuberculosis, cancer or some other severe illness. These few mothers are justified in feeding their babies from bottles, and should understand that the infants will not necessarily suffer nutritional or psychological handicaps on that account.

But the great healthy majority have no such excuse as the foregoing. And they are the ones who should realize that they have not done all they might for their baby's welfare unless they provide the very best food it is possible for a baby to have—his own mother's milk. Why?

Because exhaustive observations of breast- and bottle-fed babies have shown that the former gain more consistently, have fewer infections and digestive upsets, and are more serene emotionally. That's putting the case conservatively. In Chicago we have learned over the years that breast-feeding plays a great part in helping infants to live.

When I first became Health Commissioner—and that was many years ago—the late Dr. Julius Parker Sedgwick, at that time professor of pediatrics at the University of Minnesota, called my attention to the fact that Chicago had one of the highest baby death rates of the large cities of the world.

"I also understand," he added, "that few babies in Chicago are breast-fed. I believe that is one of the main reasons for the very high infant mortality."

Because of our faith in the great Doctor Sedgwick's wisdom, we went to work on the problem. Investigation showed that Chicago did have one of the highest baby death rates. It also showed that 90 per cent of our babies were bottle-fed. Under Doctor Sedgwick's kindly guidance, we started a campaign to have our mothers GRATEFUL young mothers from Maine to California tell us that Doctor Bundesen's baby booklets have been of the greatest help to them in caring for their own babies. The first eight booklets cover your baby's first eight months. They sell for 50 cents. The second series of booklets covers the baby's health from nine months to two years—seven booklets for 50 cents. The booklets will be sent monthly; be sure to tell us when you want the first booklet. A complete book on the care of the baby, a necessary supplement to the monthly booklets, OUR BABIES, No. 1345, is 25 cents. A booklet on breast feeding, A DOCTOR'S FIRST DUTY TO THE MOTHER, No. 1346, sells for 6 cents. Address all requests to the Reference Library, LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, Philadelphia 5, Pennsylvania.

rates of all the large cities of the world; it also has the highest number of babies fed at the breast.

So don't let anybody tell you that breast-feeding is old-fashioned and an unnecessary nuisance. In reality it's the latest thing. For besides the piling of proof on proof that the "breast-fed baby is the best-fed baby," leaders in pediatric thinking have recently come to the conclusion that both mother and baby have much to gain psychologically from the intimacy fostered by breast-feeding.

I am often asked why so many mothers believe they do not have enough milk for their babies. This is a question that is rather easy to answer. First is the matter of diet.

To have enough milk, you need, of course, good, well-balanced meals, but you do not need large quantities of any one kind of food or drink as, unfortunately, too many people believe. With whatever variation your own doctor may recommend to suit your individual nutritional requirements, your diet should consist of about 3000 calories a day, and these should be made up to include at least one quart of milk, one or two eggs, one serving of meat or fish, and an abundance of fresh fruits and vegetables. Get these into your daily meals religiously, and you have made a good start toward producing an ample supply of milk.

Plenty of rest and exercise are important also in building up the general health and assuring a rich flow of milk. As a rule, your activities can virtually be unrestricted, but should never be carried to the point of fatigue.

In my opinion, the greatest hazard of all in breast-feeding is failure to see that the breasts are regularly and completely emptied after each nursing. Milk that remains in the breasts, after the baby has had his fill, may quickly dry and harden, and the breasts become painfully congested and sore, diminishing or shutting off the supply. To prevent this from happening, the technique of manual expression—squeezing the remaining milk out with the fingers—should be learned from the doctor or nurse and practiced conscientiously. Just as every mother should know how to bathe and dress her baby, so she should know how to empty her breasts completely by hand after each nursing. In feeding her baby correctly, this is one of her most important duties.

Another reason why the mother's milk may dry up is that, during the first week or two, the baby may not have been strong enough to empty all the milk from the breast, or he may have been given bottle feedings.

IF your baby is born in the hospital, you will naturally ask, "What can I do about that?"

Enlist your doctor's help to see that your baby is not given a bottle in the nursery unless it is absolutely necessary for his or her welfare. Don't worry if your baby loses weight in the first few days. These are trial, or practice, days, while you and baby become attuned to each other's needs.

The first fluid that comes from your breast is a lemon-yellow substance called colostrum, which aids the baby's growth and is also thought to protect against infection. It is not so important, however, that the baby should get any given amount of this at a feeding as that you and baby should get used to each other and learn the technique of extracting the fluid from your breast. Get the nurse to help you, and insist that your breasts shall be emptied by manual expression after each feeding.

As the breast is completely emptied, gradually the amount of milk increases, and the content changes to include fat, sugar and minerals. With a really hungry infant tugging vigorously, the lost ounces will soon be reclaimed and you will see your baby plump and strong. You, too, will benefi this exercise of a natural function.

A ten or fifteen minute feeding is u sufficient to empty one breast. Some babies take the milk faster than thi few have strength to suck for longer p The usual method is to offer alt breasts at successive feedings schedu meet the baby's natural demands.

THERE is still another element invol successful breast-feeding. Until qui cently it was believed that babies wo "spoiled" unless a rigid three or fou feeding schedule was followed faithfull creasingly, however, doctors are recog that every baby has his own rhythm ing, digesting and eliminating. The n view is that baby and mother will b more by individual adjustment to other's needs than by any arbitrary sch In other words, you may feed your ahead of schedule if he seems hungry, him help make his own schedule. Th removed strain and tension which are cal to successful nursing.

Once a mutually satisfactory rhyth feeding is established, mother and babi thrive. The time and effort requir sterilize bottles, nipples and other e ment are saved, and the chances of inf the baby are greatly reduced. Even wi most modern techniques of sterilizatio estimated that tions and upsets nearly four tim frequently among tle-fed babies as a breast-fed babies. is more important, ever, the mother infant reap the ps logical and emot benefits of a na relationship, wh artificial feeding raises a barrier bet them and resul harmful tensions.

The fact that t tangible values breast-feeding are lost in hospital rou is troubling thoughtful doctors today. It is felt the common practice of parceling the bies out to their mothers for only a minutes, a few times a day, deprives baby of the loving care he needs for security and comfort. Moreover, since mother takes no part in baby's care d her hospital stay, she is likely to b expert and nervous with him when she gets home. This tension is transmitted t baby, and may launch the whole relatio on a wrong basis, besides affecting mother's milk supply.

To overcome these difficulties and advantage of the great opportunity mother and baby to start their life toge properly under careful supervision du the hospital period, several groups of doc have been experimenting with a plan keeping the baby in the mother's own pital room, or at least in a small cubicle al side it, instead of in a separate infant n ery. This plan, which has been tried out cessfully in a number of hospitals, courages breast-feeding; it permits mother to know and actually care for child from the very beginning, and thus isfies deeply felt psychological needs of b While it may be a long time before practice becomes widespread, since it quires reorganizing the hospital layout nursing plan, it does show that with int gent care and thought the great majorit women can nurse their babies, and that babies are easier to live with when thi done. Not only that, more babies live.

There is nothing wrong with the abi of the average healthy woman to nurse baby, and as the matter is approached telligently, more and more mothers will joice in abundant milk. Don't let tri obstacles cheat you of this happiness. modern—and nurse your baby! THE E

A father and his young son, who was carefully holding in his lap a shoe box punctured with air holes, were seated in a bus. When the bus stopped for a red light, the lad was heard to ask, "Daddy, is my kitten a man kitten or a lady kitten?"

"A man kitten," said the father promptly.

"How do you know?" continued the boy.

Every passenger within earshot waited expectantly for the reply.

"Well," explained the father, "he's got whiskers, hasn't he?"

Handle his tender skin with care

It's actually thinner and more delicate than yours

That soft-as-pussy-willow skin really is thinner than yours . . . it needs constant watching over. That's why you take such pains to keep him dry and to rinse every trace of irritating soap from his diapers. But how much care have you taken in selecting a bathroom tissue for him?

LOOK FOR THESE 3 TISSUE "MUSTS"

To protect your baby's thinner skin from chafe and chap discomfort you must be sure the tissue you choose is safeguarded three ways. It should be truly soft . . . instantly and thoroughly absorbent . . . and sufficiently strong to prevent tearing and shredding.

More mothers every day are finding this ideal combination of qualities in ScotTissue than in any other brand. ScotTissue is "old linen" soft for comfort . . . yet strong enough for thorough cleansing.

You can trust it always to meet your most exacting demands in caring for your child's thinner skin now . . . and in conditioning him to proper toilet habits later on.

HERE'S HOW TO REDUCE THE DIAPER-LAUNDERING PROBLEM

For babies up to six months, try crumpling up twenty or more sheets of soft, absorbent ScotTissue and line your baby's diapers with them. You'll find you will have fewer diapers to wash, and less staining. Simply flush away the wet or soiled tissue. It's quick and easy, and by far the most economical way to keep your baby "comfy," and save on laundry, too. Remember, if you can't get ScotTissue every time, it's just because the demand is so great.

"He criticized you in public, ridiculed you," Mr. Larch said, and made a note. "And your quarrels—in the course of them, did he often use abusive language?"

"Oh, yes!" She leaned forward a little. "And speaking of friends, that was another reason we quarreled. He didn't like any of my old friends, though they were always awfully nice to him, and he tried to keep me away from them. He said they were stupid and snobbish, and sometimes when I wanted to see them he refused to go with me, or else he'd sit in a corner all evening, looking bored and superior."

"I—why, yes, I suppose it would," she said. "Unless he changed." She bit her lip. "Oh," she said, "he could be so nice when he wanted to! After we'd had a quarrel and made it up—then he was loving and sweet, and nothing was too good for me. That's what makes it all so tragic!" The gloves lying so neatly across her knee were caught up and crumpled by the fingers of one hand. "Well," she said, "now he can just see how he likes it without me!"

Mr. Larch, gazing down at his desk, cleared his throat. He said he understood how painful all this must be to her, and that he didn't think he needed to ask any more questions. He would draw up the complaint and attend to everything, and it wouldn't be necessary for him to see her again, in all probability, until the day before the hearing—although of course if she had any questions he'd be only too glad to answer them.

"In the meantime," he added sunnily, getting to his feet, "all you have to do for six weeks is enjoy yourself. I'm sure you'll like The Cottonwoods."

He escorted her to the door and stood there until she'd gone through the reception room. Then he went back to his desk, sat down, and lit a cigarette. He picked up the sheet of notes and studied it a moment. Finally he shrugged and wrote "ECM" on it. Miss Marr, his clerk, would translate that correctly as "Extreme cruelty of a mental nature" when she drew the complaint. Miss Marr could draw such complaints with her eyes closed.

The trees which gave The Cottonwoods its name grew all around the wide front lawn, and between them were smaller trees and hedges. They made a high green wall, shutting out the street and the people who walked or drove along it. If you lay on the grass and looked at the trees or up at the intensely blue sky, you could forget where you were. That is, unless some of the other guests were near by, talking about their husbands.

HUSBANDS, usually past but occasionally future, were a conversational staple at The Cottonwoods. They were described, dissected, analyzed, sighed over, vilified, laughed at and—very rarely—considered as human beings. They were the off-stage characters in a dozen dramas which were enacted and re-enacted on the stage of The Cottonwoods' lawn. Considering that they were encumbrances which were about to be cast off, they were strangely absorbing.

There were, of course, always two or three of the guests—the number varied as H-Day, or Hearing Day, removed certain of them and substituted new ones—who never mentioned their husbands, who kept their dramas, whatever they were, locked up inside themselves. But they were the shy ones. Most of the guests wanted to talk—indeed, had to talk, or burst. Olivia talked with the rest of them.

Conversation was more than catharsis; it was testimony and self-justification. The things you could not say—or at any rate had not said—to your lawyer were sure of a sympathetic audience here. For the lawyer was a man, and here were only women. Mrs. Kleinschmidt, who owned The Cottonwoods, did not take men.

"He never thought I'd really do it," said to Mrs. Blanchard—Merle—w discovered that her husband had a worked in his office. "He thought I threatening him again—because real gotten to the point where the onl could get him to listen to me was was leaving him. Well"—she plucked of grass and bit it with small, even "now he knows I meant it."

"Tom was surprised too," M formed her. "And shocked. He's i now, because I made sure his s found out where I was going. I kn pass the news along to the girl, an I'm very much mistaken that one is start talking marriage. Poor Tom laughed in gentle amusement. "H squirm."

"WHAT else could you do but him?" Olivia demanded, hotly "What did he expect? My heaven tainly wouldn't stay married to a m was running around with another That's the one unforgivable thing."

Merle regarded her with wise eyes ing on the home reservation doesn't have done what's his Clay?—does to have do much good there other u able things?"

"Oh. Well course there anyway," Ol with certain ridiculous to Clay looking other woman of everythin happened, perfectly wel wild about r

Animal Villain No. 1

Man's greatest enemy among the four-footed animals is not the tiger, the lion or the wolf. This Animal Enemy No. 1 is the house rat.

It has been estimated that there are approximately 130,000,000 rats in the United States. Each destroys, on the average, two dollars' worth of property and consumes fifty pounds of food in a year.

It is not the material damage they do, however, that puts them at the very top of the list of undesirables. It is their transmission of disease germs. Since 1900, ten million victims have fallen before the rat-borne bubonic plague in India. It was typhus fever, transmitted by rats, that turned the tide and sent Napoleon's army retreating over the Russian snows.

YES, "on velvet"... off to a good start on the road of life . . . that's the lucky baby whose feeding formula is prepared with Carnation Milk.

Carnation's such good milk for little lads like this . . . for toddlers and runabouts, too, and big boys and girls in school. It's safe, perfectly protected by its air-tight container. It's nourishing in every way . . . and specially fortified with the "sunshine" vitamin, to help in building sturdy-straight bones and sound teeth. It's a heat-refined, homogenized, soft-curd milk, wonderfully easy to digest. And you can get it anywhere and always be sure it's good.

No other milk is more confidently prescribed or more widely used in baby feeding. If your baby's formula calls for evaporated milk, you can confidently call for Carnation. Then your baby will be "on velvet"... with the milk every doctor knows.

boys I'd ever known in uniform, and my own husband safe at home—not that I wanted him to be in danger, but there were plenty of officers who never were sent out of this country."

"So what happened finally?" asked Frances.

"Oh, it was just as I said it would be. All of a sudden he wasn't essential any longer and he went in as a private in the infantry. And while he was overseas I had to give up the apartment and go live with my parents. He hated that, but it was his own fault, and there wasn't anything he could do about it. I certainly couldn't live on his service allowance."

"Some wives did," remarked Anne O'Bryon, and from that moment Olivia did not care particularly for Anne O'Bryon, although she went along when the others celebrated Anne's divorce with a party at the Frontier in town.

H-Day parties were a tradition at The Cottonwoods. They always began with cocktails or sherry served before dinner by Mrs. Kleinschmidt, and after dinner the station wagon took the new divorcée and her special friends downtown to continue the celebration at one of the bars.

Olivia did not drink too much at Anne's party; she never drank too much, in spite of what Clay said. As a matter of fact, she rather disliked liquor, but people thought you were odd if you refused it. Though she had tried to explain this to Clay, he had been totally unable to comprehend its logic—"Okay, so they think you're odd," he would say, "so maybe we think they're odd too"—and it had become another of the divisions between them.

So it could not have been the liquor at Anne's party which caused her to make the silly mistake about time. Seated at one of the circular tables in the Frontier, she had happened to notice that her watch said nine o'clock; and that meant, she calculated, it was six o'clock in Rochester. At six o'clock Clay would be coming home from the plant, opening the closet door and skimming his hat carelessly onto the shelf, calling, "Livvie! I'm here—come prove you love me!" And she would come running from wherever she was for his kiss, for the worshipful touch of his hands and the adoration in his eyes. . . . That is, this was how it would be at six o'clock if she were in Rochester, and if this did not happen to be one of those evenings when she and Clay were not speaking, much less kissing.

"Olivia!" Merle was laughing at her. "What are you dreaming about?"

"Dreaming?" Snatched back to here and now, Olivia said dazedly, "Why—just that now it's six o'clock in Rochester."

Merle laughed again. "It is not!" she told Olivia.

"But, Merle," Olivia said earnestly, "it is. Three hours' difference in time ——"

"The difference is the other way, darling. When it's nine here it's midnight there—no, one in the morning, because they're still on daylight-saving time back east, aren't they?"

Anne O'Bryon was listening. "In other words, Olivia," she said dryly, "it is later than you think."

That was a silly thing to say; silly, but it had a sinister sound. It changed time from a matter of seconds ticking sedately away on a wrist watch to one of days being husked, like dry leaves, swiftly off a calendar pad. It reminded her, as perhaps Anne had meant it to, that this was mid-September and her own H-Day was not so far distant.

She laughed, to show them all she didn't care. "Time can't go too fast for me," she said.

That was very true; she would have urged the days on with whips, if she could, since actually time was her ally. It always had been in the past. She knew how the denial of her love, her self, could conspire with time to torture Clay, so that she had invariably been able to outwait him in a quarrel, force him to be first to sue for peace. Now it was only a matter of waiting a little longer. She had never doubted that, and she did not doubt it now. The point was, she said to herself, sipping from her glass, she could get along without Clay far better than he could get along without her. She could get along forever, if need be.

Although she did wish, at this moment in the Frontier Club, the chatter of Merle, Frances and Anne mingling with the uneasy click of slot machines in her ears—she did rather wish, feeling lonely and unwanted, that Clay had never found out about the way she got her clothes. She'd grown careless, she supposed, throwing Gerber's sales slips into the wastebasket instead of burning them—but after so long she had half thought that probably Clay really knew about it, and simply pretended he didn't, to keep the peace. Well, he hadn't known, and while she had seen him angry often enough before, she hadn't ever seen him quite like this. He would get over it—but still, it would have been better if he'd never found out.

Anne O'Bryon was catching the eleven-o'clock plane back east; they finished their drinks and went with her to the airport, and they all kissed her good-by and rode back to The Cottonwoods in a taxi, rather silently. And a week later it was H Day for Merle and a few days after that for Frances, and the nights were quite cold, this late in September.

New guests settled in at The Cottonwoods. Olivia told them about Clay, receiving in return the stories of Dick and Al and Morton—some such names. Mail was delivered twice a day, but only the morning delivery ever brought anything from the east, so by eleven o'clock usually there were quite a few women sitting on the terrace, waiting for the postman—waiting without seeming to wait. Each morning Olivia could feel the anticipation and the hope tightening inside her like a rubber band being slowly twisted by a stick. As she talked or listened, she would glance over at the box nailed inside the gate, thinking that perhaps the man had come a minute ago, when none of them was watching. Then at last she would see a hand at the end of a gray-blue sleeve reach over the gate and drop a packet of letters into the box, and she would stay where she was, seeming not to notice, postponing the moment of knowing. Someone else would go to pick up the letters, and frequently there was one for Olivia: from mamma or daddy or one of her friends in Rochester, never the letter she was waiting for.

However, there was still time enough, even on the day Mr. Larch telephoned and said that everything seemed to be in order and apparently we were going to be able to file on the second, just as we planned, and have our hearing later on that same day; so would Olivia drop in to see him on the afternoon of the first? Olivia said yes, she would. She wanted to ask him if Clay had sent his power of attorney, but he hung up too soon, and perhaps that was just as well, because it was a silly question and she already knew the answer. If everything was in order, that meant of course that Clay had sent it.

But it was impossible that he meant to let her go through with the divorce! All because of a silly thing like those clothes. It was much more likely that he was trying to do what he had never succeeded in doing—to force her to make the first move, sue for his forgiveness, confess herself at fault. And if he was idiot enough to think that she would do anything of the sort, he richly deserved to be divorced.

Later that day she made a point of reminding Mrs. Kleinschmidt that her suit was to be heard on the second. Mrs. Kleinschmidt, who was short and fat and as factitiously jolly as a department-store Santa, said, "That's right, dear, I'll make a note of it. We'll go down to the courthouse together, and I'll swear you're a bona-fide resident."

for these 4 reasons

1. whiter color!—A 3 to 1 favorite among thousands of mothers who tested the new Mennen Baby Powder in unmarked containers. "So much whiter and purer-looking," they said. "It must be better for baby!"

2. softer texture!—3 to 1, the same mothers said this new, improved powder, made especially for babies, is softer. It felt better and more soothing on their skin—extra comfort and safety for the extra-fine and sensitive skin of their babies.

3. fresher scent!—Twice as agreeable, was the mothers' verdict on the milder, fresher new scent of Mennen Baby Powder. They liked the way it keeps baby fresh and clean. They liked the pleasant scent it creates in the nursery.

4. borated!—These same mothers demand a borated powder. And, of course, the new Mennen Baby Powder is borated. That's why it is so much smoother . . . so much more soothing . . . so much safer for your baby. That's why it neutralizes diaper urine so much more effectively.

After the rehearsal Mr. Larch suggested that since she would probably wish to leave town as soon as the decree was granted, it might be a good idea to attend to his fee now. Olivia wrote out a check on the bank account which daddy had opened for her when she told him she was going to come out here and get a divorce.

This, the day before the hearing—H-Day Minus One—was the worst of all. Everyone knew that; Merle and Frances and the others had agreed that it was so. You had your train or plane reservations in your purse, your bags were packed, the clothes you would wear in court hung in the closet, waiting; and someone was sure to say, "Well, all ready for the big day tomorrow? You must be awfully glad it's nearly over." Someone did say it when Olivia returned to The Cottonwoods, and she answered "Oh yes, very," because to answer anything else was inconceivable.

It was while she was eating a dinner that she could not taste that she heard Mrs. Kleinschmidt's voice behind her, in the doorway: "Mrs. Manners. Telephone. Rochester's calling you." Her startled, exultant hand struck a water glass as she rose, upsetting it and making a puddle on the cloth, but

Bringing up Parents

DR. BARBARA BIBER, Consultant
Child Psychologist, Bank Street Schools, New York

PARENTS who boast that their children are geniuses when they succeed in putting round pegs in round holes, are often annoyed when those same children use their brains to get what they're after. For example, when a youngster calls on his father to shoo owls from under his bed at night, he may not want the creatures out so much as he wants his father in. And he's smart enough to invent an owl hunt that could keep his dad in his room indefinitely. On the other hand, his fantasy may be the result of real fears or insecurity. In that event, it is important to try to discover what's behind his imaginary creatures—and to improve the underlying situation. It won't help much to tell him coldly that the owls aren't there just because you don't see them. The owls and their origin will become more apparent when you look at things through a child's eyes.

"There were so owls under my bed, daddy... but I guess the goblins chased them away."

When tiny tantrums mean "Childhood Constipation"

...give Fletcher's Castoria!

"It's the laxative made especially for infants and children."

WHEN your baby shows his temper, and those unhappy tantrums come from "Childhood Constipation"... it's time for you to do the wise thing:

Give him Fletcher's Castoria. It works thoroughly and effectively—yet, it's so gentle it won't upset his sensitive digestive system.

Unlike adult laxatives—which may be too harsh—Fletcher's Castoria is specially made for children. It contains no harsh drugs, and will not cause griping or discomfort.

And Fletcher's Castoria has such a pleasing taste that children really love it. They take it gladly, without forcing. Caution: Use only as directed.

and with every step the courthouse and its shiny dome came nearer. They were on the broad and shallow steps, they were going between swinging glass doors and up another flight of steps, to a marble corridor where Mr. Larch came toward them, smiling and holding out his hand.

At that moment Olivia knew what she wanted to do. It was very simple: she wanted to stop the divorce and go back to Clay.

She knew, too, with great certainty, that she need not return to him as a suppliant, vanquished. Clay wasn't like her: he didn't think of marriage as a battle which one or the other of them must win, and he would not even consider that by giving up the divorce she had lost. To him, it would be simply that she had come back, and he would accept her and they could begin over again. She would lose nothing—nothing; and excitement and happiness swelled in her throat so she could scarcely speak.

"Mr. Larch," she said, and put her hand on his arm and swallowed. "Mr. Larch, can't—can't I call the whole thing off? It isn't too late, is it?"

His head swam above her—long, narrow, ineffably startled.

"Call the whole thing off, Mrs. Manners? You mean, withdraw the suit? No, of course it's not too late, but—— Are you serious?"

His tone revealed that he thought her completely mad. At his shoulder stood Mrs. Kleinschmidt with her eyes and mouth wide, and she thought she was mad too. And back of them, unseen just now but inescapably present, were the judge and the court attachés and the guests at The Cottonwoods, all the people who had collaborated to secure for her the thing called a divorce; and behind these were still others, her parents and her friends and her enemies—and every living soul of them ready to look shocked, or amused, or scornful, or angry, or smugly pleased, according to his nature.

The throbbing lump of joy in her throat dissolved. She could not face them. She could never face them and the weight of their opinion. It was, after all, too late. She lifted her gloved hand from Mr. Larch's arm and pressed it lightly against her cheek. She laughed a little, apologetically.

"No—I'm not serious, Mr. Larch. I can't imagine what got into me. I —— Panic, I guess. Last-minute panic. Silly of me." She took the hand away, she lifted her face and smiled at him. "But I'm all right now. Really. Where do we go?"

Let your friends spear their own dinner and broil it over coals

BY RUTH MILLS TEAGUE

FEW people are as lucky as some Californians I know, who have barbecue grills in their patios and use them the year round, almost as often as they use their kitchens. To most of us a meal outdoors is a special event, to be enjoyed between May and September—and only occasionally then.

Our equipment may be an elaborate masonry grill or one of those rolling jobs you can buy in any department store; or it may be merely a bonfire burned down to a bed of coals, Indian style. Whatever the cooking medium, any meal cooked outdoors generates a ravenous appetite in the process; and if the food is really of gourmet quality, it brings ecstatic appreciation. So for the canny hostess who wants to clinch her claim to a cordon bleu, the barbecue party is a natural.

We'll plan our barbecue party so that everyone can participate in the cooking to some extent. But to what extent is the trick, and thoughtful planning is indicated. Have you ever gone to a party where a large crowd of hungry people sat around a barbecue pit, fireplace or whatever and watched for what seemed like hours, and sometimes was, while one lone person cooked the entire meal? And as time wore wearily on have you (Continued on Page 122)

Here are some of the wonderful things the Proctor toaster does.

Thanks to the "Color Guard" control, every slice—fresh bread or dry bread—pops up the same color, automatically . . . light, dark or anywhere in between.

I'll get perfect toast every time, without watching or readjusting. It regulates toasting by the only sure way—by measuring the actual surface temperature of the toast.

wished you could settle for a big hunk of bread and butter and let it go at that? Well, I have. The other extreme is the ultra, ultra casual affair where everyone cooks everything, everyone gets in the way of everyone else, and the result is pretty much of a shambles. Informality we want, of course, but informality shouldn't be confused with disorder.

Enough of generalizations. We have our menu to plan and service to think of, and we'd better get on with it.

The main do for this meal, be it an evening or a Sunday-afternoon affair, will be Shish Kebabs, or Shasslik, with some American touches added. The Armenian name is Shish Kababs; the Russian, Shasslik; and there are important differences, obviously. But we'll ignore authenticity and adopt—or perhaps "adapt" is a better word—the fundamental similarity they share. Both dishes are made by impaling alternate pieces of tender meat and vegetables on a long skewer and broiling them over an open fire. We'll have a wide variety of meat and vegetables to choose from, and everyone can fix his own Kebabs to suit his taste.

Brought from the kitchen, hot and ready to eat, will be a casserole of log-cabin potatoes—potatoes with a cheese sauce and a difference. A crisp mixed-vegetable salad, tossed with water-cress dressing, and bread-and-butter sandwiches will complete the menu, except for a sweet, and large cups of steaming-hot coffee.

For the sweet we'll have filled cake squares, which can be made ahead of time and stored in the refrigerator. Unfortunately, we'll have to use a cup of sugar for the cake—too bad—but the filling will be made with sweetened condensed milk, fruit and nuts, which will help balance the sugar budget.

Now there's a menu that's bound to make everyone happy, including yourself, for there's not too much work for you to do ahead of time and nothing for you to do at the last minute but have fun.

SHISH KEBABS

You can be choosy if you like and eliminate a few of the ingredients I'm going to suggest, for when I said "wide variety" I meant it. But of course I hope you'll shoot the works.

Lamb Cut thick slices of meat from a leg of lamb, then cut the slices into 1-inch squares. Use only the most tender portions of the lamb and save the rest for a stew or curry. Do this early in the day and let the lamb squares marinate for several hours in ¼ cup vinegar, ¼ cup water, 3 tablespoons salad oil, salt, pepper and some onion slices. This will make the meat more tender.

Beef Cut a ¾ to 1 pound fillet of beef into inch squares, sprinkle with chopped parsley and ¼ teaspoon powdered thyme and allow to stand for several hours.

Kidneys Cut at least 3 lamb kidneys into ½-inch slices and marinate in salad oil, salt, pepper and, if you like, about ⅓ cup sherry.

Livers Wash some chicken livers carefully and cut larger pieces in half. Marinate in salted skim milk to draw out blood. (In case you don't know this trick, try it with any liver. It's excellent for pork or beef liver, for it removes much of the blood and makes the liver more tender.)

Bacon Fold very thin slices of bacon into 1-inch lengths.

Mushrooms Remove stems from fresh mushrooms. Wash and dry the caps, wrap in wax and store in refrigerator. (The stems can be made into delicious cream of mushroom soup the next day.)

Green Peppers Cut several cl green peppers into fairly large pieces in a wet cloth and store in refrigera

Onions Peel 2 large Spanish onion cut in half from stem to stern. Cut th outer layers into small crescent-s chunks. In cutting the vegetables, re ber that the pieces must be large en to go on the skewers without splitti

Tomatoes Cut fresh tomatoes, ski into wedges.

At a convenient time in the afte drain and dry the meats and arrange and the vegetables on a large tray or p One might think that small hunks of couldn't possibly be a pretty sight, but they are arranged in alternate lines wi different-colored vegetables they'll m very appetizing show. A fine fluffy bor parsley is a good beginning, then I l start with a row of livers, less attract look at, and end with a row of kidney, The center I save for mushrooms, fl on one side by green peppers and c other by tomatoes.

Barbecue Sauce To brush over th babs before and during the broiling need a good, highly seasoned sauce here it is: Simmer together for ha hour ¼ pound butter or margari cup tomato catchup, 3 tablespoons ragon vinegar, 1 tablespoon lemon 1 teaspoon dry mustard, 1 teaspoon rika, ½ teaspoon salt, 1 tablespoon We tershire sauce, 1 teaspoon Tabasco s 1 small grated onion, 3 tables chopped parsley and 2 or 3 cloves g grated or mashed to a pulp.

Now to the making of the Shish K Start the fire several hours ahead of ti that when cooking begins there will be bed of coals, not leaping flames. We wa Kebabs broiled, not burned to a Whether you use hickory or birch charcoal or brickettes, give the fire ple time, for a bed of coals isn't produce twinkling.

Each person is provided with a wo handled spear or a long butcher's skew which he can stick as many pieces of me vegetable as suits his taste. The idea alternate the various ingredients so flavors will mingle during the cooking ways start and end with a piece of be lamb, because of its firmness, but in between use whatever you like best a much as your appetite indicates. Toss that Salad

The art of mixing a perfect "tossed" salad is easily learned. First make sure your bowl is large enough . . . not more than half full of well-washed and carefully dried greens. Add dressing. Now with a fork and spoon gently lift, lower, turn this way and that till every morsel glistens with the rich savor of oil and mellow Heinz Vinegar (see recipes below).

Vary the dressing—

Basic French Dressing

Recipe—Combine ½ tsp. salt, 1 tsp. sugar, ¼ tsp. paprika. Add ¼ cup Heinz Vinegar and ½ cup olive oil. Beat thoroughly. Yields nearly ¾ cup.

Ketchup Dressing

Recipe—Place ¼ cup sugar, 1 tsp. salt, dash paprika in quart jar. Add ½ cup Heinz Vinegar, 5 tbs. Heinz Chili Sauce or Tomato Ketchup, ¾ cup oil, 3 tbs. grated onion. Cover jar and shake thoroughly until well blended. Yields 1½ cups.

Chefs Special Dressing

Recipe—To recipe for Basic French Dressing add ¼ cup Heinz Tomato Ketchup, ¼ cup finely chopped celery, ¼ cup chopped green pepper and 2 tsp. grated onion. Yields 1 cup.

bottom pieces of meat together so that the Kebab will be tightly packed. Next comes a generous brushing of barbecue sauce—a pastry brush is good for this job—and the broiling begins. More sauce can be brushed on from time to time, and the spear or skewer must be turned in order to brown all sides. The wooden-handled spears are best. They are long, which allows more people to do their cooking at one time, and the handles don't get hot. If long skewers are used, provide canvas gloves. When the Kebab is done it is pushed from the spear onto a plate.

LOG-CABIN POTATOES

Make a thin cream sauce, basic method, using 4 tablespoons butter or margarine, 3 tablespoons flour and 2½ cups hot milk. Add to sauce 1 pound diced cheese, 1 envelope chicken-bouillon powder, or a chicken-bouillon cube, ¾ teaspoon salt and ⅛ teaspoon cayenne pepper. Cook in double boiler until cheese is melted. Taste for salt and, if you like, add 2 tablespoons good port.

Cut large raw potatoes into long slender strips about ¼ inch around, using enough potatoes to fill a large casserole. Fry the strips, not too many at a time, in butter or margarine until delicately browned. In the bottom of a well-greased casserole make a layer of potato strips all going in the same direction. Then, using log-cabin technique, cross them with a layer going at right angles to them, and so on. When casserole is half full, spoon in about half the cheese sauce, being careful not to disarrange the potatoes in the process. Not that the log-cabin arrangement will be perfect, but it does allow the sauce to circulate and it keeps the potatoes from packing. Also, it looks pretty. When all the potatoes have been used, spoon in the rest of the sauce and top with a layer of bread crumbs and dots of butter or margarine. Cover the casserole.

All this can be done early in the day or the day before. About half an hour before guests are to arrive, put the casserole in a pan of hot water in a 350° F. oven. Shortly before serving, turn oven to 450°, remove lid and brown a little. This method of cooking requires no watching and you may be sure the potatoes won't dry out.

SALAD

Shred some lettuce and tiny young spinach leaves, wrap in a wet cloth and store in refrigerator. Slice red radishes into one bowl, cucumbers into another, cover both with ice cubes and put in refrigerator.

Water-Cress Dressing Beat with rotary beater ⅔ cup salad oil, ⅓ cup vinegar, 1 teaspoon salt, ½ teaspoon dry mustard, 2 teaspoons sugar, 1 tablespoon grated onion and 3 tablespoons heavy cream. Add 3 tablespoons finely chopped water cress and 1 tablespoon chopped chives.

The vegetables can be dried and put in the salad bowl some time before serving—if the bowl is kept in the refrigerator—but the salad should be tossed with the dressing at about the last minute.

BREAD-AND-BUTTER SANDWICHES

Now, after all! But I do think you should cut off the crusts and be generous with butter or margarine. And, of course you can make them in the morning if you wrap them in wax paper and store them—yes, in that same refrigerator, unless you're lucky enough to have two.

FILLED CAKE SQUARES

This dessert can be made the day before and will be all the better for standing. Make a sheet of butter cake, using any good recipe—but here's an easy one: Measure 1¾ cups flour and sift 3 times with 2 teaspoons baking powder and ¾ teaspoon salt. Put ⅓ cup softened butter or margarine into a bowl and beat until very soft. Measure 1 cup sugar, add about ¼ of it to the butter or margarine and beat until creamy. Add 1 whole egg, a little more sugar and beat. Then add another egg, the rest of the sugar and beat. Now add the flour alternately with ½ cup milk and 2 teaspoons vanilla, beating until smooth. If you have an electric mixer, use it, by all means. Bake in a greased square or oblong shallow pan for about 30 minutes in a 375° F. oven. The size of the pan isn't so important, but it mustn't be too long or the cake will be too thin to split.

Service. Whether this meal is eaten standing up, sitting on the grass or sitting at a table, it is bound to be an informal self-service affair. Suit the manner of service to the setting. But whatever your plans, make them complete. Visualize the party in full swing, and by anticipating possible confusion you can avoid it. Make lists! This is a perfect occasion for list making and double checking. Think of everything that will be needed, write it down and, before the party begins, check to see that each item is in its right place. When the party is going strong is no time to remember that the indispensable so-and-so or such-and-such is still in the kitchen.

And lest I forget, have plenty of indispensable finger bowls—or something that can pinch-hit for finger bowls—handy, and some towels, not tiny napkins, for hand wiping. Eating a perfect Shish Kebab may be one of life's pleasantest gastronomic experiences—I think it is—but it's a lot more fun if your hands are clean.

One asked a very personal question and I told her I thought she had better discuss it with her mother. She laughed and said, "Heck, she told me babies come off ash heaps."

After several hours of these classes I would go home and look at my five-year-old daughter and shudder to think she was growing up to such a situation. I have resolved that she shall not remain in ignorance and shall see she is taught correctly. Dream Comes True

Hampstead, London.

Dear Demarious Smeltzer: If I were to inherit suddenly a whole nylon stocking factory, I wouldn't get half the thrill that your nylons have given me. They were my very first and there could never be another pair like them.

The day they came, I arose at 7 A.M. in a thick, cold fog, put on 3 sweaters, a dressing gown and two wool scarves, one around my neck and the other over my head. Then I proceeded to our very out-of-date kitchen to prepare breakfast. All the water pipes were frozen, and the sink won't drain because of the ice. Everything in the bathroom is draped with icicles. The hall is wet from a leaking pipe. The streets are a foot deep in very wet slush. We had been warned that the electricity would be cut for five hours from 9 A.M. As I cook by electricity and have no coal and can't get any, I felt I was facing a rather miserable day. 8:30 A.M. the postman arrived and handed me a slim box, a pair of nylons. I suddenly felt warm and happy. For seven years we've been rationed and without so much that perhaps you can hardly imagine the thrill of those stockings.

Yours sincerely,
NOREEN CASTLE.

Easy, Breezy Party Salad

...and so delicious with sun-drenched canned cling peaches

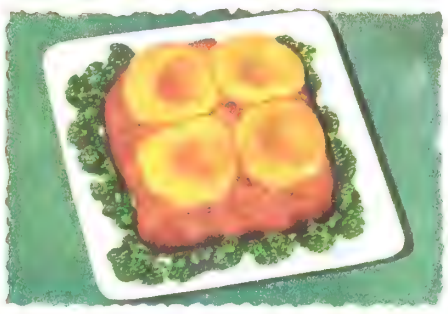
Easy Recipe

PEACH MINT SALAD

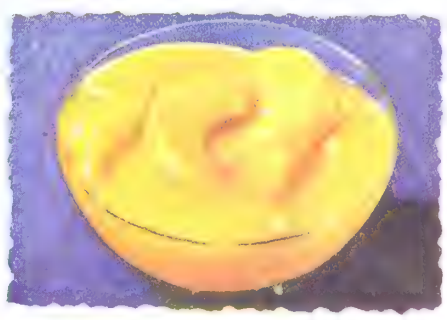
Refreshing aspic ring adorned with showy, California peaches!

8 canned cling peach halves
2 tablespoons plain gelatin
¼ cup cold water
½ cup granulated sugar
¼ teaspoon salt
¾ cup canned cling peach syrup
2 tablespoons strained lemon juice
2 cups grapefruit juice
Few drops mint flavoring
Few drops green food coloring
1 cup chopped celery
Salad greens
Mayonnaise or boiled dressing

Drain peaches. Soften gelatin in water. Add sugar and salt. Heat peach syrup and pour over gelatin mixture; stir until dissolved. Blend in lemon and grapefruit juices. Add flavoring to taste and tint lightly with green coloring. Chill until slightly thickened. Fold in celery. Arrange peach halves cup side up in a 1½-quart lightly oiled ring mold. Spoon gelatin over peaches. Chill until firm. Unmold on serving platter and garnish with salad greens and mayonnaise. Serves 8 generously.



Peach Gold Ham Loaf: Mix ¼ cup brown sugar (packed) with 1 tablespoon dry mustard and spread evenly in bottom of greased square loaf pan (5½ x 5½ x 3½ inches). Drain 4 peach halves; arrange cup side down on sugar mixture. Combine ½ pound ground ham, ¾ pound ground beef, ⅔ cup fine dry bread crumbs, 1 egg beaten lightly, ¼ teaspoon each salt and pepper and ⅓ cup milk. Blend well and pack into pan on peaches. Bake in moderate oven (350 degrees F.) for 1 hour.



California cling peaches ripen in sun-drenched valleys till they're sweet, tender, golden yellow! Delicious right from the can! Perfect in salads, desserts ... dozens of ways! For luscious, golden peaches . . . make sure the label says "clings."

They're wonderful so many ways!

If I Only Had More Confid

By Gladys Denny Shultz

MRS. SMITH was different from other mothers. It took us a long time to figure her out, and what she was trying to do.

Her two older children presented a rather classic situation—girls close together in age, the younger strikingly pretty, the elder, by contrast, angular and unattractive. Wouldn't you have thought that an intelligent, conscientious mother like Mrs. Smith would be aware of the personality difficulties this would create for Plain Jane when she reached dating age? Wouldn't you have thought she would discuss it sometimes in those intimate sessions when we let down our hair and trotted out our really serious family problems?

The queer thing about Mrs. Smith was that she never seemed to know Jane was plain. She always spoke as though her elder daughter were an unusually attractive youngster, and kept calling attention to beauties in the child which to us were nonexistent. Nor did she seem to know that Elsie, the younger, was pretty. We were told how dependable she was at home, what good grades she got at school. But it was Jane who was held up as an example of unusual and exotic beauty, a glamour girl in the bud. Whom, we asked ourselves, did Mrs. Smith think she was kidding?

As the girls got into high school, however, we began to notice something about Jane. The girl did have an air, her bony, irregular features took on a kind of pert prettiness. And Jane's way with the boys was something to see. She picked her escorts from the ones with the most pocket money, she summoned and dismissed them at will, she ruled her court with as high a hand as though she had been a Hedy Lamarr.

> There was once a man who wanted to embrace the globe, but his arms were too short. —MALAY PROVERB.

Elsie, too, had undergone a transformation, but in reverse. Her magazine-cover prettiness seemed to have faded. She bunched her hair up any old way, she paid no attention to clothes, she had no dates at all. She was so conscientious about her studies and her home responsibilities that it hurt.

At last we understood Mrs. Smith's strategy. Not to admit, even to herself, that one daughter's attractions were inferior to the other's, and thus build in Jane the confidence that would help her conquer her adolescent world. The trouble was she didn't realize that in turning her ugly duckling into a swan, she was also turning her swan into an ugly duckling.

LET me hasten to say that the foregoing true story is not offered as an example for parents to follow. But it does point up dramatically an element to which too little attention is usually paid—the part played by confidence, particularly during the adolescent years.

All of us have inferiority feelings at times, and we should probably become unbearably smug if we didn't. But the inferiority feelings of adolescence are in a somewhat different category, and a little canvassing of the situation will show why this is so.

At adolescence, boys and girls become conscious that ahead of them, and soon to be grappled with, are the challenges of maturity—to be able to make a living, to look after themselves in all ways. In high school, they have a much larger and abler group to compete with than ir and new subjects—languages, ence—which require harder many have been accustomed child with a high I. sought after socially. Having decided that romance would never be hers, the wallflower threw all her energies into writing. (It is pleasant to relate that after she had gained success in this field, she found romance as well.) Biographical literature abounds in stories of men and women who have achieved greatly in spite of—and, who knows, because of?—far worse handicaps than this one.

The danger comes when timid youngsters won't try anything, lest they fail or be excelled. It is impossible then for them to attain skills or accomplishments which will eventually give them confidence. In such unfortunates—the minority, happily—the feelings of inferiority may grow into a complex, and valuable talents and abilities may be wasted.

The more we coddle and shield our children, the more prone they are to the disease of lack of confidence when they encounter the challenges of adolescence. But we can undermine confidence as well by demanding too much, or by letting a child have the impression that he is less loved and approved than others in his family.

THE bright side of the picture is that confidence is one gift we can bestow upon our offspring if we want to, and if we go about it in the right way. We cannot insure them beauty or brains or talent—inscrutable Fate determines these things when she chooses for each individual his or her assortment of genes. But we can give our youngsters the assurance which will enable them to make the best use of the equipment they have.

If you would like your child to have this priceless gift:

1. From infancy onward, train and encourage him or her in initiative and self-reliance. The more your child learns to do for himself and to stand on his own feet, independently of you, the more you equip him with confidence.

2. Keep the atmosphere of your home happy, loving and approving. Children blossom and gain confidence in such an atmosphere. A critical, nagging, punitive one has the opposite effect.

3. Encourage the pursuit of skills and interests which appeal to the youngster, even though they may not appeal to you personally. Quite unlikely ones may provide a basis for confidence in the teens. A xylophone was the rather unusual instrument which solved the confidence problem for Sally, a girl neither very bright nor very attractive, but with a desire for this type of musical expression, and backed up in it by her parents. It proved an inspired choice, for its novelty made it much in demand for entertainments, and Sally came more into the public eye than contemporaries who were better performers on orthodox instruments than she was on the xylophone. Sally sailed through secondary school with high confidence, undimmed by her low grades, and had a better time and more acclaim than many a prettier, more talented girl.

4. As your youngster enters adolescence, recognize the manifold pressures to which he is subjected, and keep home a place where people love him and think he is swell even if he does have trouble with one or more of the new fields into which he is thrust. Have confidence in his ability to conquer all in time—that will help it come true.

5. If he is doing well in any field at all, pick that out for attention, rather than the ones in which he isn't distinguishing himself. Jack was sandwiched between two particularly brilliant siblings, whose school performances always put his to shame, and he was too small for high-school athletics, which was his chief interest. His parents were wise—far wiser, I believe you'll agree, than was Mrs. Smith. They didn't play down the accomplishment of the other youngsters, but they didn't worry Jack about his grades either. They encouraged him to go in for gymnastics, and when he broke the school record for chinning himself, they were as proud as though he had made the winning touchdown. Jack's grit and perseverance in the face of difficulties became family legend.

Announces

A NEW SERVICE

TO THE WOMEN OF AMERICA

A monthly column of helpful suggestions from one neighbor to another

$1500.00 in CASH PRIZES each month

1st PRIZE:	2nd PRIZE:	3rd PRIZE:
$700.00	$250.00	$125.00
4th PRIZE:	5th PRIZE:	PLUS 30 prizes
$75.00	$50.00	of $10.—EACH

READ THESE SIMPLE RULES

1. These contests are being offered every month to the women of America . . . as a public service of the Pepsi-Cola Company . . . to be of help to women in their day-to-day living. Hence, your entries will be judged on their practicability and every-day usefulness to your neighbors.

2. Here's all you do: Write out on any sheet of paper, in 50 words or less, the best idea you have which you think will help your neighbor. Then underneath, write briefly your reasons for selecting the idea you did. Ideas can deal with any subject of interest to women, such as short cuts in housekeeping, parties, entertaining, homemaking and decoration, etc. . . . Food Recipes are not eligible.

3. Submit your entries in your own words . . . literary style will not count. The originality and aptness of the subject matter . . . and your reasons for selecting it . . . are the things for which prizes will be awarded.

4. You may enter these contests as many times as you wish. There is nothing to buy, no box tops to send in. Write each entry on a separate sheet of paper and be sure to print your name and address on each sheet.

5. Mail your entries to Pepsi-Cola Company, Dept. L, Good Neighbors Club, P.O. Box 230, Long Island City 1, N. Y. All entries postmarked not later than May 31, 1947, will be judged in the May contest. Entries received during June will be judged in the June contest . . . and so on each month.

6. Every month, 35 cash prizes will be given totaling $1500.00, in order of excellence of entries, as follows: 1st Prize: $700.00; 2nd Prize: $250.00; 3rd Prize: $125.00; 4th Prize: $75.00; 5th Prize: $50.00; plus 30 prizes of $10.00 each.

7. Checks will be mailed to prize winners in this May contest not later than June 30, 1947 . . . and so on each month. Top prize winners of the month of May, with their pictures, will appear in the October issue of this magazine. Do not send pictures with entries.

8. Pepsi-Cola Company shall have the right to publish all prize-winning entries in any form desired, with or without editing, and including names and addresses of winners.

9. The judges of each monthly contest will be a nationally-known contest-judging organization, under the personal supervision of a well-known consultant in home economics. All decisions of the judges will be final. Duplicate prizes will be awarded in the case of ties. No entries will be returned.

10. Anyone may enter these contests except employees of Pepsi-Cola Company, or of any Pepsi-Cola bottling company, or of their advertising agencies. Members of the families of such employees are likewise not eligible.

Prize winners among entries received during the month of May will receive checks by June 30th . . . and the winning ideas will appear in the October issue of this magazine.

The strange woman put her arm about him. "Of course you loved her, poor little fellow. Perhaps she really loves you too. But somewhere your real mother and father are waiting for you. We have got to find them for you."

He pressed his face against her breast. For now there was no other breast for him to weep on.

II

All that was left of the church were the four white walls and the belfry and the spire pointing up like a sad, reproachful finger into the quiet summer sky. The curé in his black soutane stood among the graves and looked down at the village that lay beneath him in the valley, quiet, too, as the dead. At first he thought he was alone. But then he saw the tall, gangling fellow, cap in hand, with the sunlight pouring down on his russet-brown hair. He stood very still, his head bowed as though in prayer. Monsieur le Curé climbed over the graves to him—for the once neat paths had been blotted out by weeds—his soutane fluttering like the wings of a clipped bird in the light breeze.

"Étienne Duclos," he said. But it was as though he asked a startled question.

The man looked up, blinking a little. Then he held out his hand. "Monsieur le Curé ——"

"So we have come back."

"Some of us."

"Did they treat you badly, my son?"

"I limp a little. My hands aren't good for much." He held them out over the grave at his feet, showing their dreadfulness. But the gesture was also one of blessing. "She was lucky, my good Marie. She never knew."

The curé began to ask a question, but stopped in time. For he knew the answer. He turned a little, looking over the countryside which spread out green and peaceful round the church and the village like a quiet sea round a forgotten island.

"Our fields are still there," he said, "our good French fields—and God."

"Is God a German?" the man asked bitterly.

"He must be German too," the curé answered, smiling a little.

He turned and walked toward the doorway that led into the belfry, and after a moment's hesitation the younger man followed him. Inside the four close white walls was a sad twilight and the smell of damp and ruin. But the old bell still hung among the rafters. The rope trailed in the dust like a forlorn hope. The curé straightened his frail shoulders

"Let us call our people together, Étienne. Let us send them a message of reassurance. When they hear the bell ringing again they will know that their church still watches over them and that one day it will rise again out of the dust. They will think, 'If that old fellow of ours can rebuild his church we can take courage and rebuild our homes.'"

The man gave a short laugh. "How will you rebuild the church?" he asked. "Who will help you?"

"God," the curé said cheerfully. "His Son was a carpenter and I was a good mason in my youth. Between the two of us we shall manage quite well."

He gave the rope a tug. But he wasn't young any more and his strength had been spent in a bitter exile. Étienne Duclos looked up at the bell and saw it quiver like someone long dead being recalled by a miracle to life. Unwillingly, almost resentfully, he put his scarred hands above the old man's hands and the bell shook itself free and swung out gallantly, scattering the dust from its bronze shoulders. The cracked walls of the belfry shook with the echoes of its beloved, well-remembered voice. It cast a magic spell over the two men beneath so that they saw everything as it had been: the village with its neat whitewashed houses; the oxcarts creaking sleepily along the cobbled street; the women bustling alongside on their household errands; and the children laughing and playing together.

Étienne stood back, wiping the sweat from his thin cheeks, and the bell faltered sadly into silence. The curé turned to his companion, and what he saw in the ravaged face of the younger man moved him to a gentle exclamation of wonder and compassion. "Étienne," he murmured, "my poor friend."

"Haven't you any stamps with a Republican's picture on them?"

"I'm going to look for my son," Étienne Duclos said rather loudly, as though he were defying someone. "I shall hunt the world over till I find him. I shall bring him home with me. He and I will help rebuild your church for you, Monsieur le Curé."

The old man went up to him and put his frail arms about his shoulders and kissed him on either cheek.

III

THE director of the old convent where the lost children had been brought for refuge told Heini to sit on the chair beside her. She spoke in German, very slowly, so that he should understand.

But what is his real language? she asked herself. Because Heini spoke German like a baby learning to talk. Yet he wasn't stupid. He was a sturdy, intelligent-looking little fellow with comical freckles on his blunt nose and a thick thatch of russet hair to match. His eyes were a darkish blue, and you could imagine them bright with laughter and friendliness. But now there was a strange blank look in them, as though their inner sight were closed against everything but some secret vision.

"A crazy kid," the American welfare officer had said. "If I believed in witches I'd say he was bewitched."

The director ran her hand over his ruffled hair and he winced away from her. "Try to believe that I am your friend," she said patiently; "all of us here are your friends."

But he knew it wasn't true. She wore a uniform, and he knew that no one in uniform could be a friend. In his dream, at the bottom of his sleep, he knew why.

"I want to go home," he said stubbornly. "I want my mother."

"But she wasn't your mother. Sometime or other the Germans stole you from your real people. You have been so frightened that you have forgotten them. We are trying to help you to remember."

"I am a German," he said; "a real German boy."

"You have been taught to say that. One day perhaps we shall find out who you really are." She sighed. "Now go and play with your new friends," she said.

He stood up and made her a little bow, his heels together as Mutterchen had taught him, and walked stiffly out of the room and down the wide whitewashed stairs. Outside in the courtyard a group of children were learning to play again. They shouted to one another in broken English, which was to be their language. (But sometimes they forgot and fell back into the German which they had had to learn.)

Usually Heini walked away from them to the tall iron gates and stood there with his face pressed to the bars, looking down the dusty road that perhaps led home. These children were not his friends—not like Helmut and Trudi or Fritzle, of whom he couldn't think at all for fear the tears that he held back stubbornly during the daytime should break loose and shame him. ("German boys don't cry," Mütterchen had told him. If he obeyed her, even here, she might not be so lost to him.)

But today a dreadful loneliness dug its claws into him and dragged him with reluctant feet to the children's circle. He clenched his fists in the pockets of his belted tunic, and his fair brows were knitted in a fierce scowl so that if the children looked at him they would see how he despised and hated them. But no one took any notice of him except the ball which, tossed to a little girl who stood nearest him, flew over her head and rolled to Heini's feet. It lay there as Fritzle used to do, looking up at Heini and pleading humbly, urgently, that he should play with it. His legs tugged at his heart. This time he held it fast.

"You must say 'catch,'" Rachel ordered. There was something sweet and warm about her smile. Henri had to grin back at her, his mouth quivering.

"Ca-a-tch,' he stammered.

"There, you see. You are learning. In a little while you will have forgotten you were a German. And you won't mind a bit. Sigismund was a German once, weren't you, Sigi? But now he's Polish. And one day, when you know what you are, you'll be happy again too."

The tears won out. He flung himself on the ground, the sobs shaking his whole body, racking it till it seemed that it must fall to pieces. But no one laughed. Instead a grave and gentle silence encompassed him. Rachel knelt beside him and put her arms about him, drawing his head against her breast. It was such a funny, bony little breast. But it was kind.

"There. You will be better soon."

The director, looking out her office window, smiled to herself. It has begun to work at last, she thought.

IV

Life women came out of their ruined homes to see Étienne Duclos set out on his pilgrimage. From his seat on Mme. Buisson's charet, drawn by her old donkey, Alphonse, who had been alive before the Occupation, Étienne waved back to them. Their faces, that years of grief and fear had lined and hardened, glowed with the warmth of a fire that, almost burned out, had been rekindled. Everywhere, Étienne thought, life was stirring. The fields were bright with spring and the promise of harvest. In his own heart hope had thrust up brave shoots. Over the radio the villagers had heard how the Allies had gathered together thousands of lost children who were waiting in the German camps for their parents to come and claim them. Among them would be little Henri Duclos. Étienne was sure of it. The villagers were so sure that out of their poverty they had scraped together the money for his journey, and Monsieur le Curé had made a little presentation speech.

"We know what you have suffered, Étienne," he said, standing before the church crucifix under the open sky. "For we, too, have suffered. But it is not only for your sake that we are sending you on your way. France needs all her children to build a new Jerusalem out of her ruins."

Étienne had stood there, embarrassed by so much kindness, the tears, that he hadn't shed even when he had learned that Marie was dead and his son lost in the black tide of chaos, running down his cheeks.

"We are all your friends," Monsieur le Curé had concluded, "and our prayers will go with you, upholding you." He had made the sign of the cross over Étienne's bowed head.

Étienne had strapped the money to his waist, together with all the precious documents that Monsieur le Maire had collected for him, and he carried a battered old bag that Louise Carnot had lent him for the journey. Louise was a good woman who had loved his Marie and had nursed her devotedly when Henri had been born.

She came running down a side lane with her shawl clutched about her shoulders. Terrible things had happened to her. She had been carried into slavery, and no one had dared to ask what her slavery had meant. She had been a young and pretty woman when the Germans had taken her away with them. She had come back with a look in her eyes as of one who had been down in the nethermost pit and had come back with an unspeakable knowledge. But also a new dignity had been laid about her shoulders like a protecting mantle.

"The soul of a good Christian is an impregnable fortress," Monsieur le Curé had preached on the Sunday after her return. "The walls may be scarred and the defenders sore-stricken with the fear of sin and death. But the foul feet of the invader can never cross the threshold of the inner citadel."

She walked fast beside the charet. She carried a package wrapped in old newspaper that she laid at Étienne's feet.

"A little something to eat on the way, Étienne," she said, "and an old suit belonging to our Mathieu. He too, you remember, was just ten years old."

Étienne looked down at her. Mathieu was her young brother whom the Germans had caught in the street after curfew. He had gone out to look for a lost kitten and was bringing it home in his arms when they caught him. They shot him out of hand and tossed the kitten into a water butt.

"Thank you, Louise. You have a kind heart."

He thought suddenly, One day I shall be able to really see her—when I have found my son. We shall begin to build up our lives—the three of us together. But now he could only take her hand in the firm clasp of an old, tried friendship.

"When you come back, you two," Louise gasped, "the village will be en fête. I will tell you something you are not supposed to know. The men are going to put a new roof to your house. We women are cutting up old dresses to make curtains—and even things not to be mentioned. It was to have been a surprise. But perhaps it will strengthen you to know that we are doing our part."

He couldn't speak.

Mme. Buisson clucked impatiently. "Women can never hold their tongues," she said. She shook the reins and poked old Alphonse in the rump with her stick. "Allons, allons. We shall miss the train."

Nobody ever got indigestion eating humble pie. —Be-fast Newsletter.

Alphonse actually broke into a trot. Étienne stood up and looked back—at Louise standing in the middle of the street and the village they would rebuild together. He waved to everyone—to the whole future.

"We shall come home," he shouted to them all.

The director walked through the cool white dormitory. "Good night, children," she said in her warm voice.

"Good night, good night!" they called back to her in English. Little by little it was becoming the language common to them all.

It seemed a long time ago that Heini had tucked his head under the bedclothes like a sullen captive bear cub. Now he shouted "Good night" louder than any of them. It wasn't true, what Mütterchen had told him. He had not been beaten or killed. Every day he seemed a little more alive. Tomorrow morning the room would be full of sunshine. Through the open windows he would hear the singing of birds, and all about him the sleepy twittering of his new friends who had taught him how to play. So Mütterchen had lied to him. These people were not bad people. Even François, who was French and very sick, was brave as a lion, and Rachel was a kind, lovely little girl. One of these days Heini meant to marry her.

The door closed. The director's firm footsteps faded down the corridor. For a moment there was a tense hush. Then bedclothes were swept back. With subdued laughter the children gathered around Heini's bed. They piled themselves almost on top of him. Across the corridor a door opened, and Rachel and the little girls who slept with her crept in, mouse-quiet, wrapped in sheets and looking like small ghosts. It was all strictly forbidden. But they weren't afraid any more to do things that were verboten. They might be punished. But naughtiness and punishment were part of a game they and the grownups played together. If you hadn't been really bad you could see the twinkle in the grownups' eyes. They, too, they remembered, had been naughty in their time.

Rachel perched herself on Heini's pillow, which was her accepted place, and wrapped her thin arms about her knees. He liked to feel her warm closeness. It gave him the comfort that Mütterchen had given him. But it was different. It wasn't a fierce demanding, but a complete, unquestioning giving. Perhaps that was why he didn't seem able to see Mütterchen very clearly. She was sinking to the bottom of the dream that he could never remember.

"Tell us more, Rachel!" the children whispered.

Because Rachel had found an aunt and uncle in America. They had written her, and by the next emigrant ship she was going to them. Already she knew more than anybody else about the fairy-tale country where the houses towered up into the sky like the peaks of magic mountains and where everybody had enough to eat and no one was afraid of anyone.

"If you want to hard enough you can be the President," Rachel said. "Even I could be President. I could tell people what they ought to do, but they wouldn't have to do it, because everyone is free."

"Tell us more!" the children pleaded.

Her arm about Heini's shoulder tightened. "I will tell you something wonderful. I heard the director talking. We are all going together, except François, who is being sent somewhere in the mountains where he will become well and strong again. You see, we are quite, quite lost. So we can all go. We can stay close to each other all the rest of our lives."

"I used to be sad because my mother was dead," someone whispered. "But I think now she will be glad, too, for me."

François was very quiet. They knew that he was weeping.

"It will be only for a little time," Rachel comforted him. "When you are well again you will come over the sea and we shall be waiting for you. By that time we shall be very rich and you will make your home with us. You mustn't cry."

François wiped his nose on the sleeve of his pajamas and held his head high so that the tears should run back wherever they came from.

Heini sat tense and anxious He knew now that he wasn't a German little boy. Mütterchen wasn't his real mother. So perhaps—perhaps—

THE director stood with her tea base of the flagpole. She couldn't she could feel the gallant strip o flying out in the light breeze over In moments of discouragement fear she looked out her office wir the sight of its bright flickering comforted and reassured her. It w that a strip of bunting could do for you.

The children stood in a doubl looked up at it. The morning ligh their eyes. Already the flag had con something to them too—enough t safety, and the kindness of good was against disenchantment that warn them. She had to make the stand that real treasure is alway They would have to dig for it.

"Tomorrow," she said, "we good-by. You will travel in a big great new world. It is waiting to gi best it has. But you children m your best too. "No."

"And he wants very much to go?"

THE children's gardens backed onto the north wall of the convent and were bathed in sunlight. Of all of them Heini's was the greenest and neatest. He had an understanding of the earth and of all growing things. That was what the strange man who stood beside him said.

"Tu as la main verte, mon petit," he said. But then he saw that the boy didn't understand and translated as best he could, his voice hoarse as though he had been crying.

Heini cocked his head to listen. In the deep place where the dream lay asleep he felt it stir uneasily, ruffling the darkness. "Who are you?" he asked. "Have you come perhaps to take us to America?"

The man sat down on an overturned box against the wall. He sat forward, hiding his face, his strange beaten-looking hands clasped between his knees. "No," he said, "I can't go to America."

"Aren't your father and mother dead too?"

"Yes. But I've got to go back where I belong."

"Prison," he said simply.

The boy thrust his hands into the belt of his tunic, frowning with the effort of some inner struggle. "Fraulein Green says lots of good people go to prison—the very best."

"I was a prisoner of war."

"Are you going home now?"

"I have been home—for a little while."

"Why are you here?"

"I have been traveling—looking for a lost friend."

"Haven't you found him?"

The man's hands were white about the knuckles. "No," he said.

The boy took a step nearer. He was like a young animal flairing something strange and perhaps dangerous. "Aren't you lonely?"

The man lifted his blue eyes. He narrowed them against the sunlight. "It seems I must be." He asked after a moment, almost eagerly, "And you, my little one, are you lonely?"

"Oh, no. Not now. I was once. And awfully frightened—so frightened I couldn't speak properly. I didn't know who I was."

"Who are you now?"

"My name is Henry Miller. In a few days I shall be an American citizen."

He came still closer. He put out his hand tentatively as though he wanted to touch the man's sleeve. But his hand dropped. From her window the director saw the two red-brown heads glowing close to each other in the sunlight.

"Who are you?" the boy asked again.

The man straightened up. He rested his clenched fists on his knees. "My name's Duclos," he said. "Étienne Duclos. I am a French peasant from Brittany. My village is called Saint Epernay. All my people were born there—my wife and son too."

"Where are they now?"

"I don't know. When I came out of prison they were gone."

The boy crouched cross-legged at the man's feet. "You must find them."

"Perhaps I shall—one day."

"Tell me about your village."

"There isn't much left of it to tell about. The big guns blew down the walls of the houses. Then a terrible fire started. The roof of the white church that stands on the hill fell in. But the spire is still there—and the belfry. Just before I left Monsieur le Cure and I rang the bell for vespers ——"

Yes, the boy heard it—way down in the depths that were no longer so deep. He threw back his head. "Ding-dong," he chanted, "ding-dong-ding."

"Yes," Étienne Duclos said. "It sounds a bit like that. When the people heard it for the first time they couldn't believe their ears. They came out of their cellars to l[isten]. Most of them had given up hope, bu[t he] bell gave them courage. They felt that [they] could begin again. With the old brick [and] stones they could rebuild their homes [be]fore fields were still there, waiting for them.

"Are you going back?"

"Yes." And now the man spoke w[ith] deep but controlled passion. "Yes—I [shall] go back. I shall rebuild my house as i[t was] in my father's time. And I shall til[l the] fields."

"But you can't. Your hands ——"

The man looked down at them. "If [they] were stumps," he said between his [teeth]. "I should make them work for me. T[hat is] the way I reason. If we rebuild our v[illage] other villages will take heart. And the[n the] towns and cities will say to themselves, [Well,] now, we can't let those little fellows put [us to] shame.' They will rise out of their [ashes.] France will rise ——"

The boy stood up, listening, as thou[gh to] someone far off who had called his [name.] "You must find your friend," he said. [He] will need him to help you."

"Even without him!" the man ret[orted] proudly. He stood up too. He said [with a] sudden harshness, "I must be on my [way]."

The boy asked a strange question. "Is [there] a little dog in your village? Does he run [with] the street barking at the heels of the o[ld]?"

"Yes, he is still there. He was st[ill a] mongrel that the Germans didn't bothe[r with] him, and somehow he managed to scro[unge] living for himself ——"

"—— catching rabbits," the boy la[ughed]. "Frou-Frou could always catch a ra[bbit]."

The man held out his hand. N[ow] seemed, he was desperately anxious [to be] gone. "Good-by," he said. "Good [luck]. When you are a great man over there [you] be very proud."

There was a familiar strength in [the] broken fingers. Warmth and comfort [flowed] up from their clasp to the boy's heart. [Out] the black depths of his memory the [dream] burst to the surface. He knew why h[e had] forgotten. He knew pain and the ter[ror of] being little and lost and helpless. Bu[t now] the terror subsided like a wicked fir[e that] has almost burned itself out. In the [cold] sunlight he saw the village street a[nd the] patient oxen and the grave, friendly f[aces] his people. He saw the man walkin[g] toward the gates and the road home. I[t ran] after him, shouting. His clear young [voice] sounded like a bell in the drowsy sile[nce].

He shouted in English, "Wait—I [come] with you, father!" And then in a r[apture] joyous triumph, "Attends, mon père, j'[ai] avec toi!"

Poem of Afternoon

BY ROBERT P. TRISTRAM COFFIN

There is something singular about the woman
Crossing the field between her house and shed,
A common farmer's wife, yet she is going
As if the train of a gown behind her spread.

She walks slow because her skirt is longer
Than any kitchen skirt ever would be;
She is by herself, and yet her air is
She goes gracious in midst of company.

I believe she must be talking gaily
Though the wind blows all her words away.
Never did I see a woman step so queenly
In any field that bears the common hay.

But now I come up nearer to the mystery,
It is no mystery; it is a lovely plain
Poem of afternoon at any farmhous[e]
And I have seen it happen again and [again]

The farmer's wife is carrying out the supper
To all the creatures let out of thei[r pens]
To scratch the stubble left after the mowing,
The woman has a long train of her [own].

The hens crowd close, the air runs tense, electric
With joy and hunger, friendliness, good will;
The hens are decorous and bland.
though every
Eye is lit, and tilted every bill.

No wonder the woman is on her best behavior,
Being looked up to so by weare[rs]
of wings,
A continent of good will moves behi[nd her]
No wonder she walks and talks like a queen, or sings!

Medicine's Fifth Column

BY VIRGIL H. MOON, A.B., M.Sc., M.D.
Professor of Pathology, Jefferson Medical College

)ICAL science today is threatened obstructionists, saboteurs and fifth lumnists. Under the guise of pre- nting cruelty to animals, the anti- ionists seek to deprive medical re- f its most valuable method animal entation.

test animal is to biologic science ie test tube is to chemistry. It s conditions for determining the disease, how the cause affects the nd organs, and what remedies or res may counteract the cause or its effects. Had these methods not ed, medicine would still be the same ieration of suppositions and dogma was in past centuries. The princi- ich underlie causation, prevention itment were developed through ex- tation on animals.

Mütter Museum of the College of ns of Philadelphia is a collection of ects removed from human lungs in Jackson's clinic. The collection includes gravel, coins, buttons, nails, pins, shells, bones, teeth, erasers, marbles; almost every known object small enough to go into a child's mouth is represented in the collection. Formerly when a bean, popcorn or peanut was aspirated, the child was almost certainly doomed to a lingering death. Now a skilled bronchoscopist can be found in any section of this country. It is not possible to calculate how many thousands of children have been saved by this technique.

SURGERY has made outstanding advances recently, particularly in the delicate technique of repairing nerves, blood vessels and in operations on the heart and lungs. Recently Dr. Alfred Blalock has developed methods for transplanting and joining blood vessels so that children born with malformations of the heart may have these corrected. The surgical excision of a lobe or even of a whole lung may now be done successfully; this has been a lifesaving operation in selected cases of gangrene, tuberculosis, bronchiectasis or tumors. These techniques were developed by similar operations on dogs, never without complete anesthesia and the same asepsis and aftercare as in the treatment of human patients.

When a horse, dog or cat suffered a broken leg, the animal formerly was killed humanely, for it [illegible] to hold the fragments in place long enough for healing. Dr. Otto Stader, a veterinarian, perfected a metal device which grasped and held the bones rigidly in place, attached to an outside bar strong enough to bear the animal's weight. This required years of experimentation, but now the Stader splint is standard equipment for veterinarians, and countless pets owe their lives to it. The appliance was found to give excellent results in human subjects and was adopted by the Medical Corps of our military forces. Many a wounded veteran will have a more useful limb because of the Stader splint.

Animals are absolutely necessary for determining the curative properties of remedies and for standardizing their potency. Doctor Ehrlich's search for "the magic bullet"—a chemical agent to kill the spirochetes of syphilis—involved the methodical testing of one arsenical compound after another. Not one among the first 605 drugs was suitable, but the 606th had the desired qualities: it could be given safely by hypodermic needle to human beings and it had stronger antisyphilitic properties than any other known drug. In this search, probably not fewer than ten rabbits were treated with each drug; certainly thousands of rabbits were used before the Salvarsan (606) treatment was perfected. Untold millions of human beings have been restored to health and to useful life by this treatment.

Doctor Ehrlich's discovery marked the beginning of chemotherapy and led to the use of sulpha drugs and penicillin. Each of these was tested for its effectiveness and for its safety before it was used in treating man.

The new drug streptomycin promptly checks some infections which are not benefited by sulpha drugs or by penicillin. A group of workers at the Mayo Foundation is now investigating its effects upon tuberculosis by the same technique used before with sulpha compounds. Tuberculosis is produced artificially in guinea pigs, then they are treated with the drug. Results are so encouraging that streptomycin is now being tried in human cases. So far, it offers greater hope than any drug previously used in tuberculosis.

During World War I, shock caused a high rate of mortality among wounded men because the condition was not understood and means for preventing or treating it were not effective. During subsequent years many investigators studied this problem intensively; experiments on animals were absolutely necessary in these investigations. As a result, the causes for shock were disclosed and means were devised for its prevention and treatment. These resulted in a tremendous saving of lives in World War II. Millions of civilians donated their blood in order that wounded men might not die from the effects of shock and hemorrhage. During the First World War the mortality among wounded men was slightly above 9 per cent; in the recent war the mortality was only 3 per cent. Among approximately 800,000 wounded, this resulted in saving the lives of 48,000 American boys. Certainly not that many animals were used in the experiments which led to these results. Is the life of a dog, cat or rabbit too high a price to pay for the life of a man?

These are only a few out of hundreds of notable victories won by medical science at war with disease. Yet the antivivisectionists vigorously demand legislation prohibiting or limiting the use of animals for medical purposes. Such legislation was attempted recently in California, Illinois, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania and in Congress. In each instance the friends of medical research successfully opposed the passage of the bills. But the margin of success was narrow.

Suppose that efforts of the antivivisectionists had succeeded and that the use of animals for medical purposes had ended with the year 1946. Such a catastrophe would not only halt the progress of medical science and make future conquests impossible; it would deprive physicians of invaluable weapons already perfected and in use.

The Wassermann test for syphilis and biologic tests for other conditions could not be made. Physicians could no longer be sure that their drugs are reliable, for the potency of digitalis, ergot, vitamins, insulin, adrenalin, cortin, of all other hormones and many other drugs, can be determined and standardized only by their effects on animals.

Nor could antitoxins for diphtheria, tetanus, snake bites, meningitis or gangrene be made. Epidemics of smallpox might again become common, for animals could not be used in preparing vaccine.

Animal tests of blood, urine, pus and other secretions are required in all modern hospitals. These are as necessary in diagnosis as are X-ray pictures. There are 6611 registered hospitals in the United States, not including several hundred military hospitals. Imagine that all the patients which these hospitals will serve henceforth would be deprived of accurate diagnosis.

The most intensive and exhaustive research on cancer yet undertaken has been initiated by the American Society for Cancer Research, the National Research Council and the National Institute of Health. Millions of dollars are available for this; scores of research men, experienced in cancer work, are prying into every biologic angle of tumors. Deprived of experimental animals, this research would be obliged to halt.

In view of the contributions of modern medicine to human welfare, efforts to stop research and to deprive physicians of their best weapons are bewildering. For the war against disease concerns the public as much as the medical profession. The Friends of Medical Research is a society of laymen organized to oppose the antivivisection menace. It helped to defeat antivivisection legislation in New York in 1946. For the welfare of your children and of their children, join and support this movement. Intelligent organized action is required in every state; otherwise the clock of progress, in matters of human health and longevity, may be turned back toward the Middle Ages. THE END says that Simon Byrne was a prisoner in the same Offlag. He died last year."

"Oh, poor darling!" said Brenda, in the sweet, hollow voice she used when the conventions demanded an assumption of sorrow. One's heart had been wrung so often that there had come a time when it recorded merely a mechanical spasm. She went on arranging the flowers with a set expression.

Lisby said nothing. She sat very still in the recesses of the armchair and clasped her knees to still their trembling. "So much death, one cannot bear it," she said at last, and got herself out of the room somehow. She always took things to heart—concentration camps and everything—as if she suffered in her own body the agony of unknown millions.

"It's all very well for Lisby," said Brenda with a shrug "But, after all, she hasn't had any personal loss in this war. Not like you and me. I mean, when someone's killed who's been in love with one, it makes it all so terribly poignant. I sometimes think I've felt so much, I can't feel any more. Those poor lambs!" She sighed and dipped her face into the roses, as if she would leave with them the expression of grief she could now decently abandon. It was almost as if she were leaving the roses on his grave to symbolize her thoughts of him, that would fade more quickly than they. "He was sweet, but rather dumb," she said.

"Did he ever ——" asked Charlotte, looking over her tortoise-shell glasses.

"Not in so many words. You all took it for granted it was me. But perhaps, after all, you were the attraction, Charlotte." But the hint of doubt found no expression in the tones of her voice.

"Or Lisby. It really is rather awful the way we leave her out of account."

Charlotte sealed her letter and took off her glasses. She had a face like La Belle Ferronière, on which the glasses had the air of an amusing affectation. But Brenda had the flowerlike delicacy of a Piero della Francesca. Lisby had seen the resemblances and had made her sisters a present of them. But no one had noticed that she herself was like the watching girl who holds a basket on her head in the background of El Greco's Christ in the Temple.

"Of course," said Charlotte, affixing a stamp, "it wasn't I. That's a thing I never make a mistake about. A woman always knows."

"Well, I am not so cocksure about love as you seem to be. I mean, I'm inclined to say to myself, 'If he does so and so, if he remembers what hat I wore the day before yesterday, if he bothers to look up the address I'm staying at in the telephone book, then I shall know for certain.' But I don't remember applying any such tests to Simon. Somehow we never got that far. Though I had my suspicions, of course."

BRENDA carried the roses across the room and put them on the piano, in the midst of the numerous photographs of young men in uniform. Surreptitiously she changed the place of one. He had been shot down over Hamburg, and his place was among the dead. Perhaps no one but herself, who was responsible for it, was aware of this arrangement of the photographs. She had a feeling about the matter of which she would not have spoken for the world. It did not exactly amount to a superstition. Perhaps it meant no more than did the meticulous dividing up of her books into their respective categories. It irritated her to find a novel thrust in between two volumes of poetry. Death, perhaps, was poetry, and life, prose. Or was it the other way round?

In the midst of preparations for the wedding, no one, it seemed, gave another thought to Simon Byrne.

"Lisby seems rather odd these days—sort of strung-up," said Charlotte one day. "Do you think, Brenda, that subconsciously she minds my getting married and your being engaged? I mean, it can't be much fun, poor child, seeing happiness through other people's eyes, as Shakespeare has already rema She snapped off a thread and took th out of a seam.

DO MEN OR WOMEN LEAD THE HARDER LIFE?

A woman: "So many women don't do their part—they leave more than a fair share for the men to do."

A man: "No matter how he feels, a man's got to go out and work—he's still got to bring home the bacon."

A woman: "A man has to work all day—a woman can stop and rest a minute."

Some people argue for both sides

The people who think there's no difference, that life is no harder for either sex, explain their point of view convincingly:

Said a man: "I don't suppose there's any difference. They both have to work. It's just different work is all, and hard for both. The man makes the living, the woman cares for the home and children."

A woman echoed his idea: "A man has pretty much of a burden to feed the kids, and a woman had to have them."

A husband summed it up: "It's fifty-fifty. They're both working for the family's happiness in their own ways. Or they should be."

Family finances

Whether or not the handling of money has any bearing on the main question, it's interesting to see that more women than men again press the claims of their own sex. When [illegible] asked, "In general, who do you think manage money better, women or men?"

To be beloved is above all bargains.

[illegible]:

"Women manage money better," said 52 per cent.

"Men do," said 16 per cent.

"There's no difference," said 26 per cent.

"I don't know," said 6 per cent.

Men replied:

"Women generally manage money better," said 31 per cent.

"Men do," said 33 per cent.

"There's no difference," said 27 per cent.

"I don't know," said 6 per cent.

Concerning husbands and wives

Married people interviewed in the survey were questioned about the degree of happiness they have found in marriage. This line of inquiry develops the conclusion that the happier your marriage, the more likely you are to concede that the other sex leads the harder life! When we compare the views of the most happily married husbands and wives interviewed in the survey, with those of the least happily married, we

Of the most happily married women, 47 per cent say women lead the harder lives; 27 per cent say men do.

Of the least happily married women, 69 per cent say women lead the harder lives; only 11 per cent say men do.

And among the most happily married men, 57 per cent say women lead the harder lives; only 22 per cent say men do.

Of the least happily married men, 34 per cent think women's lives are hardest; 41 per cent think men have the harder time.

This by no means proves that, if you want a happy marriage, you must concede that your life is a bed of roses, while your poor husband's is a bed of thorns. Nearly half of the most happily married women think women lead the harder lives. It just points to the natural conclusion that people's personal experience colors their view of life in general. But it's hard to avoid recalling the words quoted earlier: "Women's mental make-up tends to cause self-pity." Maybe this remark applies mainly to unhappy wives.

16,000,000 other Americans, probably including your husband and perhaps yourself. Every week, a small sum is deducted from my pay check to give me the benefits of Social Security when I'm old. These benefits range all the way from a minimum of $10 a month to a maximum of $84 a month, depending on how long any of us remain under the system and how much we earn. I figure I'll be receiving $10 to $15 a week from Social Security when I'm 65, and that, plus my $102 a month, should take care of me nicely.

You and your husband can do it, if you'll save a few dollars before that pay check starts to disappear into the stores and the movies and some desired but unnecessary frivolity. You can make this plan your key to future independence, if you'll pledge to yourself that you will save regularly, you will buy bonds regularly.

If there is any miracle to this—and there isn't, because it's just common sense—it lies in the way interest mounts up and adds to a nest egg day after day, year after year. A $3.75 weekly investment in savings bonds will grow to $2163 in ten years. A $7.50 saving in bonds will swell to $4329 in a decade. And the person who can buy an $18.75 bond every week will have $5024 in five years, $10,828 in ten. Those weekly savings may not look like much when you start—but oh, how the nest egg grows!

Let's say you're like the bride's sister I mentioned earlier. Your husband has a job and earns $75 a week. Both of you are in your late twenties, you have two youngsters, and so far you've just made a go of it. Your insurance is next to nothing, you own no savings bonds and you've only $150 or so in the bank.

ALL right, if I were sitting opposite you this evening, I'd say:

"For your own happiness and the security of your children, you can't keep on this way and you mustn't. It'll be hard, I know, especially at today's high prices, but decide in your mind right now that your weekly income is not $75, but $65. And pledge yourself right now that the $10 you forget is to build toward your future independence.

"First, earmark enough to buy one of those $18.75 bonds each month. Make that monthly purchase as rigid an expense as your rent, and make a date with yourself to stop in at your neighborhood bank on a certain day twelve times a year to buy your bond. Then begin on the program I've adopted.

"That'll leave more than half of your forgotten income unused, and that balance is to go into insurance. For only $5 a week, your husband can buy an insurance policy that'll guarantee you and your children $100 a month for a full ten years if anything happens to him. He's young, so the cost is low; your children are young, so a monthly income is imperative; and ten years is a long enough period for the children to grow up and you to adjust yourself.

"With a bond program, insurance and his Social Security, you'll be on your way to security. And start now!"

Or let's say you're like Dave's wife. Your husband earns $100 a week. Both of you are in your late thirties and have one child in the teens. As for your savings, your husband has carried $10,000 of insurance since your child was born and you've a few thousand in the corner savings bank.

All right, if I were sitting opposite you this evening, I'd say:

"You're saving, and that's fine, but you're saving wrong. You've no reason to have that much money in the bank, for all you need in cash is an emergency fund, and the equivalent of one or two months' salary is ordinarily enough for that.

"So, transfer your cash into savings bonds and get the benefit of that 2.9 per cent interest return beginning now. And with your income, you certainly can afford to take on a bond-a-month buying program.

EVEN "finicky" appetites perk right up when you serve that deliciously different meal. It's quick and easy to prepare . . . and very economical. Of course, MAZOLA Salad Oil plays a leading part . . . it fries so delicately, blends so perfectly. Yes, it's really surprising how many good things you can make with MAZOLA, America's favorite Salad Oil. At your grocer's, in bottles or tins.

MAZOLA Salad Oil

FISH PARISIENNE

1 to 1½ pounds fish steaks or fillets
1 tablespoon MAZOLA Salad Oil
Few grains salt
2 tablespoons corn starch
¾ teaspoon salt
⅛ teaspoon pepper
1½ cups milk
1 to 2 egg yolks
3 tablespoons lemon juice
¼ cup MAZOLA Salad Oil
1 pound asparagus, cooked

Brush fish with MAZOLA Salad Oil and place in shallow baking dish. Sprinkle lightly with salt. Bake in hot oven (425° F.) 20 minutes.

Mix corn starch, salt and pepper in a small amount of milk until smooth. Add remaining milk. Cook over low heat, stirring constantly, until mixture thickens and boils. Boil 1 minute, stirring constantly. Remove from heat; gradually add to egg yolks. Then cook 2 minutes longer, stirring constantly. Remove from heat; gradually beat in lemon juice. Add MAZOLA, beating until smooth.

Arrange asparagus around fish; cover with sauce. Place under broiler until lightly browned. Serve at once. Makes 4 servings.

BROILER FRIED POTATOES

Wash and pare 4 medium potatoes. Cut lengthwise into strips ½ inch thick. Soak in salted cold water 30 minutes. Preheat broiler 5 minutes. Meanwhile, drain potatoes; dry thoroughly. Place potatoes in broiler pan; add ¼ cup MAZOLA Salad Oil and stir well. Broil about 3 inches from heat, 15 to 18 minutes, stirring frequently until golden brown. Season with salt; serve immediately. Makes 4 servings.

REPORT To the Housewife

BY JUDY BARR

COATS THAT GROW

Most mothers agree that children don't seem to widen as fast as they stretch the long way, in arms and legs. Now a sympathetic manufacturer, mindful of mother's time and money, has done children's coats with plenty of extra fabric in hems and sleeves, constructed them in such a way that mother may make a toddler's coat "grow" a full size—1½ inches longer—by simply pulling a thread in hem and sleeves, and pressing out the old creases.

LOOK, NO CLOTHESPINS

One of the most tiring jobs we have to do, hanging up wet clothes, may be speeded up and made considerably easier soon, for up in Canada a new clothesline has been invented. This line, a double twist of rust-proof spring steel wire, grips clothes without benefit of pins. You stand in one spot, slip a corner of the article to be hung into a loop formed by the line's patented mechanism, and run the line out. When it's time to take the clothes down, the pieces drop into the waiting clothe-basket as the line is pulled in.

SWEET DREAMS

If feathers make you sniffle, we thought you might like to know that one of our Workshop workers, whose nostrils are allergic to feather dust, has been sleeping sweetly and soundly for three months now on a pillow filled with glass fibers. He reports that it's comfortable as a cloud to rest upon, hasn't matted down or lumped or behaved badly in any way.

NO SEAMS TO SCOUR

A new streamlined muffin pan is made all of a piece, from one sheet of aluminum, a sensible seamless construction which makes it almost as easy to clean as a china cup. Have you made popovers lately?

COMFORT BY THE YARD

If you have a hard unyielding chair, or a window seat that you'd like to make soft and comfy, did you know that you may buy foam rubber by the yard, and cut it to fit? It's easy to cut, easy to cover with upholstery, but comes rather high, as many kinds of comfort seem to nowadays.

DRIP CATCHERS

These, we feel, are going to cut down laundry bills: disp bath mats, a brand-new and nently sensible idea. They're and soft, highly absorbent– pensive enough so that tossin away after a using or two h budget less than having a cloth one laundered.

BUTTERFINGERS?

A vacuum coffee maker that won't break—good news for those who are likely to let glass one through our fingers. It's of long-drawn aluminum, m cups of coffee, and is pleas priced.

LITTLE GRAINS OF WHITE

Latest Workshop washday f bleach that's safe for woolen silks. It's in powder form, used in the washing water soap—looks like white sand. to measure, no danger of splas

CLEAN CUT

Sharpening knives is a tricky ness—a job that most of us do very well. We have found a new plastic-encased sharpener, design be hung on a wall or screwed to a effective and easy to use. The c are made of tungsten carbide, h man-made metal, greatly used the war in industrial plants. W won't do the thorough job that fessional sharpening with oil and stone will do, it makes a clean edge quickly—very handy to ha the kitchen.

PINUP TIME

Two things we all like to ha our kitchens, a clock and radio, now been combined. What's this new radio-clock is a "pin designed to be hung on the wa that none of the kitchen's val shelf space need be used for it may, however, be seated on a if you prefer it that way.) The is concealed in the square p electric-clock case—a pleas looking clock with an open h face and good big numerals, jus kind you need in a kitchen.

Back again: slide-fastened automobile suit bags, so handy for carrying extra clothes, well-protected from dust and wrinkles, on vacation jaunts in your car. Shoe bags to match hold six pairs of shoes.

OFF TO CAMP

Good news for your busy thimble finger. This year, you may save hours of the time it usually takes to get the youngsters ready for camp. Name tapes, inscribed in indelible ink and cut to size, may now be pressed on. They are guaranteed by the maker to cling through 50 washings.

MOTH MONTH

Dreadful to call the beautiful month of May moth month, but this is when the little varmints really get busy. Our good friend aluminum foil is proof against them, however. It tucks so firmly around a favorite sweater, scarf, muff or mittens, leaving no little chinks for a moth to make his way through. Then there's a new type of transparent rubber film that comes in rolls, which will also make a moth-proof package when its edges are sealed with a hot iron. This is tough and tear-resistant, and may also be re-used, as the foil may be. Clothes should be thoroughly cleaned or laundered before storing.

CARETAKER

Here's a little thing that may prevent a big sad loss: a sparkling plastic holder, to be attached to kitchen or bathroom wall, designed to hold your rings and wrist watch safely when you take them off to wash your hands. A vertical finger-size rod holds rings; two small hooks take care of watch and bracelet.

FOREVER FLOWERS

The pleasantest use we've yet heard of for plastics, though they're used in so many wonderful ways, is a new process which allows a real flower to be imbedded in a solid block of plastic, capturing its beauty forever in the form of book ends, paperweight or what you will. This process is just about ready for commercial production. Another process, not yet ready to make its commercial debut, coats the flower with a very thin film of plastic, treats the surface so that reflections of light are eliminated; thus, at a short distance, the plastic cannot be seen, yet the flowers remain "alive" and at the peak of their perfection indefinitely. Samples of flowers treated in this manner over a year ago are still fresh and lovely, it is said. Many types of flowers have been used successfully—camellias, gardenias, pansies, poinsettias. Something to look forward to, isn't it?

Before canning season, get acquainted with a new kind of jar rubber. A split tab makes it easy to open a jar in a jiffy.

PLASTIC POINTERS

Before you attempt to sew a fine seam in the new plastic-film-by-the-yard, it might be a good plan to visit your community's sewing-machine center and get a bit of advice on how to handle it. They'll be glad to give you instructions. Here are some tips we gathered at our own "machine shop": Before cutting, hang the length of film over an open door, with ends balanced evenly, to smooth out any folds or wrinkles. Use weights instead of pins for securing the pattern, or trace an outline of the pattern and its markings on the plastic with a soft pencil. Use paper clips to keep each section with its pattern. Do not pin or baste when assembling on the machine—use paper clips if necessary, but sparingly. For stitching, use a size 11 needle, preferably; light tension, light pressure, and the longest stitch acceptable to the character of what you're making. When using attachments, if the film seems soft and moist from humidity, brush a bit of talcum lightly along the edge to be inserted into the attachment. If the plastic is tough or brittle from cold, gently whisk a drop of oil on your finger tip along the edge. When you have lots of ruffling to do—in making curtains, for example—the experts suggest passing a half-inch strip of very fine emery cloth between the blades before stitching, from front to back, to forestall any tendency to skip gathers.

BOTTLE ROUNDUP

If you want to keep on getting your regular quota of milk and other bottled beverages, better join this important roundup and ride herd on bottles that have strayed. For every bottle of milk delivered, a dairy must have eight bottles in the process of washing, filling and storage. The extreme shortage of soda ash (an important ingredient of glass bottles), as well as the shortage of railroad cars for transportation, keeps bottle supplies scarce. So—round 'em up, the old ones in your basement, and get them back in circulation. When you buy milk or have it delivered, make a special effort to return the bottles promptly. Milk's too important to let carelessness interfere with its steady flow into our homes.

CAREFUL!

May we beg you not to try dry cleaning indoors, if your project is more than a few spots? Even if you're careful to use only noninflammable cleaning fluids, the vapors of some are poisonous if they are inhaled for any length of time. Even brief sniffs may be very sickening to some people.

Carbon tetrachloride, sold under many trade names, is not inflammable. Many other cleaning fluids are, and if their vapors come in contact with a flame—bingo!—fire is born, and flame will "flash" along the path to their source. That is why a fire may break out in a container of fluid which is all the way across a room from a stove pilot light. In fact, inflammable vapors have been known to travel 200 feet before being ignited. Be especially careful, too, not to rub so hard that you cause static electric sparks.

Ergo: take all big dry-cleaning jobs outdoors: don't keep your hands in the solvent too long (it may cause a rash or an irritation); don't wear natural-rubber gloves, as they will dissolve into a sticky mass. And try water on your spots first anyway!

THE OTHER SIDE OF THE MOON

it objectively, as of something outstandingly beautiful which should have proper appreciation. Still there were other hours, mostly during empty nights when her blood tormented her and arched her back and made her toss restlessly from side to side of her wide bed. Then all the objectivity, all the indifference drained from her; then her skin burned with frustration, her jaw ached from too tensely set teeth and in her ears hummed a wild and lustful rhythm which knew only a beginning, never an end.

No sex? she would think, laughing mirthlessly into the lonely darkness of her large room. She longed to be able to cry, to find release for her taut nerves, but it wasn't given to her. Sometimes she would get up and wander through the big house, through every room as if somehow she expected to find Lou; or out into the garden down by the pool and even as far as the small cemetery where Lou Sedley lay buried at the bottom of the hill. Some nights she would force herself to work, to go into Lou's library and read, frowning with concentration, but always she would end up on the second floor, in front of the nursery.

WHILE Luke was small there was nothing to prevent her from going into his room to stand by his bed and look down at his face, so like his father's that she felt she was seeing Lou as the little boy she had never known. But as Luke grew older she could no longer find excuses for her unnecessary presence at his bedside. So she would stand outside the door, listening, listening hard with her heart beating as if she did something unpardonable or shameful, for a small noise which would assure her that he was there, just behind the door, alive. Later she found a solution. She furnished the room next to the nursery, which had become his study, as an upstairs library in which she did her reading and work. Luke could see the light gleaming under the door and come in for a late cup of tea and a little intimate talk.

The war put an end to all that. Left Norah without compensation, alone with frustration, anxiety and restlessness. Again she took to walking around the hill and through the large house. And people said, "How gallant she is. Her only son. If anything happens to him it will be the end of her. Why, she has lived only for him."

Colonel Richardson, friend and adviser, had the same fear. He had served in the First World War and had become friendly with Lou Sedley in France. He had been in love with Norah. When Lou died he came immediately and had remained "just to lend a helping hand."

He was slightly over middle age when Luke went away, sturdily built, not very tall, but because he carried himself so erectly he gave the impression of height and power. His gray hair was cropped short, his face always seemed tanned. He smoked a pipe, was an excellent shot, a fairly good horseman and knew a great deal about politics and business. Norah accepted his helping hand. It was comfortable to have him around and, in very many ways, profitable.

During those years of war he had watched her carefully, cautiously, unobtrusively. Not once could he detect the slightest sign of fear in her. So he grinned to himself when he heard people speak of her as being gallant and brave. He knew that she was neither, but simply convinced that nothing could happen to Luke. So certain, indeed, that she was entirely spared the torture of doubt.

And nothing happened to Luke. Except perhaps that he stayed away longer than he needed to. A whole year in Europe in civil service.

She had taken a sleeping powder the night before in fear that otherwise she might lie awake all those hours which still separated her from Luke. Now she felt luxuriously drowsy with sleep and happiness. She lay very quietly in her large bed.

Luke, she said to herself, Luke, Luke, Luke. For a second she closed her eyes in an effort to see him better as she remembered him. Tall and young and straight. So like his father. A shadow crossed her face.

From outside her door came a small noise. Lying motionless, she watched Hattie open the door gently, balancing a little tray.

"It's all right, Hattie. I'm awake."

Hattie did not look up, but a smile began to blossom between the many deep wrinkles around her mouth, spreading over her face while she poured the tea. "You didn't fool me for a moment, Miss Norah." Then the laughter broke in her throat.

And Norah, sitting up in bed, reaching out for the cup, began to laugh too. For a minute the two women—Norah Sedley in her white long-sleeved nightgown and the old Negress in her pink uniform—sharing a happiness seemed strangely alike. It wasn't so much that life had treated Hattie much as it had treated her mistress—she, too, had lost her husband while still young—as that she knew what it meant to be lonely, lonely and proud.

"Drink your tea," Hattie said, "while it's hot." She went to the bathroom and turned on the water.

When she came back she carried the blue dress over her arm. Mrs. Sedley had made a special trip into New York a week ago to buy it. As she looked at it now it annoyed her suddenly that Hattie, without having been told, should have guessed what she had planned to wear on this day. She shook her head.

There are people in life, and there are many of them, whom you will have to help as long as they live. They will never be able to stand alone.
—SIR WILLIAM OSLER: A Way of Life.
(The Remington-Putnam Book Co.)

"Put out a white linen suit. And I can manage alone."

Hattie knew better than to answer back or question. She turned away quietly, realizing that her mistress wanted to be alone, ashamed to be too deeply understood. Hattie went out of the room.

Blue, thought Norah Sedley as she had thought before, his favorite color. He must not know how much I care.

When she came downstairs she saw through the wide window of the hall a car parked in the driveway. For a second she caught her breath. It couldn't be Luke—not yet.

"The colonel, ma'am. He's out on the terrace."

"Oh, yes, of course—another cup, Briggs."

She had wanted so much to be alone, undisturbed. A petulant anger rose in her. She stood motionless, fighting for control. From outside she could hear the sound of steps on the flagstoned terrace. I'm being childish, she thought. She moved quickly.

"Good morning, good morning."

"Good morning, my dear," the colonel answered. "I just came by to ask about your plans for the day. Are you going into New York or are you going to wait here at home for Luke?"

She hadn't been sure what she would actually do, but now, when the colonel asked, she knew. "I am going to the office as usual. Sit down, won't you?"

"It's completely unnecessary. I can put the Banner to bed myself, and the Daily. . . . No, Briggs, you know I never take sugar."

Norah Sedley smiled. "You're not telling me that my presence in the office is superfluous, are you? There is no reason why I should stay out today. It would be silly to go into New York. He'll call as soon as he arrives. I'll just park the car at the junction as I have always done, and he'll pick me up at the office."

As he has always done upon coming home, the colonel thought. I should have known better—of course she would want to keep it that way.

Luke did not want to talk to them. He didn't want to be asked to sit down, to have to shake hands and answer questions. He drew back quickly, but remained leaning against the door, moving slightly and in perfect balance with the swinging platform.

The countryside had changed. The tender lines of hills slid into the horizon. Luke lifted his eyes. Just small hills, nothing grand, nothing impressive, and yet ——

"It's lovely, isn't it?" Someone he had not noticed before spoke. It was a girl standing opposite him. Though she had been the first to speak, she did not look at him, but kept her head turned, gazing out.

"Sure is."

"Yes," she said, and in spite of the racket of the wheels he could hear her sigh.

From out of the corner of his eye he took a look at her, covertly. Blondish-brownish hair tied in a knot at the nape of her neck. Several wisps of hair, not quite long enough to go into the bun, stuck out, moving like small blades of grass in the draft. The tip of her nose was shiny, the powder blown away. He couldn't see the color of her eyes, only the line of straight long brows cutting into a rounded forehead. Suddenly she, too, seemed familiar, to belong to the train. Even her sigh, quiet, calm, an expression of enchantment rather than that of panicky frustration. When he looked again she was gone. He breathed deeply, filling his lungs with the air of the fields and the trees and the wind from the hills and the smoke of the engine. He was going home—for good.

The train pulled into the junction. Luke jumped to the ground. The shriek of the engine, the squeal of wheels and suddenly everything very quiet except for the motors being started on the lot. He mounted the steep staircase which led from the tracks to the station office.

Old Aswell hailed him. "Welcome home, son, welcome home."

Aswell somehow had always been old, or seemed old to everyone, even when he had first come to take over as stationmaster. There were no secrets about him. His laziness, his goodheartedness, his moodiness, his terrific appetite and the pleasure he found in drinking. He refused to give information about trains over the telephone when people rang up, for were there not timetables given away free which anyone could take and read? On Sundays he wouldn't go to the office, but he wouldn't drink either. Sunday was supposed to be a day of rest, and Aswell liked to rest. And he wouldn't answer questions which bored him, nor would he dress properly. He should have been fired, but people liked him, put up with him because his eccentricities amused them.

"It's good to see you," said Luke, and held the old man's paw between his fingers.

"Your mother parked the car here this morning. It's still the 'Forty-one, son. And the left rear wheel is finicky. My, Luke, let me have a look at you. Haven't changed a bit, have you!" Aswell stepped back, blinking for a clearer vision. "Know what you look like? Your old man. That's what I said to myself when I saw you coming up those stairs. I said to myself, 'If that isn't Lou Sedley coming up there.' Fine man he was, son."

Luke walked slowly, fitting his speed to the old man's heavy, uncertain steps.

"Taking over at the paper now, I guess," Aswell said. "Well, good luck, Luke."

Luke slid into the seat, turned the key and suddenly another smell came to him. A clean and stimulating smell. Eau de Cologne. The only scent Norah ever used. The world, the clean, lovely, problemless world which he sometimes had doubted still existed, was around him again. The world Norah had built for him and kept going in spite of everything.

It was only a mile and a half into Easterly. The old station wagon ran smoothly along the broad highway, across the bridge, past the corner church and into the crowded main street. The supermarket. The movie house, the ice-cream parlor, the hardware store, the courthouse. Left now and into the side street. The low building of the plant and the white clapboard house which looked rather like the home of a retired man and yet was filled with life and its problems, the smell of ink and glue and the clatter of typewriters. Most of its windows stood open. Behind one, Luke could see lights already burning, blue blazing bulbs hanging from old-fashioned high ceilings. A man in shirt sleeves, a green shade protecting his eyes. At his back a door opening, a woman entering the room —— The brake under Luke's foot screeched. The car came to an abrupt stop.

If the appearance of the people on both sides of the car shakes your confidence in the future of democracy; if, while your eye travels along those two deadly parallels of blank-featured human latitude, you mutter to yourself, "Blood will tell and, after all, class systems are necessary," and wonder what the world will come to when it is left to the plain people, such exceedingly plain people, for example, as those five awful ones nearest the door; and if, as six more of them get in, each with a face like a boiled potato, you begin to distrust the whole foundation of popular rights, even trial by jury, even habeas corpus; if, I say, this sort of thing happens to you now and again, as no doubt it does, there is always an easy means of consolation. Photographs of European royal families were published every week during the war, and can be obtained from the files of the newspaper supplements. Clip them and paste them properly, and they will cure this phase of democratic melancholy. My own collection of royal personages—and I have no reason to think the photographs inaccurate—makes every morning subway trip seem like a royal progress. —From THE MARGIN OF HESITATION by Frank Moore Colby.

The library had always been Luke's favorite room, as once, long ago, it had been Lou Sedley's. Three walls were lined with books. The ceiling was low, heavy beams, aged and worm-eaten, running across. A huge fireplace rose between the two bay windows. Lou Sedley had rebuilt it himself with the stones he found on his land. Above it hung his portrait.

"Thank you, Briggs," Luke said as the butler came in and set down the tray. He said it a little impatiently, for he wanted to be alone, alone with the portrait of his father, before Norah came down to join him.

Luke turned to the painting. It was not a great painting, as far as the stroke of the brush went, but it was frightening in its grasp of Lou Sedley. Frightening that anyone else could recognize a man's soul in its complicated entirety and hold it, for futures unknown, pinned to a canvas. Luke had always been slightly shocked by it.

Strange, he thought now, it's dad all right. Exactly as I remember him, and yet —— He remembered suddenly old Aswell's words: "Know what you look like? Your old man." He stepped back and switched on the ceiling light. The light hit the painting with full force, exaggerating the strong lines of bone, wiping away the wild dark tenderness of the eyes, the gay, sweet curve of the lips, drawing it together in only one expression, that of reckless determination.

exception, but the general attitude and, in particular, the general attitude of America. You have a beautiful outlet—a far better chance here than anywhere else."

"I guess you are right," Luke said.

The sleepless nights he had spent thinking fell away; those frustrated hours, when suddenly the urge to find a sense in all that was going on had made him tired, sullen, exhausted, angrily determined to find a way to help, fell away. What Norah said made sense. She somehow always made sense.

Briggs' steps outside the door, a gentle knock. "Dinner is served, ma'am."

Norah remained motionless on the window bench. "Luke," she said, "come here. Look at the moon."

A full moon stood big and round at the bottom of the hill. Already its light caught some of the cherry trees in bloom. He did not speak, and she knew that he was thinking of the many nights he had seen a rising moon shine on destruction, for some of which he himself had been responsible.

"It's over," she said gently. "It's over, Luke. You must not think of yesterday. Think of tomorrow. Not that you should forget, but don't dwell on it."

"I don't think I'll ever forget, Norah."

"But you've tried to help since; you did a good job. Go to Washington as you planned—see what they tell you—but I assure you, you have a tremendous task right here."

She went out of the library quickly, leaving the door open behind her. Luke could see her slim fine figure in the long floating gown enter the stream of light and vanish. All doubts left him. It surprised him that Norah should have sensed what he had not known consciously himself. Strangely, her words, her point of view made it simple to see what he must do.

THE cemetery, at the bottom of the hill, lay precisely halfway between the big house and the village. When Luke stopped the station wagon he saw another car parked in front of the gate. Shabby and open, with most of its blue paint gone, and the glass of one headlight broken. They should be taken off the roads, he thought. He pushed the gate open, still frowning with disapproval.

In the left corner was his father's grave. A small, black marble headstone, very near to the wall, as if, even in death, Lou Sedley had wanted to be as close as possible to the tumult of life: LUKAS SEDLEY, 1891–1929.

As Luke's eyes traveled across the chiseled letters, he abruptly was annoyed that he had not driven on. During the last few days, ever since he had come down here with Norah, he had, somehow, wanted to return alone.

Without lifting his eyes, he knew that another visitor was looking at him. He turned in defiance. There, leaning against the part of the wall over which the ramblers made a spot of dusty color, sat a girl. A book on her knees, an old shaggy-coated dog stretched at her feet and a basket filled with strawberries next to her. She wore denims; her shirt stood open at her throat and one trouser leg was rolled up above her knee. The bare leg was tanned as were her face and arms. She was braiding her hair, which was straight and blondish brown. Her whole coloring, hair and skin so much like an autumn leaf, brown with dots of gold in it, and the washed-out blue of her pants and shirt blended into the high pale blue of a June sky.

The ease of her posture, her body relaxing against the wall, her book, the strawberries, the dog—all this in the graveyard annoyed him. This was no place to hold a picnic. The frown on his forehead deepened. He took a step forward.

Suddenly she smiled. "I like coming here," she said, as if she felt his need for an explanation of her presence. "It's so lovely, isn't it? So few graves. Only eleven. It always reassures me. Country graveyards do that. They give me the illusion that just a very few people die." She laughed a little, embarrassed now. "I guess I just like life. I don't really know why, but ——" She stopped, lowered her head for a moment, blushing, and then looked up at Luke again. "My mother is buried here."

Luke saw the bunch of fresh flowers, which he had failed to notice before, next to where she sat, beside a small gray stone, with the inscription:

ELISABETH FENTON, 1902–1929.

"My father died the same year," he said. "I am Luke Sedley."

He sat down on the wall, not far away from her. Where her hair was parted at one side he could see the thin white line of division running a little crookedly. Her left ear lobe, caught in a ray of sunshine, looked frail and pink and soft like the petal of an exquisite rose. Somehow, though he had always been around girls and liked them, he had never been really touched by one. Compared with his Norah, girls had seemed so blatant, so stupid. They just didn't get under his skin. He felt strangely aware that this girl was different and he was curious about her.

"I think I've met you," she said, shoving the basket of strawberries over so that he could reach them.

Luke laughed, for he had been prepared to use the same approach. "On the three-forty," he said, "a few weeks ago."

"No, I don't remember having seen you on a train. Or maybe I did. I was all dizzy with happiness when I came out here—I wouldn't know. But this was long before then. During one spring you rode with us to school."

The spring after his father's death when, for a short while, he had gone to school in town, and sometimes, when Mrs. Sedley couldn't pick him up in time, he had been allowed to ride home with the other kids. He could remember pigtailed little girls and rough, sunburned boys.

"But you are not from here, Miss, Miss"—his eyes searched the stone on her mother's grave—"Miss Fenton?"

"Liz," she said. "Liz. Elisabeth Fenton. No, I am not from here, in a way. But mother's people were. And we used to spend quite a bit of time here. You see, my father was in the Navy and mother hated the city. She needed trees to be happy—or so my grandfather used to tell me."

She took one of the berries, a big one, held it up, then picked off the little green leaves and poked it into her mouth.

"I picked them myself," she said. "There are lots of them in my garden. They need care, though. The whole place needs care."

HER voice was like the sound of a brook. Even, clear. A little brook in the woods with high-stemmed ferns growing along it. He did not want her to stop talking. It was such simple talk—like children trying to find out about each other, innocently aware of their indiscretion and curiosity, but driven by the instinctive need to know where and how to place one another.

"And how did you remember me?"

She looked up at him gravely. Then she shrugged her shoulders. "I don't know. I watched you coming through the gate. Just something in the way you moved, I suppose."

"I just came home," he said.

"To stay?"

"I think so. How about you? I mean, are you going to stay around here—live out here?"

She sighed. "I don't know yet. I'd like to. You see, my grandfather used to own a farm, then he had to sell. Now only a small house and a few acres are left. He left it to me. He died a few months ago."

Luke slid down from the wall out alongside her as if, by bri closer, he would make it easier continue talking about herself. know yet?" he asked, proddin

Then one night, sitting around a barbecue fire, Mrs. Cardell seized a sudden lull to make herself heard. "Luke Sedley," she said, her voice high and shrill from overuse, "now that you're back and settled, when are you going to marry that pretty Celia Young?" Mrs. Cardell was a plump woman, mother of six boys and the owner of a chain of stores.

Norah Sedley looked up from where she sat on the lawn. She was in the shadows, but Luke, close to the fire, stood in full view of everybody. She could see the abrupt movement of his shoulders and knew how startled he was.

"Celia?" Luke said. "Celia—why, she is a sweet girl."

"Now don't be shy." Eliza Cardell giggled archly.

From the darkness another voice cut in. "I'll bet Luke found himself a girl abroad, didn't you, Luke? I remember during the first two years you wrote quite regularly, and then ——" The voice broke off and somebody said:

"Giving yourself away, Ann?"

There was the slight scurry of feet running across the lawn.

Ann Lowry, thought Norah Sedley. I didn't know they were corresponding.

She saw Luke get up, walk away in the direction of the running steps. Mrs. Cardell laughed. She was satisfied. As long as Ann Lowry had hopes for Luke, there was no fear for Howard, her oldest son.

Colonel Richardson lifted himself out of his chair and went over to Norah. "He'll never marry," he said in a low voice. "You're too steep competition for those girls."

"Nonsense," Norah told him quickly. "He's just like Lou, can't help breaking hearts before he makes up his mind." She laughed softly.

THE colonel sat down, staring at the fire. What a life. Loving a woman who, after seventeen years, was still in love with her dead husband, whose only real emotion belonged to her son because he was Lou Sedley's son.

"Would you take me home?" Mrs. Sedley's voice came from his left. "I'd better not wait for Luke," she added, her soft moist mouth breaking into a smile—that heartbreakingly sweet smile of hers. The colonel could see her teeth, white and even, shimmering in the half-dark. "Our hostess is playing table tennis," the low, cool voice continued. "I asked Eliza to tell Luke that we've gone on." She put her hand lightly on the colonel's arm. "Let's just slip away—I am quite tired tonight."

"Of course," he said, "of course," and knew by instinct and because he loved her so much that she wasn't tired at all.

She had already undressed, slipped into a dressing gown and settled down with a book in the upstairs study when she heard Luke's car roar up the road. After a little while she could hear his steps on the flagstoned terrace.

He stopped, seeing the lighted window, and whistled. "It's nice out," he said, his voice low. "Too tired to keep me company for a while?"

"Not really!" She relished the whispered intimacy almost physically.

When she came out onto the terrace the night air, cool and damp, soothed her at once. She stretched out on a garden couch. She wanted Luke to be the first to speak, but when he didn't she finally asked:

"Did you see those appalling reports from abroad today?"

"Any occupation army is doomed to deteriorate," he answered mechanically. He moved in his chair, whistled a few bars of a melody she couldn't make out and said, "You know, I had quite forgotten about young Celia. It's awful."

"What is awful?"

"The way life works—or me. She was in love with me, she told me so and I kissed her once in a while. I liked to kiss her, and then, tonight, for a moment, I couldn't even remember her face."

Norah Sedley stiffened. A chill ran along her spine. "I liked to kiss her and tonight I couldn't even remember her face." Men, she

POT ROAST À LA NEW ORLEANS

4 lb. pot roast
½ teaspoon each of pepper, ground cloves, mace, allspice
1 tablespoon salt
1 large onion
1 or more garlic cloves
½ cup Wesson Oil
2 tablespoons lemon juice
1 tablespoon vinegar
1½ cups tomato juice or canned tomatoes
2 or 3 bay leaves

Wipe meat with damp cloth. Mix dry ingredients and rub into cut surfaces. Chop onion and garlic cloves fine, add lemon juice, vinegar, and ¼ cup only of Wesson Oil. Pour mixture over meat, turning several times so that all parts are well covered. Let soak in refrigerator 5 hours. Turn occasionally. When ready to cook, sprinkle with flour. Heat ¼ cup Wesson Oil in heavy pan over high heat. Sear meat on all sides until dark brown. Reduce heat. Add liquid in which meat was soaked, tomatoes, bay leaves. Cover. Simmer 3 hours. Add carrots, onions, and peeled potatoes 45 minutes before roast is done. Serve with thickened gravy. Try this dish. You'll see why famous cooks everywhere cook with Wesson Oil!

ALWAYS use delicate Wesson Oil for salads, for frying... and whenever the recipe calls for melted shortening. Remember when it's Wesson Oil you just pour to measure, pour to mix. So very handy. Is it any wonder more American women buy Wesson Oil than any other brand of salad oil?

WESSON'S MEAL-IN-ITSELF SALAD!

1 teaspoon salt
¼ teaspoon black pepper
½ teaspoon sugar
4 to 5 garlic cloves, split or 1 small onion, grated
⅔ cup Wesson Oil
½ teaspoon dry mustard
¼ teaspoon thyme
Dash cayenne pepper
⅓ cup vinegar (wine or cider)

Put all ingredients in a jar. (If you prefer, use onion instead of garlic.) Shake vigorously. Now make a dozen or so croutons by cutting white bread into ½ inch cubes. Sauté cubes in hot Wesson Oil until they are toasted. Drain on paper. Place enough greens for four in salad bowl. Break a fresh egg over them and toss until every leaf is coated. Add generous quantity of grated Parmesan cheese (or any mild cheese) and croutons. Toss once more in this wonderful, new Wesson Oil Dressing. Please note: unobtrusive, delicate Wesson Oil lets you enjoy all the delicious salad flavors and all the wonderful seasonings. Never drowns them under a heavy, oily taste!

thought furiously, resentfully, they are all the same! She made an effort to speak lightly.

"Why awful?" she said. "She didn't mean much to you, and kissing is pleasant. Then the war, you were away ——"

Luke began to whistle again. That's no excuse, he thought. One cannot blame everything on the war. Something is wrong with me. Oh, I don't know. She didn't mean anything to me, Norah is right there. Maybe that was why—but Ann Lowry's letters did. Or did they?

"She wrote first—Ann, I mean—when I was still down in Georgia, training. I answered and she kept it up. Nice letters too. Intelligent. But I never thought she thought that I —— I never did."

Mrs. Sedley smiled. "You'd better be careful, Luke. Young people like to be in love for love's sake. Don't take it too seriously."

"Love for love's sake." His mind lingered on the phrase. It wasn't that. No, it wasn't that, or, if it had been during the years of growing up, it was that way no longer.

She heard his suppressed yawn. She felt well now, warm, certain. "Let's turn in," she said.

On Saturdays, Aswell started drinking as soon as the 5:45 pulled out of the junction, and continued drinking, leisurely, measuredly until the last train at 12:15 had rolled by. Not at home though. On Saturdays he methodically went to the Spot.

The Spot was not a fancy affair. Just a big bare room with a long bar, an icebox, a soft-drink chest, a juke box, two or three tables with chairs. There was a shuffleboard which was a real money-maker.

A man and his wife were having an argument. Finally the husband picked up his hat and started for the office. "Oh, all right," he said to his wife, "I guess you are right and I am wrong, as you generally are." His wife looked after him affectionately. "How nice of him to put it that way," she reflected. Then she reflected some more. She had heard what he said, all right—but did she really know what he meant?
—VOLTA REVIEW.

Luke came in. The smoke of cheap cigars, pipes, cigarettes rose like a blanket of fog. All the tables were crowded and someone had deposited his sleeping offspring on the shuffleboard. The bar was lined two or three deep.

"H'ya, Superman," the girl behind the counter hailed Luke.

"H'ya, beautiful," he answered mechanically as he recognized Gertie, the owner's daughter. The last time he had seen her she had been a thirteen-year-old kid.

"Move over," Gertie ordered a young fellow sprawling on a bar stool. "Come on, get going." She pulled out a dirty towel from under the bar and wiped a square of mahogany clean. "When are you taking me to the movies, Luke? I'm a big girl now."

Luke noticed heads turning toward him. He sat down. "Name the day, Gertie."

She smiled, pleased. "That's the kind of guy I like. You always keep your promise."

Luke was sitting beside Aswell. He noted with amusement that Aswell was drinking boilermakers. He hadn't even noticed Luke.

"Gimme some change, Gert," a man called, and Gertie produced some nickels. Then she was called away again and the juke box began to blare. Two couples started to dance, the baby on the shuffleboard woke up with a startled pitiful cry. Behind him two men were discussing the subsidies on milk. Luke smiled. It was as he had remembered it. Nothing had changed.

Suddenly Aswell fell on him. "Sorry to offend," said Aswell. "Only meant to—well, you wouldn't take my advice anyhow."

Luke reached for the match the old man was fumbling with, lit his cigarette. "What is it, Aswell?"

Aswell came closer, putting his mouth to Luke's ear. "Leave her alone. Leave her alone, I tell you."

"Sure."

"You're just talking. I know. You think I am a drunken old bum. Well—do me a favor, will you, Mr. Sedley?"

"Why, sure," said Luke.

"Just leave her alone, that's all. Promise?"

"Okay, chum."

ozen fruits put up at home _ this easy way !

Ve want to tell you here, about something that s really new. It is a new way to put up fruits t home that is "simply out of this world." Jothing you ever tasted can compare with it, nd it is as simple as sewing on a button.

All made possible by a new food discovery—weetose Syrup.

Just put your raw fruit into a jar—or any turdy, watertight container with a tight-fiting lid—cover the fruit with Sweetose Syrup —put on the lid and freeze. That's all!

With berries—just wash the whole fruit and ut it into sterilized containers. With peaches r apricots you must, of course, peel and seed he fruit. In handling these fruits you must vork rapidly because they discolor quickly. But once they are completely covered with the syrup—they will not discolor. (No artificial preservatives needed.)

Then—next January or February—when you thaw out your fruit see if you don't find the berries plump and fresh in color—the peaches tasting like fresh peaches. No other frozen fruit will compare with what you can put up at home.

If you do not have a freezer box, just put up the fruit at home and have the freezer locker plant in your neighborhood freeze and store it.

Just one word of caution: Don't USE SUGAR OR SUGAR SYRUP. Sweetose Syrup is a patented invention made from corn—its action on fruit is entirely different from ordinary sugar. It glazes the fruit—preserves the color —prevents discoloration—penetrates the cells —helps to keep it plump—and permeates the fruit with a delightful mild sweetness. Just send us the coupon and we will send you complete directions for freezing, thawing, and serving Sweetose frozen fruits.

EVERYWHERE, women say that the new Revere Ware Pressure Cooker is truly a new Revere "kitchen jewel"—the most remarkable cooking utensil they've ever seen.

It is the only one made of stainless steel and clad with the thick copper bottom that made Revere Ware famous. It's so simple—you can put the lid on with just one motion of one hand! There are no parts to come off or lose. It gives such sure-fire results! There's no guess work. The gauge is self indicating. You always know with what pressure you are cooking.

The Revere Ware Pressure Cooker is beautiful—and so easy to keep beautiful! It resists staining and pitting. It is easy to preserve its silvery luster. In every way, it is as great an improvement over pressure cookers as Revere copper-clad stainless steel ware was over ordinary cooking utensils. Look for the trade mark on the thick copper bottom.

white and pink and red. Between the house and the fence would be a stretch of lawn. The house would be ——

But he knew he'd never been here before. With a shrug he remembered that once before he had had an experience like this, that other people had it. Luke began to run.

After two hundred yards he could see the clearing, the house, the hedge, the fence, the hollyhocks. He began to laugh, embarrassed and at the same time pleased.

He came out of the wood and the sun was hot and strong in the clearing. The house was larger than he remembered or had known in the secret depths of his mind. In the shade of a wide-crowned old walnut tree lay the dog. He began to bark, gently first and without moving, then as Luke came closer, louder, baring his teeth. It was the same shaggy old dog that had been with Liz. Luke could see that he was blind in his left eye.

"What's the matter, feller?" he said soothingly.

The dog growled. From inside came the clatter of dishes. Luke whistled. After a moment he could see the girl, peering through one of the open windows. Her neck and shoulders were bare. She wore only what looked like the halter of a play suit. Luke couldn't tell, but he saw her reach backward and then her long brown arms slipped into the sleeves of a shirt.

"Who is it?"

"I," he said stupidly. "Luke Sedley."

"Oh, come in!" She turned away from the window.

He stood in front of the white-painted gate, waiting for her to appear at the door, to welcome him, but all she did was call again.

"Never mind Brownie; just go along the hedge. I'm in the kitchen."

Luke walked along the hedge, the dog still growling at his heels. A small cement path led toward the house. There was a glassed-in back porch with a few beach chairs, obviously newly painted, a lawn mower, a pair of scissors, a hoe and a shovel.

THE kitchen was littered with piles of dirty dishes and pots and pans. Liz Fenton stood near the sink, wearing a bathing suit, and above it her washed-out blue denim shirt.

"I'm cleaning up," she said. "Sorry it looks so awful. But I had some visitors and we didn't want to waste the morning. So I left everything till after I had driven them to the station. Sit down, won't you?"

Luke sat down. He took it all in with one look. The old-fashioned icebox, the wood stove, the sink. A small squeaking noise made him turn his head. She was working the handle of the pump which spouted directly into the basin.

"No running water," she said. "Only a cistern and this thing here. If I stay, I think I'll sink a well."

He was unreasonably, unjustly upset. If, he thought.

"And," she said, "how have you been? You can help me dry, if you want to be useful." With one thumb she pointed over her shoulder to where a dish towel hung at the wall. He pulled it from the rack.

"I've missed you," he said.

She turned around quickly, smiled. "That's nice of you."

He wanted to tell her not to laugh at him, to tell her that he meant it, that it wasn't just an ordinary polite phrase. He wanted to tell her about his strange feeling of having walked up the road before.

"You know," he said, and then abruptly knew that it wasn't necessary to explain anything. They already had passed that phase. "There is a dance tonight just across the river. Years ago the place used to be a factory, then someone turned it into a dance hall. It is quite amusing and friendly. A lot of Poles come there, and Italians and some of the Swedes and Germans. Folk music and folk dances."

"I'd love to go another night," she said. "But I am horribly tired today. We made it quite a party last night. Mind?"

He didn't answer, just shook his head. For a while they worked silently, Liz scrubbing the plates, the cups, the knives and forks and spoons and rinsing the glasses in fresh water. Luke drying, carrying the dishes over to the table. When she was through, she began putting them away in a corner cupboard and then, wiping the stove, the basin, the table, she talked in snatches.

"Brownie is a stray dog. Isn't he sweet? I found him up here one night when I got home and he just stayed on. How do you like my garden? There's a lot of work in it. The zinnias should come in August, shouldn't they? I even put in some morning-glory around the porch. It's too late, I know, but perhaps —— What can I offer you? Coffee?"

She measured coffee beans from a bag into a little mill and passed it to him to turn the handle while she took out some cups and put the water on the stove.

"I love a kitchen," she said. "I never really had one of my own. Mostly just a two-burner, hidden away in a closet or behind a screen, or a kitchenette. Depressing things."

"Have you made up your mind to stay?"

She looked at him. "Not yet. You see, I've promised myself a long holiday in the country. Oh, for years now. You know how people dream, particularly in a city."

"What did you do?"

"Nothing exciting. Secretarial work in civil service. I started in Chicago, then New York and during the last two years in [illegible]."

The fragrance of coffee gradually filled the air.

"Then grandfather left me this place and a little money. I'd like to keep it. If I can get a job in the neighborhood I will stay."

How about winter, he wondered, when the roads are icy? The snowplow only clears the highways. She'll never get in and out through the woods.

On the front porch was a swing, creaking when it moved under their weight. They sat, sipping the coffee, looking out across the lawn toward the hollyhocks.

Again he felt the peace he had felt before. He wondered why he could be with her and feel at the same time alone and complete and yet not alone. He tried to catch her glance, but she was looking away, sitting very [illegible].

"Liz," he said, "Liz—has there ever been anyone—is there someone ——"

She did not turn her head, she did not reproach him, but she did not smile. "Not now."

He was painfully aware of his need to know. He tried to control himself, gripping the chain of the swing. It cut into his palm, the swing squeaked. She turned and he saw for the first time that her eyes were blue, very light, very pale blue.

"And before?" he said.

"It's over."

"But ——"

"It's gone," she said, facing him squarely. "And it shouldn't bother you. It shouldn't come between us. Should it?"

The desperation left him, the urge to question her. "I ——" he started and changed his mind. "Do you mind very much?"

"Your questions?" She shook her head. "No. I don't think you're just being curious. You can ask me anything you want to." She smiled. "You can," she repeated, "but—but ——"

"What?"

"It isn't important. Not really." The smile went out of her eyes, her jaw set.

He moved away slightly. "You are tough," he said.

She was very silent, and a frown appeared on her forehead, then vanished. "Perhaps."

He waited for her to go on, to add something, to excuse or at least explain herself.

she thought of Luke. Luke was ne, she thought impersonally. Hand-ne and attractive men, men who had er to dances or to baseball and foot-nes or to the movies, men she had worked with and flirted with. Men who had loved her, or who had said so. Some of these men she had liked. But it was different with Luke.

She tried to remember exact sensations of the past, and knew that this was different. Like a candle, she thought, exactly like a candle, a fat yellow candle of beeswax with an untouched wick, that's me. A candle which has never been lighted and now suddenly it is; he is the flame and now the candle is burning. Steadily. If we're lucky nothing will blow it out.

SHE heard the wind rising. She watched the first lightning race across her windows and, in its flash, the branches of the big walnut tree clutching at the wind.

That's how love is, she thought. It just happens. It happened to me this afternoon when I turned around and saw him standing there in the garden.

She heard the thunder and mechanically counted the seconds between the next lightning and the next growl. Finally the rain came, hard and harsh, a wall of water falling thick and invincible, swaying in the storm. Liz got up to close the window.

"Sleep well," Luke said, and for a moment Mrs. Sedley stood forlornly in the wide hall of her house, listening to the steps of her son growing fainter and fainter in the long passage which led to the library.

Lou! she thought as she went slowly up the graceful, curving staircase. Like Lou, going into the library, closing the door, closing a door between her and himself, to be alone.

On the second floor there was a banister, a quadrangle of deep brown oak. Mrs. Sedley stood leaning against this banister. Only one small light was burning, on the side table, an English silver candlestick converted into a lamp. Its oblong green shade allowed only a limited pool of light, and in its shadow the night seemed enormous. The night with its dark mystery, its pregnant silence, was like a giant noiselessly attacking her. How often had she stood like this, motionless, watching, listening into the deep sleeping quiet of the big house.

Tonight she felt the same agony gnawing at her heart. Time had passed and Lou was dead and Norah Sedley had grown older, but the pain was still the same. No less sharp, bearable only because Norah had built up a resistance to it through Luke, because he had become the drug, the morphia which softened the torture so that she could take it. But with Luke locking himself away in the library, with Luke's need to be alone, she ran out of the anesthetic.

Norah Sedley had never been able to trace the moment when it had begun in Lou Sedley: his need, his feeling for another woman. She simply hadn't noticed it and perhaps, very probably, Lou Sedley hadn't noticed it in the beginning either. At first she had thought that it was just another of his sporadic infatuations. But Betty had turned out to be different from all the other women Lou had kissed and desired for a moment. Betty lasted more than a moment, a week, a month. Betty lasted longer than a lifetime.

Betty, Norah Sedley whispered to herself, her mouth twisting in a silent cry.

SUB ROSA

While this phrase means something revealed to be kept in strict confidence, actually it refers quite literally to statements made under a rose. According to a Greek myth, Cupid gave Harpocrates, the god of silence, a rose to bribe him not to betray the indiscretions of Venus. The rose thus became an emblem of silence. During the Middle Ages it was customary to include some sculptured or frieze work on the ceilings of banqueting halls to remind guests ever so tactfully that matters discussed there were secret and private. Since they were "sub rosa," they were not to be repeated. Because roses are the symbol of silence, consecrated roses are sometimes carved above the confessional in the Roman Catholic churches. In modern German dining rooms the presence of roses as part of the decorative work suggests silence, not so much with reference to soup as to the principle that nothing said there should go beyond the walls.

If she could only have understood what Lou saw in her. So plain, so unimportant, so without any obvious attraction. If Betty had been beautiful or witty, it would have been easier to understand, easier to take. But to be discarded for someone who was a nobody made it all an insult.

In the darkness Norah saw Lou as she had seen him the very first time, that winter of 1918 when, with the end of the war, her parents had decided to spend the season in Washington to introduce her to society. Norah was eighteen, in a lacy white dress, holding a bouquet of tiny pink roses and forget-me-nots, staring at a young man with a leonine head.

"Darling, isn't he?" Marge, her best friend, whispered.

Then Lukas Sedley was surrounded: dowagers, young matrons, senators, congressmen asking questions, issuing invitations, congratulating him. Norah heard his laugh, that full, deep, roaring laugh he had even as a young man. She had just made up her mind to dislike him when he crossed the room with Senator Polk.

"Miss Norah Fair, Mr. Lukas Sedley, one of our most brilliant correspondents."

And he, standing very close, bowed, whispered, "Norah Fair Sedley. How does it sound to you?"

Then they had danced. She hadn't said a word; he was talking all the time, gay, reckless, enchanting nonsense.

"I've watched you now for almost three weeks. You are a good dancer, and you ride very well. Didn't want to talk to you just then. Hadn't quite made up my mind, you know. Wanted to be sure before I told you we are going back to Europe. The Times has finally agreed to send me back. We'll probably go on to Italy, to England, to the Netherlands. I'll show you the whole world. What fun we'll have!"

"I am having great fun right here in Washington and I think America is a wonderful country. I've seen Europe, thanks."

"Isolationist, are you? That's provincial, my dear. When do you think we can be married? Don't laugh. I'm serious."

"I don't want to marry anyone right now—and most certainly not you."

'But, my darling, what a waste. You mu marry sometime—and you'll like bei married to me. You'll be happier than you' ever been. I'm not offering you an ordina love. That's not good enough for you; tha not what you want. I know what you wa Don't tremble so, my darling."

Lou Sedley's. And his eyes looked absently at her, not really seeing her. Her heart called to him and he answered mechanically, shook his head lightly and, instead of coming to her, turned, walked along the passage.

Now Luke had gone into the library, closing a door between her and him. When had it happened to Luke? When?

She thought of the day which had just passed. They had gone to church, they had had early luncheon, then Luke had driven her to the golf links. It was then in the car that she, for the first time, had sensed Luke's preoccupation.

A letter? she wondered. But on Sundays there was no mail. Or had she arrived? From abroad? But there had been no telephone call. Where had Luke gone this afternoon—"driving around"?

She moved along the banister, restless with uncertainty. When she was in her own room, for a long time she sat on the edge of her bed, staring at the design of the hooked rug. She didn't think, just sat and stared, feeling without being able to feel any separate emotion. Gradually her feet grew cold and finally she grew aware that she was having chills. Chills on a warm, summer night!

Luke drove up the dirt road next day on his way back from Bethlehem, where he had gone to interview an injured steelworker. When Norah and he had talked the interview over at breakfast he did not plan further than the trip to Bethlehem and back.

He didn't think of seeing her consciously until he crossed the state line and had to wait his turn on the bridge. Until then he thought of what Peterson had said and how articulate and forceful the young man had been. But when he cleared the bridge he knew that he had meant to go, all the time. All during the night and breakfast and the ride to the paper and while he read proof.

Liz sat behind the hollyhocks in the middle of the lawn, some odd pieces of furniture standing around and four copper screens lying in front of her. She was painting their frames. Luke saw the can of white paint, the brushes sticking in an empty tin, the linseed oil and the twig she had used for mixing. She had washed her hair and it was not yet quite dry, its color a little darker where it was still damp. It fell over her bare shoulders like a short thick curtain of gold.

Brownie barked and Luke said, "Hullo."

Liz didn't even turn. "I'm almost through with the second coat and then"—she looked up at him and away, pointing to an open book—"then, I'm going to Peter Hunt everything."

He sat down next to her on the lawn. "What is Peter Hunt?"

"Oh, don't you know? Look at the book. Tommy brought it up. I found all these things in the cellar this morning. He—Hunt—makes all old-fashioned furniture look lovely, just by cutting them down and painting them; it looks quite simple."

Luke watched the pulse of her heart ticking in her throat. Her breath came quickly.

"My kitchen will look like a flower bed—ivy will crawl over the cupboard and forget-me-nots will grow on the chair legs, and on the seats I'll paint big sprawling sunflowers. I like sunflowers, don't you?"

"Liz," he said. "Liz, look at me."

Her hand stopped moving the brush across the small frame, paused in mid-air, once more attempted to distribute the color evenly. Then she put the brush down on the lawn and a big white oily drop dripped upon the green. She looked around before she looked at Luke. Not out of hesitancy, not because she wanted to gain time, but because she wanted a last moment to herself.

"Yes," she said. "Yes?" She was grateful that Luke did not move to draw her close, that he did not reach out for her and touch her. Then, when she felt the moment gone, she turned her head with a gesture of finality.

Luke could see some spots of paint on her forehead where she had wiped her hand carelessly. She was very pale. Their eyes met, holding each other's glance, nearing till each could see only the narrowed iris of the other.

"Yes," he told her. "Yes."

IN RADIO CITY, NEW YORK

Luke went into Mrs. Sedley's office. She was on the wire and motioned to him to pick up the other telephone to listen in. He sat down on the corner of her desk. Mrs. Sedley put one hand over the mouth of the instrument and whispered, "Washington."

For about five minutes both listened to the secretary of their congressman.

Then Norah said, "Thank you very much. Either I or my son will be down to get the follow-up." She leaned back in her chair. "You know, Luke ——" She saw that he was not listening and repeated a little sharply, "Luke!"

The distant look had come into his eyes and she caught herself. She saw him smile, the new smile he had in the past few days, dreamy and tender.

"I forgot to tell you," he said, "I asked a friend to drop in at the house this afternoon."

His voice was even, slow, casual, and yet she could detect the excitement he suppressed. For days now she had waited for him to talk to her about it.

"A friend?"

Luke laughed. "A girl."

Mrs. Sedley held back all the questions she wanted to ask and which she knew were unwise.

"I hope you'll like her. I hope you'll like her very much."

She glanced up into his face. "I can't remember not having liked what you did." She corrected herself. "Or whom you did."

She watched him play with the eraser, throwing it up into the air and catching it on his open palm as if it were a coin. "She's different," he said, "kind of a different girl."

Norah laughed a little. "Pretty?" she asked, just to say something, just so that she would not say the things which must not be said.

His eyes narrowed. "I wouldn't know," he answered slowly, and suddenly a frown of concentration showed on his forehead as if he for the first time tried to imagine her and what she actually looked like or might look like to other people, to her. "I guess so. All girls are pretty somehow, aren't they?" he grinned. "She is quite tall, and blond and blue-eyed—oh, I don't know. Yes, I think she is pretty. I've told her a lot about you."

"Where did you meet her?"

Somehow it seemed silly to say: In the cemetery. "On the train." That was true too.

Norah preferred to look amused. But Luke was not in the mood for a joke or a wisecrack. She said quickly, putting her hand gently on his knee, "I'm sure I will like her."

"I hope you will."

He picked up her hand and rubbed it across his cheek, just for a moment, then he put it back on his knee and looked at her and saw the face which had held so much for him everything until he had met Liz.

Of course she will like Liz, he thought. Of course. She will understand. She has always understood. Then, as he remembered the many occasions in which she had proved her understanding of him, her friendship for him he felt happy again.

"I hope you will," he repeated.

Mrs. Sedley sat motionless in her swivel chair. He's gone, she knew. His rubbing my hand across his cheek was the final gesture of farewell. I haven't brought him up to demonstrate tenderness; whatever tenderness there was in him I have suppressed and now suddenly he can afford tenderness, casually, without being afraid. He is gone. And I am left behind. Liz is dead and Luke is gone and I am alone again. Only a mother now. The mother of Lou's son.

"Well, we'd better get back to work," she said. "If you'd rather not go to Washington I will. Or Richardson might go. We'll see."

Luke went out of the room, and only when the door closed did Mrs. Sedley remember that she had forgotten to ask him the girl's name. She shrugged her shoulders. What did it matter?

She was in the pool. She saw no reason why she should not take her usual dip upon coming home from the office. No reason, no reason at all. Keep everything as always; keep everything as much as possible as it has spite of all her rationalization she had felt so many years ago, when, still safe and secure in the knowledge of their love, she met a girl or woman who for a moment had taken Lou's fancy.

They were coming down the steep grade of the hill, Luke and the girl, walking close, their hands interlinked, swinging their arms like children on their way home from school. She was a spot of pale faded blue between the different shades of green of tree and bush and lawn, blue and brownish gold. She was wearing denims, long pants and a shirt, quite informally. Very informally. There was a curious harmony in the way she moved. Rather slowly. Yet her slowness wasn't heavy or without grace; it was the slowness of complete unconscious certainty, the ability to stretch a moment of happiness into eternities, as if walking alongside Luke over the lawn was something which under no circumstances could be rushed, but tasted to the very last bit.

A woman never forgives anybody who tries to keep her from making a fool of herself over a man.

From What This World Needs, by John W. Raper, copyright 1945 by The World Publishing Company, Cleveland and New York.

As they came nearer Mrs. Sedley could hear the girl laugh. A strange light laugh, as if someone jingled coins, golden coins ringing together. And Luke's answering laugh, deep, low.

Mrs. Sedley had never actually watched Betty and Lou walking hand in hand across the green slope toward the swimming pool, but in those dark lonely nights of hell she had seen them, close to each other, hands intertwined, walking very slowly, luxuriously, laughing.

Oh, no, she said in a whisper. I am seeing things. I am imagining it all Lou is dead. Betty is dead. That's Luke coming toward me—Luke and a girl called Liz.

They were close enough now for her to see Liz's face quite clearly. Not pretty, thought Mrs. Sedley, not at all like Betty. Only her laugh is like Betty's—golden coins hitting upon gold. And now Luke was separating his hand from hers. For a second Liz stood alone, straight and tall. Norah had seen another woman standing exactly that same way. To that woman Norah Sedley had said, "Never." Many, many years ago. And she said it now, even as her mouth broke into a welcoming smile: Never! Never! Never!

A DATE TO REMEMBER...FATHER'S DAY...JUNE 15

Luke's voice: "Norah, here she is. Liz, this is my mother."

"Liz?" Mrs. Sedley repeated, the question in her voice hardly audible, watching the girl, who waited for her to extend her hand. Luke stepped back, smiling, his face one happy grin.

"May I present my future wife, Miss Elisabeth Fenton."

Elisabeth Fenton? Betty Fenton. Liz Fenton. Time swung sharply back. A whole life, years and months and days and everything of what they had held.

"What I would like to know, Lou, is what in the world you see in her. What can you possibly see in Betty Fenton?"

And Lou, tired, exasperated, "You wouldn't understand, Norah. What's the use?"

"Never mind. Just answer my question."

"The other side of the moon."

"The other side of the moon? I don't —— What do you mean?"

"I told you you wouldn't understand. You can't. I don't want to sound mysterious. I mean exactly what I say. The other side of the moon. We, the world, know only the one side of it. But once, when I don't know, maybe in the near future, maybe in centuries, but once mankind will know the other side of the moon. That's how I feel, that's what Betty makes me feel like, as if I were the first to see the other side of the moon."

THE space which separated Mrs. Sedley and Betty Fenton's daughter was no more than a few feet of grass. This space held for Norah Sedley everything she was; to Liz it meant nothing but a distance which should be broken. There was no reason, as far as she could see, why Luke's mother should like her, or be enchanted to find her son suddenly engaged to a perfect stranger. She held out her hand. Mrs. Sedley lifted her head. She caught Luke's face, the eager expectance in his eyes. She opened her arms—a wide graceful gesture of embrace.

"All the happiness in the world . . . to you . . . both."

To Luke and Liz it seemed only natural for Mrs. Sedley to dismiss them shortly after dinner, sweet and kind and tactful. They, in turn, were gracious about it, pretending they really would like to stay with her, but, in the end, they went off together, vanishing in the early summer darkness. And Mrs. Sedley was left alone on the wide stone terrace where Briggs had set the dinner table.

The dishes had been cleared off the wide glass table except for the coffee tray, and, barely aware of what she was doing, Mrs. Sedley poured herself another cup. She was staring at the night moths, reeling between the high hurricane candles, burned halfway down, their bright light secure behind the round glass shelter. Around the centerpiece, a little Dresden shepherdess, Briggs had put water lilies, white and purple. They were already wilting, smelling sharply with their particular foul watery smell. She had always disliked the water lilies Lou had planted in such abundance down at the swimming pool. Candlelight and water lilies and silver, how he had cherished them. Cherished them with the vulgar pride the self-made man took in possession for possession's sake.

She stared at her left hand. Bending, unbending her fingers. A few hours before she had taken the yellow diamond from her finger, slipped it into Luke's hand. "In case you forgot an engagement ring."

The surprise in his eyes, the gratitude. "But isn't that, isn't that—didn't dad give you that ring when you ——"

"That's why."

"So you do like her."

Yes, Lou had given her the ring. Like his son, he had forgotten to buy one. There she had been on the boat, eighteen years old, running away from home, with only an overnight case and Hattie. Hattie who miraculously had appeared when she stepped out of the ten o'clock at Grand Central.

"Where you go I will go," Hattie had said and stuck at her heels. And it had been, Hattie who had said in the small dingy cabin, unpacking Norah's bag, 'No, miss, I certainly do not think highly of the gentleman of your choice. He hasn't even given you a ring."

Lou had heard it. Laughed. At dinner they sat at the captain's table, and directly opposite them a fat charming Dutchwoman from the East Indies. On her right hand a large yellow diamond caught the light of the chandeliers, and Norah's eyes.

"What a lovely stone—I've never seen one like it."

There was no jewelry shop on board the small French steamer, but four days out a yellow diamond appeared on her breakfast tray. Mrs. Van Dam's ring.

"Lou—what in the world—did she sell it to you? Tell me, why don't you tell me!"

And Lou, laughing, amused, had launched into stories about the tricks of Casanova and how he had gambled with a French duke for his wife's famous diamond collar.

"Well, I'm not Casanova—but I'm good at cards. She wanted to play piquet last night. I didn't know the game, but I let her teach me, and, just to prove how good a teacher she was, we settled for the stone against five thousand."

"Oh, no—no—Lou—how can I possibly wear it?"

"Why not? To tell you the truth, if I'd lost we would have had to live on black bread and salt for the next few years."

Now she had given the ring to Liz. The yellow diamond wouldn't look well on Liz. She had no hands for precious jewelry.

I am a little surprised sometimes to find how commonly people suppose that when one is unable to accept their opinions one is therefore necessarily hostile to them. —HAVELOCK ELLIS: Fountain of Life. (Houghton Mifflin Co).

Rather large hands, strong palms and strong long fingers and the back of her hands tanned, freckled. The only thing she could possibly wear would be pearls, round white pearls; they didn't even need to be real. It would not make any difference.

Mrs. Sedley got up. She moved so abruptly that she almost upset her cup. She went quickly into the house and along the dark quiet passage into the library.

How long ago it had happened. Nearly twenty years? As long ago as that? It seemed so much shorter, for the pain was there, just as sharp, the shock just as unexpected. Like only yesterday, like today. Even the setting. For as today, nineteen years ago, she had been left sitting alone at a cleared dining table on the same wide stone terrace. Candlelights and silver and water lilies and Lou lighting his pipe, standing up and, without asking her to join him on his stroll, vanishing into the darkness of the garden.

Then, as today, she had hurried along the quiet dark passage, entered the library. Then, as today, she had curled up on the soft cushions on the bench in the bay window—and after a little while she heard his steps on the flagstones. The window was standing open and Lou was humming as he swung his legs across the low sill.

"It's only me," she said. "I want to talk to you, Lou."

No answer but the swift, agile movements with which he pushed his large handsome body through the window into the room. And suddenly, unexpectedly, she didn't know what to say, where to begin.

"Well?"

"I think you owe me an explanation."

"Perhaps."

"Perhaps? I've waited almost two months now for you to come and talk to me."

"I've tried."

"When?"

"You didn't understand."

"What didn't I understand?"

"Oh, Norah ——"

"'Oh, Norah,'" she mimicked. "Since when do you—since when are you too shy to say what you mean? I am to understand something from the fact that we haven't slept together for months? That's happened before when you were having one of your flings. What I want to know is what didn't I understand?"

The quick, gentle sound of a match being struck, a little cloud of smoke drifting past her. "Norah, please believe me, it is important for us that you believe me. I haven't touched another woman."

"Since when?"

"Since the day we decided on separate bedrooms."

"And you expect me to believe that you haven't made love to a woman in all these months?" She laughed.

"I am not lying to you, Norah. Why should I lie to you? Just take my word."

"How can I? I, who know you so well . . . almost ten years—ten years, Lou. Not you."

She heard him sigh. "You don't understand, Norah."

"What don't I understand? Don't just keep on saying that over and over."

He started pacing the room. But his steps were slow, heavy. After a while he answered. "You'll never understand that I've changed. When we met I was a crazy boy. Crazy about women, and I had been in the midst of it—the war, I mean. And it hit me. Just as it hit quite a few other guys who suddenly realized how short life could be. One had to keep going. Day in, day out. Some drank. Some took dope. Some wenched around. I did. You never understood that it was sex which kept me going, gave me courage, allowed me to take it and come back. And when we met—I loved you, Norah. You were and are so beautiful, and you gave me what I needed. You've kept me going, you've made it possible to get over it."

"Get over what?"

"Over sex obsession."

She laughed brittlely, wantonly.

"But when I got normal ——"

"Normal?"

"Yes. Normal. When I could balance myself ——" He stopped.

"Oh, don't be futile," she said. "Don't tell me that by that time you'd contaminated me."

"No," he said. "We were both young, we had a chance to develop. Even when I met you I was almost over it—that sickness. I didn't want to fool around any longer with a lot of women. I wanted to settle down and live a normal man's life."

"It's all my fault," she mocked him. "I can see it quite clearly. I stopped you from becoming a nice little bourgeois."

As he lit a fresh cigarette she saw him shrug his shoulders. "Don't you see?" he went on. "Can't you see, Norah? You are so wonderful, but you want nothing from life but that . . . passion; not tenderness, no softness, no kindliness or the letdown which goes with it. You possess love, and love possesses you. Yet you are cold. I mean, it doesn't reach you. Somehow, in spite of everything, it doesn't touch you. While the other—I can't put it into words."

"Indeed you can't," she said coldly. "That's why you wanted separate bedrooms? That's why you left me [illegible] weeks in succession? That's why [illegible] to Europe, all by yourself? Or did [illegible]

Neoclassic

BY ELIZABETH STERNE

Like that reed cut down by the vain little god
Called Pan, who pursued with wild hoof and heart
A wood nymph dew-moist, lunar and cool,
A maid of Artemis who would not assuage him
And left him, a fury from waist to his toes,
With whimpering wonder encircling his brow
More tightly than wreathed flowers—
Like that reed cut down by Pan in his pain,
She was hollowed to pipe his thin refrain:
"Who is left for me to play to
Now green meadows no longer hold my dear?
Who in this world of ever-elusive women
Can I take for cheer?"

In the most colorful and elegant season that society has seen for many years, Mrs. Lawrence W. Earle is one of the outstanding beauties. Especially lovely with her shining dark hair is Mrs. Earle's complexion—smooth, milk-white, without flaw.

Like many of her friends in Philadelphia and New York society, Mrs. Earle is devoted to the 1-Minute Mask of Pond's Vanishing Cream. "In only one minute, the Mask re-styles my complexion," she says. "Makes it look clearer and more alive—and gives my skin the soft, smooth finish that takes powder perfectly. I always have a Mask before an important evening!"

It's a lovely foundation cream, too!

Irs. Sedley started. Steps on the flag- e, quick vital steps. She saw his hand hing out for one of the wide, open win- s, and as he swung through the frame said, "I'm here, Luke."

Oh, we thought you'd gone to bed. Liz ted to say good-by and thank you, but ran into Hattie and she said — "

I came downstairs again. It was too hot I wasn't really sleepy." She hesitated then said softly, "I like your Liz."

I thought you would. Nobody in his t senses can help liking her, but when gave me the ring I was sure. It was aw- y sweet of you."

"Did she like it?"

Luke laughed, remembering Liz's startled e when he had slipped the ring on her ger, down at the swimming pool. "Of rse she did—she was very touched. Very happy that you should have thought of it. I told her. I mean that I forgot "

"Oh, but you shouldn't have. It was really quite thoughtless of you. Why hurt anyone's feelings?"

"I won't. Not Liz! Nothing can hurt her. That's what's so wonderful about her. She seems to understand people and what to expect of them. And she didn't expect a ring from me." He paused. "She just takes things as they come along. The good with the bad."

Of course, thought Mrs. Sedley, and in the darkness of the room her lips curled into a tiny contemptuous smile. Of course! She has no imagination.

"She seems a very wise young girl."

"She is." In his voice rang the eager urge to talk, his happiness which sought an outlet—an audience. "She's surprisingly wise. Sometimes she seems older than her age, or any girl I've ever known. It surprised me at first; she's only twenty-two and she hasn't seen or done or even read very much. She's just born that way, or perhaps the life she's led——"

"She said she is an orphan, didn't she?"

He told her what he knew and she recognized the admiration, mingled with pity, he felt. "What's so wonderful about her is that nothing has spoiled her. I mean . . . loneliness and hardship and having to fight all alone to make a go of it. It didn't make her bitter or envious or even very ambitious."

Betty Fenton's daughter. Simple and contented and apparently satisfied with her lot. And Luke, her clever handsome Luke, who could have the best of the world, taken in.

"How little you know about her, actually," Norah told him. "I remember when you first brought Celia here you knew all the schools she had gone to, her parents, the interest she took in certain subjects and how you wondered ——"

"I'm through wondering. I know. With Liz nothing matters. We'll have plenty of time to find out all about each other."

"I'm sure you'll be very happy."

"I think we will be. Anyhow, we'll take a chance. Liz thought at first that maybe it would be a good idea to wait a little, but I've wasted too much time!"

"The more I hear of her the more I like her," said Mrs. Sedley gaily, lightly. "After all, it isn't too sensible to rush into marriage."

Luke struck a match and lighted a cigarette. "Sure, but, you see, it's different with Liz. I sort of feel I've always known her—always wanted her and she—she feels the same way."

"Everyone in love does," Norah Sedley replied.

"I guess so. But then I never felt it before even when I thought I was in love."

"Felt how?"

"Sure," he said. "Just sure. But I am boring you. There is nothing duller than to have to listen to someone in love. John used to drive me nuts, going on and on about his wife."

"You're not boring me," Mrs. Sedley assured him, "you're not boring me at all. I want to know everything about her and you—anything you care to tell me."

"The usual, sir?" Toppy, the barman of the 3:40, swayed down the club car. He smiled at the colonel.

Richardson smiled back at him. "Make it a stinger today, Toppy."

Toppy went back to the end of the car, gathering orders on his way. He mixed the stinger, served it.

The colonel settled back into his seat staring out the window. He had had two satisfactory days in Washington. He had seen everyone. His congressman, his senator, lots of old colleagues at the Press Club and at Harvey's.

He hadn't particularly wanted to go to Washington to get that data for the Banner, but now he was glad he'd gone. It had settled something. It had given him a second wind.

A second wind! A chance to regain dignity and self-respect. In a few weeks he would be a free man once more.

Free, he thought. Free. All and everything of him at liberty without restrictions. Seventeen years—a whole life in itself—he had given her, waiting, hoping. He should have found the strength to cut loose long ago. Of course, he had no idea what his future life would be like—a life in which he would never see her again, never discuss things with her, never dine with her. A life without tantalization.

Good-by, he said in his mind. This is good-by, Norah. I talked to some people down there in Washington—so, I'm off. Then, for the first time, he would take her into his arms and kiss her gently, oh, very gently, for now he could afford it. He was leaving. He was a free man.

As the train stopped he tossed a bill on the table. He walked slowly along the gravel path and up the stairs to the station. He knocked at the window and saw Aswell, behind his old-fashioned rolltop desk, lift his head and reach for his cap.

Aswell lumbered out of his cubbyhole. "Didn't expect you back yet. Have you heard the big news?"

"What big news?"

Aswell pushed his cap back and scratched behind his ear. "We'll have a wedding soon. Luke Sedley got himself hooked."

For a moment the colonel didn't comprehend what Aswell said. His face went blank.

Aswell sniggered. "Surprise, ain't it? Always thought that boy would never—he's got himself engaged to the Fenton girl. Mrs. Sedley printed it in the Banner."

"Well, that is grand," said the colonel. He didn't notice when Aswell left him, disappeared into his small, hot office.

Norah would be alone, left alone, the one thing she loved gone—gone forever. His mouth went dry as he thought of what it would mean to her. Then his heart began to beat and he put his free hand across his chest as if he couldn't believe this new wild rhythm within his blood. She'd be alone. All by herself.

There was a telegraph in Aswell's office. The colonel rapped for Aswell's attention. "Send this message: Tomlinson, National Press Club, Washington, D.C. Regard conversations as canceled. Richardson."

IN the moonlight the house, the meadow and the woods surrounding it seemed no longer to belong to a world, restless with problems, confused in its aims. Liz smiled to herself and turned to Luke, stretched out on the blanket, chewing on the bitter stem of one of the daisies which grew in abundance all over the meadow, his eyes wide open, staring up toward the sky.

"It's like being on one of those stars, being up here with you," he said. "Just you and me, the house, the creek, the trees, Brownie."

She lay back, putting her head into the hollow between his shoulder and neck. There was something strange about him, something she felt but could not explain, even to herself. When she was alone with him he seemed to be complete, his heart and his mind and his soul, all of it integrated, functioning in perfect harmony, but as soon as she saw him in his own surroundings something appeared to snap within him. Something became missing, or at least split up into single pieces. She wanted to talk about it, but it was difficult to put in words and anyhow, maybe, that was the way people in love were when they mixed with other people. Maybe she, too, would seem a different person to h friends, or rather to Luke, should he wa her with them, acting in a way they pected but which was new to him.

"Richardson likes you," he told her. "took me aside today to tell me so."

"He's so sad," she said, recalling in mind the colonel's stubborn sun-tanned fa

Luke laughed. "Richardson sad? I do think he even knows what sadness is. H so active, so busy, so strict. What makes think that?"

"I DON'T believe you know what sadnes Luke. I hope you never will."

"Do you?"

"I think I do."

She felt his hand squeezing hers. Then spoke again. "I guess you're right at t Pain, horror, fear, depression, yes, but sadness. Norah—you know I have to be gr ful to her for that. She has spared me s ness."

"I wish she could like me."

"Oh, but she does."

"Really, I mean. Not just because love me. But me. You see I never re knew what it felt like to have a mother—c when I was little. I do want so much—he left it to me. We could fix it up." But even as she spoke she knew that it was hopeless.

"I can't do that to Norah," he said. "Don't you see? She would be all alone. She plans to have us live in the big house, as is only natural. We can keep this house—and we can always come up here, any time we want to."

Yes, we can come up here, she thought. Sometimes. Just to visit.

"What's the matter, Liz?"

She stretched and put her arms behind her head, resting her neck in the palms of her loosely folded hands.

"Liz?"

"Well, it is all rather strange to me—getting married, you know. I don't think I realized until today what it means."

"To live with the man you love, to bear his children, to build a complete life together."

"All that and more. It means giving up one's own life, it means adjusting, merging." She sighed.

"Don't you want to marry me any longer?" She heard the fear in his voice, the bewilderment.

"Of course, I do. It's only, just as I said, I didn't quite realize it before. In one's imagination one sort of always ends at the point where the guy is popping the question. You see, I have been so free always—without any obligations other than those I chose. No one had any claim on me."

"That goes for me too," he said.

Oh, but it doesn't, thought Liz. It doesn't. You're not free, you never were free. You are Norah's son and you love her, and love in itself seems to put people under obligations.

"I love you so very much," she whispered.

If only Norah Sedley could like her. If the wall which was between them and which Luke didn't feel could come down.

Liz came down the winding staircase and saw Briggs, in the hall, gathering up the tennis rackets they had carelessly left lying around.

"I hope you had a nice game, Miss Liz."

"Thank you, yes," she said. "I'll be in the library if Mr. Luke is looking for me."

"Very well, miss."

She wanted to see the portrait of Lukas Sedley again. It had come as a shock to her that any two people should look so much alike as Luke and his father. And as she saw it now, lighted by the last rays of the afternoon sun, the shock was just as unexpected as it had been the first time. She stepped back to get a better perspective. Again she studied the intimately known face, the high cheekbones, the determined chin, and Lou Sedley's mouth seemed to curl into a sardonic grin. For a second she imagined she could hear him actually laugh, the deep low laughter Luke had inherited. So strong was the impression that she stepped back and almost bumped into Briggs.

"Oh. Sorry. I didn't hear you come in."

He carried a tray loaded with glasses and bottles.

"It's so startling," she said as if in apology. "The painting."

Briggs stood quietly beside her. "Yes," he said. "I sometimes come in here just to look at him. He still seems to speak to me." He sighed.

"But he was happy, wasn't he?"

"Oh, certainly. I wouldn't like to think of Mr. Sedley as not being happy. But he was so careless."

"Was he really? Like Mr. Luke?"

She caught an odd expression on Briggs' face. "Not exactly. In the end he didn't seem to care about anything. He needn't have died if he had cared. Cared enough, that

The art of make-up was the rage among Chinese ladies in the misty centuries preceding the birth of Christ. Han dynasty records tell us that berouged ladies of that period, in addition to painting artificial eyebrows, wore dark shadows around their laughing eyes. The Chinese ladies painted their eyebrows with the burnt tip of a fragrant willow twig. They stole the black from inkstands on their lords' desks.

They also affected a coiffure known as "falling off the horse," meaning the fad of wearing one's knot of hair coquettishly on one side of the head.

Norah Sedley said, "Your mother was quite a stupid woman and very stubborn. I had hoped she would understand that it was impossible for her to stay here, in this house or this neighborhood. With my son growing up . . . her little girl. We had to think of our children. Why, it would have been impossible for you ever to be accepted anywhere. The whole neighborhood knowing, gossiping."

For Liz, too, past became present and she could see her mother, pacing between the Victorian furniture, thinking of her, "Kitten, Kittykittykit." Poor mother. Poor darling mother. "Kittykittykit."

"Go on," she said.

"She cried," said Mrs. Sedley. "She was a very weak woman. And she wouldn't understand. We had several talks. I used to come here—on purpose, you see, so that people would see me come and think—— Lou was away then—on a job in South America—I saw her quite often . . . and in the end, I finally made her understand."

"And then?"

"Then? Well, she couldn't face the future. She chose an easier way. Suicide."

THE light in the room seemed to dim. To go out. The room was very black and with the darkness falling upon her, Liz repeated, "Suicide?"

"Didn't you know? Weren't you told?"

"I was told—I believed she died in an accident, hunting. They used to go hunting—there were a lot of deer around here, there still are—she fell—the gun went off."

"Yes," said Mrs. Sedley, "of course. She didn't want Lou to feel he was to blame. She was generous that way. And probably she didn't want you to know. But her father knew, and she left a note for me. He brought it over after her funeral. Everyone, of course, believed that it was a most unfortunate accident. And, in a way, it was. Most unfortunate."

Her slim, exquisite hand reached out and crushed her cigarette. Liz stared at it. The long sensitive fingers, the perfect skin, the extraordinarily lovely shape.

"You killed her," she said.

The hand drew back slowly, gracefully.

"You killed her," Liz repeated. "You talked her into it while Lou was away. You made her believe that she had no chance—no chance anywhere."

Mrs. Sedley rose. "Not at all," she said. "I told you your mother was a very weak woman. She just chose the easiest way."

"You killed her," Liz repeated with the same level, cold voice.

"Don't be melodramatic, child."

"She loved Lou, your husband, and he must have loved her as Luke loves me—and you wouldn't let him go."

Mrs. Sedley turned and looked at her. The girl's face was drained of all blood and her wide mouth was trembling. "I'm sorry," she said. "I had to tell you. Luke knows nothing of this. I have told you the facts, Liz, about your mother. As for you ——" She shrugged. "Good night. I'm sorry. It must have been a shock. But you had to know."

She moved away, into the darkness outside. In the kitchen, where Liz had locked him, Brownie began to growl again.

For a long time after Mrs. Sedley and Hattie had left, Liz sat as if in a stupor on the low footstool. After a while, when Brownie's scratching at the door finally reached her brain, she stood up and, quite mechanically, opened the door to the kitchen. She looked at him.

"Let's get out of here. Quick."

Brownie pricked up his ears and gave her a low, pleased bark. He ran to where she stood and automatically her fingers began to rub him behind his ears.

"But what do we do with you?" she said. "I can't take you with me. You are too big for a city. They won't let you in anywhere. We'll have to find another home for you."

She looked around her, at the Victorian furniture, at the curtains she had made so happily, at the walls she had repapered and through the open door into the kitchen.

"Okay," she said. "That was that."

WHAT DO YOU KNOW! EGGS CHATEAU!

EGGS CHATEAU

1 8-oz. package Borden's Chateau
4 slices broiled or fried ham
2 English muffins or soft buns, split and toasted
½ cup milk
4 poached eggs

Cut Chateau cheese in chunks and melt in top of double boiler. (Chateau melts as smoothly as it spreads and slices.) Add milk and stir till well blended. Place ham on halves of buns or muffins and top each with poached egg. Blanket with hot Chateau cheese sauce.

Borden's Chateau gives that sauce a special, sturdy flavor that comes from a careful blending of fine aged and mellow-mild American Cheddar cheeses. No other cheese food is quite the same. Crackerful of stacks-protein nourishment! Ideal for snacks, sandwiches, Welsh rabbits, soufflés, salads. Available in ½-lb. package and 2-lb. loaf. (Recipe serves 4.)

IF IT'S BORDEN'S—IT'S GOT TO BE GOOD!

Tune in the Ginny Simms Show! Music! Comedy! CBS, Friday—9 P. M., E.S.T.

She went out of the living room and through the narrow dark hall and up the staircase. "Messy," she said. "Oh, how horribly messy! I don't want to have anything to do with them. Never. Not ever again."

She reached her bedroom, turned on the light and took her bags out of the closet. She began to throw things into a bag. Shoes and stockings and dresses and underwear. There was a red leather frame on the table beside the bed. In it were stuck several snapshots of Luke.

"It's no good, Luke," she told him. "It's better this way. All over, my darling. Finished. I simply have to go this way without any explanation. I am only human too. I can't take it. Call it weakness ——"

Suddenly the walls seemed to fling back: "Weak. Weak. Weak. . . . Your mother was a very weak woman. She simply chose the easiest way out."

Liz sat down on the edge of her bed. Her head cocked as if listening, listening intently.

"Your mother was a very weak woman."

Weak, weak, weak, the echo came. And you are your mother's daughter. She closed her eyes, lying back across her bed, her hands clenched into fists as if holding within her palms a thought which must not escape her.

Yet, as hard as she tried to phrase it, in her mind she was unable to do so. She could only feel. Her mother moved through this very room, yet not really there, but with all and everything she was with Lou—the husband of another woman—until this very woman —— But oh, no, she mustn't think that way. And Liz saw Norah Sedley: young Norah, utterly, desperately in love with Lou, who had gone to another woman. And Liz sensed what Norah obviously had never admitted to herself, perhaps could never admit: that she was loved no longer by the man she so desired.

AGAIN she was standing in the library, looking at Lou Sedley's portrait, hearing Briggs' voice. And she saw the two women, no longer Norah as Luke's mother, no longer Betty as her own, fighting their hopeless battle, each using the weapons nature or temperament had lent her. Of these two women, Norah Sedley had been the stronger. The more intelligent, smarter, more ruthless. Betty Fenton, the victim of her love. And now, today, this evening, Norah Sedley had tried the same strategy on Betty Fenton's daughter. Only Lou was no longer the object, but Luke.

The flash of intuition passed. Liz sat up and went downstairs into the kitchen and over to the sink and began to work the handle from the pump till the water spouted. She put her face in the clear cold stream.

That's why she came here tonight. She wanted me to believe that she was responsible for my mother's death so that I would get out of this neighborhood in horror and disgust. She wanted me to think that so that I would leave Luke.

She reached for a towel and began to dry her face.

Weak, she thought. Yes, what Norah Sedley would consider as weakness. She didn't kill my mother. My mother could have stayed and fought. If I leave now, Norah will not have driven me away. I will have gone by myself, given up Luke, broken my happiness with him because I am too weak to face her.

"We're not going, Brownie," she said, turning to the dog which had followed her. "I am going to stay."

In spite of the early hour, Liz was up next morning when Luke came driving through the woods, sounding his horn gaily and singing at the top of his lungs, with the uninhibited unconscious loudness of a small boy. He broke off. "Why, Liz! Up this early? And I thought I would surprise you." He switched off the motor, but kept staring at her as she stood behind the white-painted fence, handling the watering can.

"I always get up early. And then it hasn't rained for days and the lawn looked as if it needed some water."

"Got a cup of coffee for a poor beggar?"

"On the stove. I put it on before I came out."

"What did you say, Liz?"

"Let's get married in New York. Without anybody knowing about it. Just you and me. I know it's only four weeks and it isn't that I'm that impatient. It's that I dread a crowd and all the festivity with no privacy at all. And it's such a heavenly opportunity. You'll have to spend a few days anyhow in New York. We——" She was, all at once, breathless.

He looked at her. The car swayed and he caught it. "I know what you mean—but we can't do that to Norah. She wouldn't understand."

Just a few days, she thought, alone with you. Just a few days. You don't know that there was to be no marriage—no honeymoon. Just a few days.

"I think she would," she said slowly. "She ran off with your father without anyone knowing about it."

Luke smiled. "I keep forgetting that."

"But it's true, nevertheless."

He stared ahead. The traffic on the road had grown heavier; big trucks rolled by, leaving a cloud of fumes. "The cards," he said. "The invitations."

"They haven't yet gone out."

"Norah would be frightfully hurt."

"We could settle everything as soon as we get to New York, and then you can drive out to Long Island. It's just one day more than you planned to stay away. Three days it takes. On Tuesday we could go up to city hall, find two witnesses—strangers if possible—and it would be all over without a lot of to-do, without all the embarrassment."

He looked at her. "I can see your heart beating in your throat."

"Let's do it, Luke."

"Do you want it that much?"

"Yes, I do," she said. "Something which belongs entirely to you and me. Getting married without anyone knowing about it, watching us. Just you and me."

"Norah," he said. "She wouldn't understand. I hate to hurt her."

"Yes, I know."

Somehow she slumped in her seat. All the impetus went out of her. She should have gone, should have followed her impulse and left last night, never to see him again. It would always be that way.

For the first time since she had known him, she recognized the tendency toward weakness in him, not perhaps primarily there, but educated in him. Yet she was not shocked by her sudden sober realization. If anything, she was shocked that it didn't impair her feelings for him.

She didn't know, what Luke had always sensed in her, that life had taught her an ability to take things as they were; she was surprised only about herself and her unlimited love for him. And, as she thought that nothing really bad could happen as long as she faced the facts which he represented, a new impulse awoke in her. Perhaps this—this moment of indecision was decisive, the one battle she had to win.

"All right," he said, "if you want it that much."

The colonel smiled. He wasn't a man who smiled easily. For a long time life had neither amused nor enchanted him. But today, sitting across from Mrs. Sedley, he felt as if he had unexpectedly recovered from a long and severe illness. The smile kept lingering on his face, giving it a boyish, almost sheepish expression. Mrs. Sedley, watching him, knew what went on in his mind.

"Luke called last night," she said. "Chase wanted him to stay over one or two more days. Apparently the papers were not ready and he wanted to sign them and settle the whole affair."

She, or rather the Banner, was buying another small newspaper, this time in the neighborhood of Portland, Oregon. The colonel knew all about it, had gone over the figures, yet refused to go to New York to meet the former owner. To be alone with me, thought Mrs. Sedley. What a fool he is.

Richardson, too, thought of Oregon. Doubtless Norah had bought this enterprise not strictly for business reasons. Luke could handle the Banner himself, would not like to be supervised day in and day out. Norah needed another field. And a certain distance. There was a chance, even a good chance, that they might reorganize it together, as years ago they had had to reorganize the Banner and the Daily. They might go together.

Luke will go to Oregon, Norah thought. He'll need a change. New surroundings, new people, until he gets over her.

"Long distance, ma'am," said Briggs, who had appeared on the terrace.

Mrs. Sedley went past him into the living room. The receiver lay on the table, on top of a pile of magazines. She lifted it, holding it close to her ear.

"Luke."

"How did you know?"

"I just did. Are you coming home tonight? How is it going?"

"Norah, I called up to tell you"—there was a slight pause as if he was catching his breath, and then she heard him laugh—"Liz and I got married this afternoon. In New York. You see, she came with me. We decided it would just be the best thing to do. . . . I can't hear what you are saying, Norah."

"Congratulations, I said. Where are you now?"

"WHERE are we, Liz? We don't know. We drove down, I mean we are on our way to the Cape. We won't be home for a week or two. Here is Liz. Hold on, Norah."

"Congratulations," said Mrs. Sedley.

She heard Liz mumble "Hello."

"Let me talk to Luke again, please."

"You don't mind, Norah, do you? You do understand?" His voice was soft, tender.

"No, I don't mind," she said. "Not really. Have a good time. I'll get your rooms ready. Good-by, Luke."

In an Irish Mood

By Joan Story Wright

We should have been so glad that day,
Spilling with laughter;
We should have loved and never thought
Of what comes after.

But there was surf sound on the beach
And sea birds crying,
And my eyes caught in your cold eyes,
And my heart dying.

He was very angry, but he knew what had caused this anger. "You know."

He had expected her to laugh lightly, mockingly. She didn't laugh. She kept looking at him, with a strange burning intensity. He felt the blood surging through his body, drumming in his ears.

"Still, Ambrose?"

"Oh, for heaven's sake," he said rudely, beside himself with excitement.

"And you wouldn't go, even if I—if I should join you out there . . . after a little while, when I have Luke settled? I might join you, you know."

He swung around, caught her. Instinctively she started to withdraw, but her brain warned her and she stood motionless.

September had almost passed when Luke and Liz came back. From day to day they had postponed their return. It was easy to find new excuses. They wanted to go to Nantucket; they wanted to spend a few days at Martha's Vineyard; there was a fishing cutter going out whose captain had finally agreed to take them along on a trip; Luke wanted to pay a visit to a friend who lived near Boston.

Norah didn't really care. Time once again seemed limitless. And it was like waiting for Lou, knowing with deep certainty that he would have to come home, back to her, because he couldn't help himself.

She was in her bedroom when she saw, in the huge squares of mirror, the car drive up the hill, turn into the open gate. She went down the staircase and opened the door for them wide, and stood there at the entrance in her radiant loveliness, tall and slender, her dark eyes sparkling.

"Welcome home," she said. "Welcome home."

For a long time she had not allowed herself to hug Luke, but now she threw her arms around his neck and drew him close and held him for a breathless moment. He still seemed to smell of the salt of the sea, salt tang and fish and sun, and she felt the elasticity of his young muscles and the leanness of his tall young body.

"Your wing is ready," she said to Liz. "I hope you'll like it."

"I am sure I will."

No longer was Liz angry. During these last three weeks, lying close to Luke; sitting opposite him at a table; watching him lower a sail; stretching out in the fine white hot sand of deserted beaches, she had repeatedly thought of Mrs. Sedley, her mother and Lou. And out of the knowledge of her own passion for Luke she had, or believed she had, an understanding of the passion Norah and Betty Fenton must have felt for his father. Women in love. She didn't permit herself to think of them as of her mother or his, just as of women in love with the same man. She had decided to forget what had happened almost a generation ago, refused to be made part of an unhappy and confused past.

Brownie, who had waited patiently in the car, suddenly jumped down and came barking for attention toward the little group, then stiffened and began to growl.

"So you even brought your vicious dog," said Mrs. Sedley, and she looked at Liz, straight, wide-eyed—blankly.

Luke, who knew about Liz's fear concerning his mother's aversion toward dogs, smiled. "They'll get along, won't you, Norah? Come here, Brownie. Just pet him once, Norah."

Mrs. Sedley extended her hand for Brownie to sniff at, knowing, if Liz had not just then knelt down to rub his ears, he might have bitten her.

"Let me show you your wing," she said.

It was the old wing, where, until now, the guest rooms had been. Two carpenters had worked for days breaking down walls, putting in windows, and under Mrs. Sedley's supervision the rooms had been turned into a large bedroom, living room and small breakfast room. They were charmingly, tastefully furnished, and Liz knew that any little personal thing she might have wanted to put in there would be too much and would only serve to disrupt the skillfully created harmony.

Briggs, a wide, undignified grin pulling at his stern mouth, and Hattie, uncalled for, stood suddenly shaking Luke's hands and offering to unpack for Liz.

"Thanks a lot, Hattie. It's so little, I can easily do it later on."

Hattie looked at Mrs. Sedley, who said quickly, "Of course, if you don't want her to, but, you see, my dear, she's always unpacked Luke's things, whenever he came home." She smiled at Hattie as if she wanted to console her for the insult.

"Go ahead, Hattie," Luke told her. He put his arm around Liz. "Better get used to being babied and the old habits of Whispering Hill, honey."

Liz went past Hattie into the bathroom to wash her hands and run a comb through her wind-blown hair. I mustn't feel this way, she thought. It's wrong. Of course it is her house, her servants. I couldn't expect anything else, could I?

When she came back into the living room, Luke, sitting next to his mother, turned. "Guess what has happened, Liz. The colonel went to Oregon. Norah just told me. He's setting up the paper there. Well, maybe it's just as well."

They had talked of the chance that they two might go out to Oregon for half a year at least, all alone by themselves.

"He only left two days ago," Mrs. Sedley added, watching Liz's face. "He sends his love and best wishes. Why, Luke, did you want to go out there?"

Alexandre Dumas once requested the prayers of his old teacher. "My prayers?" said the abbé. "You don't believe in them."

"No, I don't always believe in them. That is very true; but don't worry: when I need them I will believe in them." —GAMALIEL BRADFORD: A Naturalist of Souls (Houghton Mifflin Co.)

"It was an idea we toyed around with."

"I hadn't thought of it. Let him set it up, Luke. He'll do a splendid job. Later, if you still want to, you could go out."

Yes, later, Liz thought. When everything is ready, step into the job. No more hazards, no more danger of blundering by yourself. No chance to plan or attempt something new; to learn your own faults, weaknesses or strength. She heard Mrs. Sedley murmur something about how little Luke really knew and that now he would have to learn and, with the colonel gone, there would be a lot of work.

"There is Liz to help us," Luke said. "She says she was a good secretary; she'll like to ——"

"I have no doubt," Mrs. Sedley said, "Liz will be a great help eventually, but let me break you in first, Luke, and then when I go away, you'll break her in."

"Go away?"

"Just to see how things in Oregon are going, just for a little while, later on."

Liz went over to the fireplace, which Briggs had lighted. She'll never go, she thought, never. She sent the colonel out there so Luke would have to stay here. With her. Working with her. Closely. Day in, day out. And she doesn't want me. She is creating a world for themselves, for Luke and her, in which I am to have no place.

She was still turning these thoughts over in her mind when, very much later, Luke stretched out beside her and said, "I think Norah's feelings were hurt."

"Why?"

"You were not very enthusiastic about the rooms—what she has done with them."

"But they're lovely."

"I knew you thought so. But you could have said a little more."

"I'm sorry. I thought I said ——"

"I know, honey. It's difficult for you. You are always sort of embarrassed if someone makes you a present, and you don't say very much, not even to me. I told Norah."

She held her breath and watched him open his eyes, first the blind one and then the good one, amber-colored and now rapidly bluing. "Oh, don't," she whispered. "Oh, don't!"

It was no use to run downstairs for milk or brandy. It was too late. He began to shake all over and the convulsions struck his body like the blows of a whip.

Liz pulled herself up onto the couch and put his head on her lap, holding him close, bending across him as if to give him warmth. One hand caressed mechanically the soft spot behind his ears.

Quite suddenly he lifted his head, tried to bark but brought forward only a new wave of saliva. A terrible tremble ran through his entire length, his hind legs jerked and he sank back. She heard the click of his jaw shutting. She tried to push her fingers into his mouth between the tightly closed teeth and heard him moan, a low moan. Unexpectedly in a last spasm he jumped from her knees, rushed to the middle of the room, whirled with a horrid vertiginous speed and collapsed with a great thump.

"Oh, no," Liz repeated. "Oh, no!" She tried to feel his heart, but it had stopped.

A few moments later Luke came in, carrying a bunch of papers. "Liz! Liz?" He squatted down next to her on the carpet. "Brownie" he said. "Oh, darling, don't take it so hard. He was old, after all. I know how you feel."

"He has been poisoned," she said. "Someone poisoned Brownie."

"Why do you say that? I don't believe it."

"I have seen poisoned animals a cat once and, twice, dogs." She told him how she had found Brownie, about his convulsions and the foam on his mouth. "Strychnine, or something like that. He was willfully, viciously poisoned."

Suddenly the tears came. And she cried as people do who hardly ever weep, harsh strangling sobs, and her entire body shaking with the effort for control. Luke stared at her. He had never seen her cry. Then the realization that it was his Liz, suffering so, touched all his tenderness for her.

"Oh, my darling, don't cry. Please, Liz, beloved." His arms opened to embrace her, to hold her close.

She pushed him away. "Don't touch me. Leave me alone, Luke. I want to be alone."

She, who had never yelled at him, was yelling now, her voice ugly with anger and desperation. Luke caught her and held her, and, when she felt herself trapped by his physical strength, she gave a loud anguished cry.

Mrs. Sedley heard it and it brought her into their living room. She saw the dead dog on the carpet, but she also saw Liz's distorted face. Luke had carried her to the couch. He put her down carefully, kneeling on the floor, pushing a cushion under her head, stroking her hair.

"What happened, Luke?"

He said, without turning, "Can't you get some bromide or something, Norah? She's beside herself."

Mrs. Sedley left the room, and when she came back she held a glass of water and a large round wafer. She put the bromide into the glass, stirred it, brought it to Luke and watched him hold the glass against Liz's mouth.

WISDOM OF THE WILD

Nothing in all nature makes man feel his bond with wild creatures so strongly as a display of wild-animal intelligence. Several years ago, I saw a female deer perform an act so clearly bordering on reason that it defies the scientist's classification of "instinctive behavior."

In the winter of 1936, I was working with a crew of timber cutters in the deep snow of an upstate New York woodland. One day at noon, the crew of forty men were ringed around a fire, eating their lunches and talking good-naturedly. Suddenly the baying of hounds came to us from afar, but swiftly drawing nearer and nearer. Then, like a tawny explosion, a wild-eyed doe burst from a grove of green hemlocks and floundered through the snow straight toward us. The ring of men broke in astonishment before her charge, and the terrified doe dashed to the edge of the fire. There she stood, trembling and gasping for breath, too exhausted to move a step farther—aware, apparently, that her only chance for safety lay with her enemy, man. —JOHN K. TERRES

"A job?"

"In New York. If we leave here a little earlier I can make the eight-ten."

"What do you want a job for?"

She spoke lightly, carefully. "I guess I'm just built that way, Luke. I simply can't sit around without anything to do. It seems such a waste."

"Just to wait for me?"

"What's it got to do with you? I like to work. I am used to work. It seems so silly to sit around and twiddle my thumbs."

"I know," he said, speaking slowly, trying to see her point, "I've been awfully busy lately—but now I think I'll have a bit more time. Could manage to be home a little earlier."

"That wouldn't change things. Half an hour or an hour more or less doesn't really matter. I just don't want to sit around doing nothing. That's all."

"What kind of a job is it?"

"Nothing much. Secretarial work. It pays forty-five a week. And no Saturdays. At a lawyer's office downtown. I'm to start on Monday."

He shrugged his shoulders.

"Do you really mind so much, Luke?"

"No, I guess it's quite understandable. It's just that it never occurred to me."

He drank the last drop of coffee and went into the bathroom and she sat there waiting for him to sing under the shower, but all she could hear was the splash of water. Now she, too, shrugged her shoulders. I can't help it, she thought. I simply have to do it. I'll go mad otherwise. But she knew clearly that he was upset, and why.

The first thing Luke said when they joined Mrs. Sedley for dinner that night was, "Liz is deserting us. She took a job in New York. She'll commute."

"A job? Really. Whatever in the world made you take a job, Liz?"

"She says she's bored with just sitting around."

"Are you?" said Mrs. Sedley. She motioned to Briggs for some ice water. "What is it? Not paid work, of course?"

"It pays," said Liz, and had the feeling as if quite unexpectedly she was walking across thin ice.

"How clever of you to get a job without going into town. Or were you in touch with an agency?"

"Tom Riley got it for me."

"Tom Riley?" It was Luke looking at her.

This insistence of parents on dedicating their lives to their children is carried on year after year in the face of all that dogs have done, and are doing, to prove how much happier the parent-child relationship can become, if managed without sentiment, worry or dedication. Of course, the theory that dogs have a saner family life than humans is an old one, and it was in order to ascertain whether the notion is pure legend or whether it is based on observable fact that I have for four years made a careful study of the family life of dogs. My conclusions entirely support the theory that dogs have a saner family life than people.

In the first place, the husband leaves on a woodchuck-hunting expedition just as soon as he can, which is very soon, and never comes back. He doesn't write, makes no provision for the care or maintenance of his family, and is not liable to prosecution because he doesn't. The wife doesn't care where he is, never wonders if he is thinking about her, and although she may start at the slightest footstep, doesn't do so because she is hoping against hope that it is he. No lady dog has ever been known to set her friends against her husband, or put detectives on his trail.

This same lack of sentimentality is carried out in the mother dog's relationship to her young. For six weeks—but only six weeks—she looks after them religiously, feeds them (they come clothed), washes their ears, fights off cats, old women, and wasps that come nosing around, makes the bed, and rescues the puppies when they crawl under the floor boards of the barn or get lost in an old boot. She does all these things, however, without fuss, without that loud and elaborate show of solicitude and alarm which a woman displays in rendering some exaggerated service to her child.

At the end of six weeks, the mother dog ceases to lie awake at night barking for ominous sounds; the next morning she snarls at the puppies after breakfast, and routs them all out of the house. "This is forever," she informs them succinctly. "I have my own life to live, automobiles to chase, grocery boys' shoes to snap at, rabbits to pursue. I can't be washing and feeding a lot of big six-weeks-old dogs any longer. That phase is definitely over." The family life is thus terminated, and the mother dismisses the children from her mind—frequently as many as eleven at one time—as easily as she did her husband. She is now free to devote herself to her career and to the novel and astonishing things of life. JAMES THURBER:

hand, awed by the beauty. She could see that he responded as she did, and also that he would never say so or admit it if she were to challenge him.

"Well," he said hesitatingly, "it looks pretty deep, doesn't it? We could go around the other way, over the golf links, I guess."

Liz nodded and they climbed back into the car and drove around the woods, and down the hill. It had snowed heavily during the night, but the snowplow had already been through and now there were high walls of snow on both sides of the road and the driving was easy.

"Oh, Luke, look," Liz had cried an hour ago when she had drawn the curtains back and seen the white garden. "It must be heavenly up in the woods. I think I'll go up today."

"Let's both go," Luke had said. "It's Saturday and we've always wanted a week end there. I'll tell Norah I'm going to play hooky."

Mrs. Sedley had smiled her superior, amused smile, but before she could spoil the fun with one of her pungent ironical remarks, Liz had quickly told Briggs to pack them a basket.

As they drove in through the gates of the golf club the pro, who lived there all year round, came out of his house, carrying a pair of skis. He waved to them.

They drove on. The ninth hole was at the top of the hill and directly below the line of trees which bordered Liz's property. They could see the house and the sun shining on the east windows. They parked the car and took a footpath which led to the house. When they reached it and turned back they could see a scattered mass of children, dragging their sleds behind them, crawling up the hill.

"Must be quite nice skiing," said Luke wistfully.

"Oh, but it is! I remember when I was little, mother used—well, she used to go sledding with me. The sled must still be up in the attic and there should be gramp's skis—they should fit you. Oh, what fun!"

He took her hand and together they ran, laughing, through the last few feet of snow.

"Got your key?"

"Yes." But she hesitated as if somehow something was missing. "I've got it," she cried. "A snow man. We have to build a snow man, Luke. There always was a snow man right under the walnut tree when I came home, sort of standing guard over the house."

"Really," he said and laughed, but already his hands had formed a big solid ball which now he rolled in the soft fleecy mass. He watched the sphere grow rapidly.

"That's enough," said Liz. "Put it there. Under the tree, so the sun won't strike it right away." She knelt down in the snow, shaping the snowball, poking at it, patting handfuls of snow to its sides.

"And now the torso. Maybe we'll find an old hat and some little pieces of coal. Oh, what fun."

He brought her another snowball and watched her excited face as she placed it deftly on the base. Then he brought a worn-out broom and she placed it in the snow man's plump arms. He went back and found two pieces of coal for the eyes and a stick for his nose.

"But no carrot for his mouth?" said Liz. She took out her lipstick and painted a crooked red heart on his face. Then she took a cigarette and pushed it bang into the middle of it, stepping back to admire her work. She heard Luke laugh.

"Golly, you look pleased with yourself."

She turned abruptly, conscious suddenly of her own childishness.

"You're so pretty when you laugh," Luke said. "That's what I like best about you—your gaiety."

"We'll get some wood and lay a fire to warm the house and then we'll look for the sled and the skis. Then you can go and break your leg while I make some coffee. We can have luncheon outside. Tonight, though, we'll have a warm dinner and then—oh, the beds will be so cold. The hot-water bottle leaks—I forgot to get a new one."

He drew her close and kissed her and whispered to her. He saw her blush and somehow it made him excited and happy.

"This certainly is a bewitched place," he said.

Bewitched, she thought. No. She shook her head to herself. Not bewitched. It's only that you don't have to live up to anyone's real or imaginary expectations of yourself which makes you feel that way. She pushed the key into the lock, but turned to watch him carry a big load of last year's wood, stumbling through the snow, laughing at her and cursing under his breath at the same time. And he doesn't even know it, she thought, he doesn't even know that he has been living under a strain all his life.

Inside, the house had a damp and slightly foul odor, and Liz quickly threw the windows open and knocked the shutters from their hooks.

She said, "Luke, you've no idea how to build a fire."

Together they laid the paper and wood and bits of coal they found in a pail in the kitchen. He set a match to it and, for a breathless moment, they watched in silent tension the flame shoot up straight and then curl back and, finding fuel and draft in the right places, catch.

"It's a very nice fire," he said complacently.

"It's a beautiful fire," she agreed. "Go and build one in the next room and in the kitchen. We'll need all of them, and we also have to keep them going."

She heard him busy himself while she sat on the little footstool, nursing the flame.

He called, "I'm going up to see if I can't find the sled and the skis."

When she went into the narrow little hall he was coming down again with two pairs of skis, dragging the sled behind him.

"I couldn't bring the other pair of sticks."

"I'll get them. You go ahead."

He went out, slamming the front door carelessly. She ran into the kitchen to the window and watched him bend outside the fence to put the skis on. He straightened and fell and pulled himself up, the seat of his pants covered with snow, and, carefully balancing himself, reached for the sticks and pushed off with long sure strokes, his weight well distributed. He turned into the small footpath between the trees and emerged where they had parked the car; giving himself a last strong shove, leaning on the sticks, he was gone, a small straight line shooting down the hill.

ABRUPTLY she changed her mind. No longer did she want to tidy up first, make the beds and put on the coffee. All she wanted was to follow him, flying side by side down the hill. She fed some more logs into the flaming maw of the stove, and rushed up the staircase to the second floor. She opened the door which led to the attic and faced the staircase, small and twisting.

The attic was dark and smelled of the dirt of mice and of old apples stored long ago, moth balls and the leather of some very old-fashioned trunks. When her eyes had grown used to the half-light she saw the sticks leaning in a corner where the sled and skis had had their place. Luke, in pulling them out, must have upset an old leather case, for she saw it lying on the floor, its lid open. A few sheets of paper had fallen out. Liz bent to pick them up and suddenly drew back, startled. The handwriting on the page she was holding—as if Luke had written it. His father, she wondered—Lou Sedley. L Sedley's letters to her mother.

"Darling," her eyes read, "oh, very, ve darling." For a moment she was uncertai undecided if she should put them bac then, just as quickly, some inner compulsi made her read. "Darling. Oh, my ve darling."

She looked at the date. February '29. T year her mother had died.

IT was as if her mother, Betty Fento were still alive and she, her daughter, we trying to spy on her, yet she could not r strain her fingers, which had begun to pic up page after page, sorting them accordin to their dates. When she had them all neatl arranged in a pile on the floor she hear Luke calling outside. She lifted her hea and saw him through the window, waving a her, though he couldn't see her, and the take off again, a tall lanky boy dancin Christianias into the snow-covered hill.

She sat there, shivering in great excite ment. "I've heard Norah's side," she sai aloud. "It's only fair that I should hea theirs too."

She didn't know how long she read an she didn't remember all of what she did read but a few facts stood out clearly: Lou Sed ley's desire to marry her mother, to cu loose from Norah; his desperate attempts t secure a divorce. The divorce she wouldn' grant him and then in the end consented to— with one condition that an entire year stil must pass. Lou Sed ley, to save Betty Fen ton embarrassment had left for Soutl America. And Norah Sedley had used this time—used it to drive Betty Fenton to commit suicide.

Liz began to tremble so vehemently that the letters slipped from her lap. Had Norah Sedley believed that she had been justified, that it had been her right to talk to the lonely young woman the way she had—convinced that Lou actually never had wanted to leave her? Had she believed what she had said—that Betty Fenton had been weak? That Liz, too, like her mother, was weak and would give up?

"Liz. Liz. Where are you?"

She didn't answer.

"Liz." The front door banging.

Luke must never know of this. "Here," she answered. "I couldn't find the sticks. Coming."

"Where have you been? I have been skiing for more than an hour. I'm hungry like a wolf. There's a nice kid outside, trying so hard to learn to stem. I told him he could have luncheon with us."

She tried to make the staircase. The whole house suddenly seemed very dark, the only spot of light where Luke stood in the open frame of the door. She stumbled and Luke caught her.

"Why don't you look out? Want some help?"

She shook her head. She went into the kitchen. The fire was still going. Automatically she unpacked the luncheon basket. When she went outside Luke and the boy were lying on the bare floor of the porch, their jackets rolled into tight little sausages and stuffed under their necks.

"What a gorgeous day," said Luke. "Gee, I like this place." She heard him yawn, happily, relaxed. He didn't even bother to cover his mouth.

"Come and get it," she said. "Come and get it."

"It's like being in another world," Luke said, sitting on the floor, his head against the warm tiles which bordered the fireplace. The flickering flames made a strange design of light and shadow across his face, so that for a moment it seemed almost to vanish into

To walk well there is only one rule—walk on one line and not on two. Most people walk on two lines and this causes them to wabble from side to side. By walking on one line a woman will appear more graceful, and if there is any soft drapery about her costume she will seem almost to float into a room. I know a woman quite short and heavy, who gives such an impression of perfect control of her body that she looks pounds lighter while walking than at any other time. This technique gives to a man dignity and directness of movement.

the dark background and the next moment became radiantly sharp in outline.

Liz sat on the stool on which she had sat that night when Norah Sedley had warned her. She couldn't push away the thoughts which had tortured her all during the day, She stared at the rocking chair near the window, at its painted comb back which showed in long-faded colors a garland of leaves and fruit. There her mother had sat, knitting or sewing and, at dusk, ready to tell her fairy tales.

What kind of woman had Betty Fenton been? How much of her had become part of Liz? Weak, Norah Sedley had said. Weak.

And I, thought Liz, I, too, am weak. Face to face with my own desires, I have been weak. For I have always known. When I accused Norah Sedley of having driven her to suicide and she called me melodramatic, then I knew. But, by willful reasoning, I killed that instinctive knowledge. I didn't want to believe it, because—because believing it would have made it impossible for me to marry Luke.

She heard Luke whistle and looked up. "It's like being in another world," Luke said again.

He, too, she thought, feels the tension which fills the house on Whispering Hill. How can he help feeling it, how can he help growing aware of the struggle between his mother and me?

"Liz."

"Yes?"

"I love you." His hand came across the little distance between them and it was warm with the glow of the fire. It drew her off her stool so that she came to rest on the hearth, her head in his lap. "You see," he said, "since you are here I am never lonely any more. I used to be—well, I either was alone—I mean I felt either lonely or so much taken up with things, people, surroundings—call it what you want to—that I felt lost among them. Now I'm no longer lonely that way."

She lifted her hand a little and pushed it softly between the opening of his shirt. His heart under her fingers beat regularly, strong. And his pulse mysteriously went through the palm of her hand and became one with hers. And I didn't know that, she thought. I love him and I didn't know.

"Luke," she said, turning her head slightly, "tell me. Are you happy?"

"Yes."

"Sometimes, though, you seem to me unreasonably nervous, disturbed."

"Who isn't? Think of the times we live in. So much to be done. There is so little time, yet so many mistakes have been made. But Norah is right, I guess; I have to go slow in the editorials—and what can a single person do?"

The question of what he really would like to do was forming on her lips when he said:

"And then—even you."

"What?"

"Your wanting to take a job. Your being so dissatisfied."

Never since that day when she had given up the idea of a job had either of them mentioned it again. Now the way he said it, more than the words he used, made Liz suddenly understand that his objections had not sprung alone from jealousy or possessiveness or hurt pride. He was doubting himself! Her decision had come as a shock and had upset him so because he held himself a failure as a husband.

"Oh, darling," she said quickly, "it has nothing to do with you. Don't think for a moment ——" She stopped abruptly, aware of the danger.

"But Norah," he finished for her. "Why don't you say it? You never liked her, you never wanted to live in her house. What is there between you? What I feel for her has nothing to do with my love for you. And I hate to see you both irritable, I hate to think of myself as being the cause; it's so —— The two people I love best. I always thought of you as being so generous. Be generous, Liz. Promise me."

Generous? Liz stirred. It was all her fault. Day in and day out her very presence must challenge Mrs. Sedley, would lead to deeper misunderstandings, more and more important battles. How could Luke understand? Too late, everything—too late. She sat up and saw his face in the firelight. She saw the weariness, the unhappiness in his eyes.

He pulled her back, holding her close. And in his embrace was violence, the violence of uncertainty, as if he were sensing her own confusion. It frightened her.

"Luke, Luke, darling."

"You looked so sad just then. So terribly sad. What is it, Liz? You give me so much and I can't even make you happy. I love you. I need you. But if I can't make you happy ——"

She held his face between her hands, kissing his eyes, his forehead, his mouth. "What nonsense you are talking," she told him. "Of course I'm happy. Of course you make me happy."

A little before six Liz heard the front door slam and, a moment later, Mrs. Sedley's voice calling for Briggs. She put her book down and hurried out of her room. When she reached the landing she could see Mrs. Sedley below her in the hall.

"Good evening," said Liz.

"Oh, good evening." Mrs. Sedley began to untie the silk kerchief from her head.

"Where is Luke?" asked Liz.

The dark fur slid from Mrs. Sedley's shoulders. "Didn't he phone? He won't be home before tomorrow night. There's a publishers' meeting in Boston. I thought it a good idea for him to attend."

"I see."

"So he didn't phone?" Mrs. Sedley's voice was unusually soft. "Don't look so sad. You'd better get used to it, my dear. All men are more or less inconsiderate, and as time goes by ——"

Liz did not listen to the end of the sentence and its implication. She heard Mrs. Sedley move away, cross the hall, and then her first step on the stairs.

"Norah," she said quickly, "I want to talk to you."

"Talk to me? Why, of course. Any time."

Liz stood very close to her. "Tonight. Now."

Mrs. Sedley laughed mockingly. "That urgent?"

"Yes, it is urgent. At least to me."

"Well, if you don't mind, I'll wash up and shed this garb first," Mrs. Sedley said. "I'll send Hattie for you."

Liz sat down on the first bend of the wide staircase. She started when she suddenly heard Hattie's voice.

"Mrs. Sedley is ready to see you now."

Hattie stepped aside to let her pass, but her hand reached out as if she wanted to touch Liz. So abrupt was this instinctive gesture that Liz noticed it.

"What is it, Hattie?"

"She has a headache. One of her bad headaches. Don't talk too long. She needs some rest." For a second Hattie hesitated, then without saying anything further she went around the banister, leading the way as if Liz were a stranger in this house.

And that is what I will be, will remain unless —— thought Liz. Unless —— She knocked.

The curtains had been drawn; the light pale-blue curtains, which gave the illusion of a bit of young spring sky, were folded across the wide windows. The fire had been lit and the smell of apple wood mingled with that of some crackling fir and the dry orange peel Hattie habitually wrapped into the newspaper with the kindling.

Mrs. Sedley lay stretched out in one of two deep easy chairs, robed into something silky and blue which matched the curtains.

Liz sat down in the chair on the other side of the fireplace, suddenly terrified that she couldn't find the beginning. For days now, she had weighed every word in her mind, phrasing and rephrasing every sentence.

Mrs. Sedley gently waved the tiny flame of a match in front of her lips, to and fro, watching it flicker, then pursed her lips and blew it out. "Well?"

"It's just that two of us under the same roof is one too many." She listened to the

"That isn't true," Liz said. "That isn't

"Because you love him," said Mrs. Sedley and sighed, "you think he must love you too. His infatuation is over, Liz, and now he's trapped. As Lou was trapped. But in the [illegible]"

"Lou loved her," said Liz. "Lou loved my mother. You are just as wrong about Luke and me as you were about them."

Mrs. Sedley suddenly was bored; she leaned back in her chair.

"LUKE'S father loved my mother. He wanted to marry her and he would have if you had given him the divorce."

"What a liar you are," Norah said, and the contempt in her voice was like a solid chunk of disgust. "No one would believe such an atrocious lie. You were a small child. No one in his sane mind would ever think that any mother would tell her little daughter [illegible]"

Liz, as if she had not heard, went on: "I have Lou Sedley's letters to Betty Fenton. I know he loved her and I know Luke loves me and nothing you say can ever convince me, ever."

She had spoken quietly, in a hushed voice, yet the walls of the room seemed to echo back her words. Somewhere downstairs a door banged, and the sound was like an explosion in the leaden silence of the room. The silence seemed to grow; it fell over the room, over the two women, like a blanket enveloping them both, burying them in the past which Mrs. Sedley had refused to let die.

Into this silence Liz said, "I'm sorry."

Until this moment, until Liz apologized for her knowledge, for the threat she held, for the proof she could give, something, a sense of survival, in Mrs. Sedley had refused to believe her completely. Now Mrs. Sedley shivered suddenly.

She reached for the bell and rang. A moment later Hattie appeared.

"You want me, Miss Norah?"

Mrs. Sedley rose. "I am sure, Liz, you don't mind if we break up our talk now. My head is getting worse."

Liz stood up. She said very quietly, "And your answer, Norah?"

"Answer," repeated Mrs. Sedley, and she smiled with great effort. "Let me sleep on it, will you? I hate to make rash decisions. Things always look so different in broad daylight. Don't you think so? But I should appreciate it if you would leave . . . now."

Liz woke. She lay, listening, motionless, in the spell of a nightmare, but not knowing what had frightened her dreams.

It was Briggs' voice she heard: "Miss Liz—Miss Liz."

Usually Briggs put down the breakfast tray in front of the fireplace and then knocked gently. Why was he standing beside her bed? The urgency of his voice——

"I'll be right out."

He withdrew, stepping back into the living room, and Liz groped for her dressing gown, slippers. Luke, she thought, Luke.

"What is it?" she called. "What is it, Briggs?" But he didn't answer and she hurried after him to find him standing in the middle of the room.

He turned. "You must call Doctor Todd right away, Mrs. Sedley. Hattie found her. She went in as usual at seven o'clock. Mrs. Sedley seemed to be asleep and she decided not to wake her. Hattie went back a little while ago and there was something strange about Mrs. Sedley. She touched her."

"No!"

Briggs' voice changed to complete impersonality. "I'm afraid so, Miss Liz. Hattie couldn't find the tube with the veronals. Mrs. Sedley, she said, always kept some veronals around. And cook remembered she found a dirty cup and spoon in the sink this morning, the tin with cocoa left on the table. She thought either Mrs. Sedley or you might have made a cup late at night. Of course she didn't think anything of it."

"Of course," said Liz. "Yes. Will you please connect me with Doctor Todd?" She went out of the room and along the passage.

When she entered the living room downstairs, Briggs already held the receiver for her and she spoke into the telephone quickly, repeating what Briggs had said.

Cook came in, her face swollen, and put a cup of black coffee beside her, then, without waiting, went out. Liz stared at the coffee, lifted the cup, but without drinking any of it set it down again.

Luke, Luke. What would this mean to him? How would he —— Luke, Luke.

She went up the wide staircase slowly, dazed, one part of her mind still rejecting Mrs. Sedley's death, the other part automatically performing the duties called for. Inside Mrs. Sedley's room the curtains were still drawn. All the lights were burning. Hattie stood at the foot of the bed, fingering her rosary, her lips moving silently. She turned when she heard Liz's step.

"You," she whispered. "You—it should be you, not her. I heard you last night. You——" She threw herself upon Liz and in blind desperation her fist hammered in the air.

Briggs caught her, held her, and Liz heard him murmur something softly, something kind. The door closed behind them. Liz was alone.

She gripped the back of the chair in which, last night, she had sat, staring at Norah Sedley. She had thought of death sometimes and in different ways, but she had never thought of it as gracious. Norah Sedley stretched out, still in her soft blue silk gown, looked gracious. Her eyes were closed, but even under their closed lids they seemed to hold the laughter, to sparkle with joy over a tremendous secret of which only she knew the meaning.

But she died smilingly, thought Liz, and then for the first time the fact that Mrs. Sedley had died because she had wanted death struck her consciousness. Death had not come unaware or as an enemy. She had sought death. She had created her own death. And now she was smiling.

"And your answer, Norah?" Liz could hear herself ask. A few hours ago only. Last night.

"Answer? Let me sleep on it, will you?"

This, then, was her answer. Liz began to tremble. Mrs. Sedley had decided to leave, to leave her own way; now never would Liz be able to speak, to explain to Luke—for always the gap between them would remain. Norah had made safe the love he had for her, his admiration, his trust. Nothing could disturb it now—or ever.

She sat on the bench in the bay window of the library, watching the road. Long since the soft twilight nad grown into darkness. Several times the telephone operator had called back: "Long distance, Operator Four. Sorry, we haven't been able yet to locate Mr. Sedley."

Liz had left the call in—at the hotel, at Wilkinson's, the friend Luke and she had visited, at a publisher's office. No one seemed to be able to find Luke or to tell her if and when he had left Boston. Twice Liz had called LaGuardia Field, asking that they page Lukas Sedley on every plane arriving from Boston, leaving the message that it was urgent to call her immediately.

When a car finally came up the hill she didn't hear it until she saw the beam of light cutting into the white of snow. Then, suddenly, unexpectedly, her whole body grew

Liz."

She stood still and it took all her strength to answer. "Yes."

"Going back to the house?"

"Yes."

She waited, and the night seemed to be filled with such tension that she found it difficult to breathe. She stumbled blindly, unseeingly up the hill. If only he would speak, say something, anything. Then, quite unexpectedly, she heard his steps turn in her direction, following her.

After a little while they could see the house, and when they saw it Luke halted.

"Oh, darling, darling," she murmured. There was nothing else now she could say, nothing she could ever say now, and perhaps just love was no longer enough.

"Hattie," he said, "she told me."

SHE took her hands out of the pockets of his coat, wrapped her arms around her body, hugging herself, bracing herself.

"It's so hard to understand." His words were like heavy stones; as if, with great effort, he was lifting them, one by one, to drop into space. "Norah!" he said. "She used to say to choose suicide was weakness, a cowardly escape. Whatever happened between you and her—however unhappy she might have been because of you, because of you and me —— She seemed so strong, so capable."

You and me, thought Liz. He did say it; you and me, he said.

"She was smiling," Luke went on and his voice was like an echo of the bewilderment he felt. Now he was not speaking to her, but talking to himself, as if something within him forced him to voice a realization he fought to reject. "Smiling."

For a moment nothing but the image of Mrs. Sedley seemed to be alive, to possess reality, to smile at them.

Liz had understood the implication of that triumphant smile. Now Luke had seen it and reacted instinctively and with the same terror, recognizing in Norah Sedley's last unconscious expression what she had hidden from him so long and so well.

She turned abruptly and saw him standing in the snow, in the middle of the road, looking up at the house; at the one lighted window on the second floor. Suddenly a shiver went through him.

"How could she?" he said. "How could she do it?"

Liz listened; listened, holding her breath, every nerve tense. Was this thing possible, that Norah by killing herself had killed the thing she died to save?

"Luke" she said, taking a step toward him, "Luke."

"How is a man to know?" he murmured. "How can he tell what to believe, what to do?"

"Luke," she said again.

"No, Liz, no. Don't try to tell me. It won't do. Not any longer. This time I have to find the answer myself."

She heard him move and saw that he was lighting a cigarette. His eyes above his cupped hands sheltering the flame were calm and sad and set. Her arm stretched toward him in a sudden instinctive gesture of protection.

Looking steadily at her, he spoke. "Why must love be so cruel, Liz, so tragic?"

"But not always," she cried. "Not necessarily. People can be honest with each other, Luke. There's no reason not to risk it, not to take a chance, not to try—even if one fails."

"Perhaps," he said. "Perhaps."

THE END

Do you remember the enchantment, when you were a child, of waking in a strange, muffled, bluish world, to find snow blanketing everything? I still feel the magic of that. The beginnings of journeys are delightful: settling down in a railway car, or having a preliminary prowl over the ship. But better still is coming home after a long absence, the moment you open your door. Then there's that delicious moment at the theater when the orchestra is fiddling away at the overture, and the footlights have been turned down low so that at the bottom of the curtain there's a magic brightness, suggesting the immediate possibility of every kind of enchantment.

Think of the tiny things that bring delight: a child laughing, somebody playing the piano well in a strange house, the sight of a friend's face in a crowd, the smell of a dusty country road after a little shower of rain. How one of these things can light up and change a whole day!

The Sunshine Radiance of GOLDEN GUERNSEY MILK
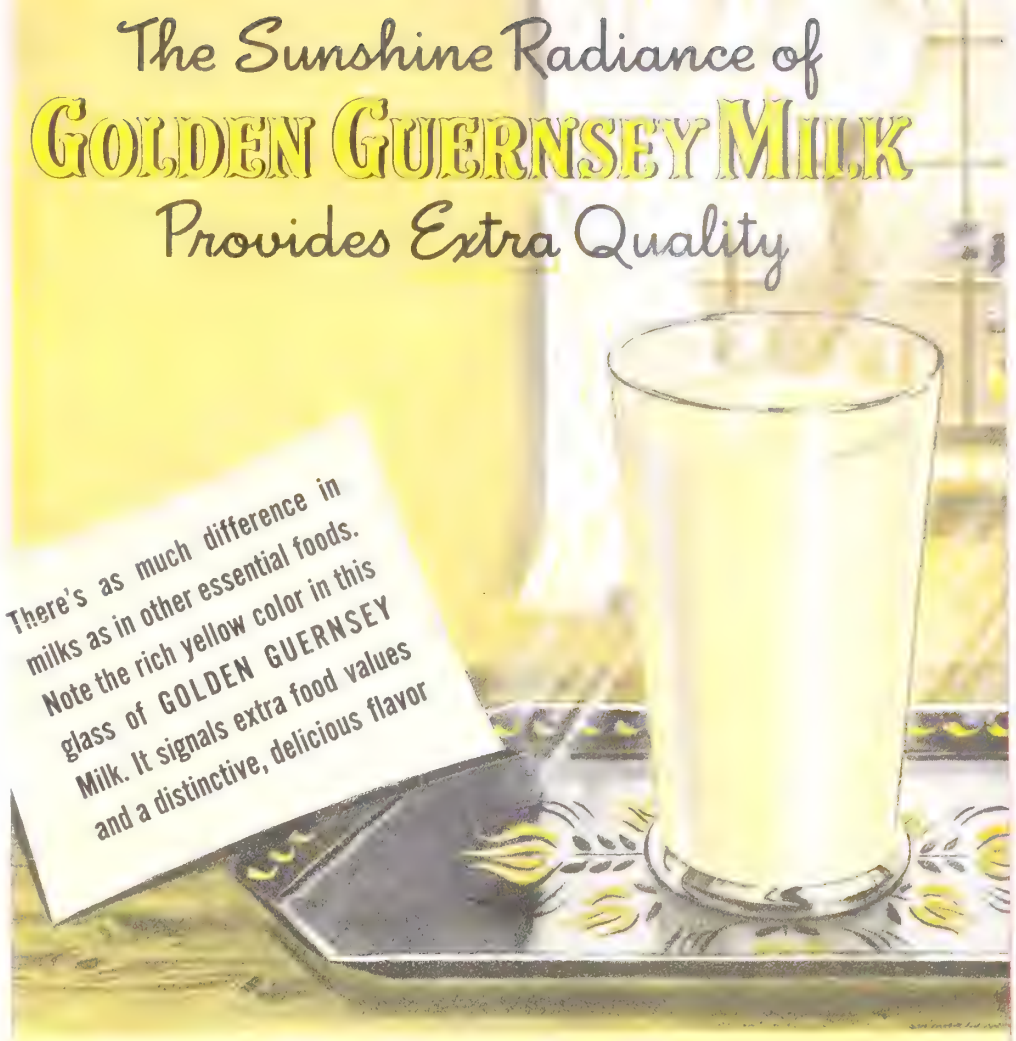
Provides Extra Quality



There's as much difference in milks as in other essential foods. Note the rich yellow color in this glass of GOLDEN GUERNSEY Milk. It signals extra food values and a distinctive, delicious flavor

Yes! The creamy yellow color of this special milk means more than a tempting invitation to appetite. It actually is the extra supply of carotene, an important source from which our bodies get Vitamin A to guard against infection and build good health. From the unusual supply of cream at the top of the bottle to the valuable food solids below the cream line, GOLDEN GUERNSEY Milk assures you of superior quality.

GOLDEN GUERNSEY is available in over 2000 communities. But regardless of where you live, you can be sure of its extra quality because this special milk—

1 Comes only from carefully selected Guernsey Cows.

2 Meets requirements of local and state authorities.

3 Is supervised in production by GOLDEN GUERNSEY, Inc., a non-profit agricultural organization.

Genuine GOLDEN GUERNSEY Milk is always identified by the name on the bottle cap or bottle. Ask your own milkman for GOLDEN GUERNSEY Milk. If he can't supply you, write to GOLDEN GUERNSEY, Inc., Peterborough, New Hampshire.

PEACE, IT'S A PROBLEM!

Two babies, a new home in one year: a tough job for even an ex-marine to handle!

BY MAUREEN DALY

ON January 20, 1946, little Lyn Conrad was dressed in her first long white dress, wrapped in three blankets against a damp, cold Philadelphia day and taken to St. Francis de Sales Church to be baptized Eleanor Mary Conrad. Lyn was then six weeks old. Her mother was still weak from the birth of her first child, and the baby herself had just spent three and a half weeks in the isolation ward of Children's Hospital for an acute dietary ailment. Marine Sergeant William Conrad, the child's father, on the sick list at Philadelphia Naval Hospital, looked tall and proud in his green uniform, though he limped a little, and used a cane to aid his walking on a stiff new leg. As the blessed water touched her forehead, the baby squirmed in her blankets and cried like a new kitten, and outside the baptismal alcove, Bill Conrad touched his wife's arm and said, "Don't worry, honey. When all this is over we'll take her home." So far the Conrads had had three years of

"If it's as much fun for my Baby I'd like another baby—but not for a while!"

Even on $60 a week, the budget still adds up to unpaid bills and no money in the bank. Two babies, five months' unemployment and a house to repair and furnish—with food $15 a month and medical expenses averaging over $9.25 a week.

72% of American families have incomes of less than $3200 a year.

"When Bill and I were engaged I used to say I wanted 23 children." But after almost 21 months of doctor's visits, special diets, white blouses and maternity jumpers, Eleanor Conrad wants a rest—and time to do her 11-hour-a-day job.

Problems look bigger, dollars look smal hectic wartime marriage together. For nine months they had shared a home with Eleanor's parents and five children in Philadelphia; for seven months Bill had served as a combat marine in the Pacific; for eight months he was shuttled between Navy hospitals as an amputee case; and for three months they had lived in a single, $10-a-week room just a few blocks away from the Mare Island Naval Hospital in California. Now, for the first time and with a baby they had both wanted, the Conrads were going to an apartment and a life they could call their own.

The first night Bill Conrad saw Eleanor Connors she was hostessing in the Philadelphia Servicemen's Hospitality Center with eight sailors grouped around her. It was the middle of February in 1942, and Corporal Conrad, tall, husky marine veteran of three and a half years, just back in town after a stretch of sea duty, had stopped in at the Center with five marine buddies for a cup of coffee and a ham sandwich. He saw the girl in the bright-green wool dress, counted the sailors, and said to one of his buddies:

"I'll bet she still dances with me!"

Eleanor was working then as a Government stenographer on the late shift at the city post office, and Bill picked her up at eleven o'clock in the lobby for their first date. He was waiting in marine dress blues with a gardenia in his hand when Eleanor came down and, he remembers, "I had just shined up the visor of my cap when she got off the elevator—looking just like I knew she would!"

Bill knew that night he had met the girl he wanted to marry. He told her he had "something important to tell her" and began the story with himself and Chicago: his life there with his mother and "I was afraid the nurse might give me the wrong baby—but this one looked so much like Bill, I knew it was ours." Conrads took $94 from savings to buy a crib with pink Teddy bears, chest of drawers, bathinet, high chair to make a "nursery" in the corner of their bedroom for Lyn's home-coming.

Bill Conrad got "on-the-job" training for his $37.5 week job as a filing clerk with the Veterans Administrat Government disability compensation for right leg in Pacific fighting brings income to over $60 a u father, an immigrant German carpenter, and nine other children; his two years in high school; the depression, odd jobs as a waiter, a salesman and a hustler in a printing plant; a couple of years in CCC camps; and his three and a half years with the marines. When he had left her inside the front door that evening, he had her picture in his hand, inscribed: "To Bill Conrad—love, Eleanor." Nine months later they were married in the rectory of St. Francis de Sales Church.

During that nine months, Bill and Eleanor had seen each other almost every day. He never asked Eleanor to go steady; he never asked her to become engaged; but two months after they met he began saving for a ring, and with her youngest sister, Dot, he shopped for a diamond. The night Bill and Eleanor became engaged, the Connors family had a party at home to celebrate, but it wasn't until two weeks later, when Bill and Eleanor were on a swimming party, splashing in eight feet of water, that he actually mustered courage to ask her to marry him.

THERE followed romantic evenings of figuring and planning over cigarettes and coffee in the Connors kitchen. Both had lived almost completely dependent lives, Eleanor with her parents and Bill in the regimented security of military service. But they were in love; he was 25 and she was 21, and their parents approved of their marriage. There seemed to be no problems. Bill's marine pay was $76 a month, Eleanor was earning $27.50 a week, and in the beginning they meant to live with her parents. Eleanor wanted the kind of elaborate wedding with long veil, bridal showers and visiting relatives that all her girl friends had had. But this was September of 1942, and Bill's orders to ship overseas were imminent, so with a feeling of grave decision, the date was set for a simple ceremony on November eleventh. But shortly before that date, Bill and Eleanor came to a serious deadlock over religion. As Eleanor explains now, "We talked about ourselves, we talked about everything—but somehow the issue of religion didn't come up until we were definitely planning to be married. I guess I avoided it because I knew it would make trouble." Bill (Continued on Page 212)

"It takes money to make a home—we'll do one room at a time, when we can." With help from father-in-law Connors, the living room was remodeled, plastered, painted in three weeks of night work. Mrs. Connors and Eleanor scrubbed, remade curtains, polished furniture and daydreamed about the time when they'd do the rest of the house.

"Lyn needs constant watching—but at least the babies don't cry at the same time!" Lyn and Billy share bedroom with adjoining cribs; someday the room will be a full-time nursery with pink-and-blue walls, stars on the ceiling.

"The first trip we take will be a nice long ride out to Chicago to see my family—all four of us." As an amputee veteran, Bill Conrad received car from the Government free; upkeep makes the car an average budget item of $25 a month.

"Falling in love was easy—and Bill and I still feel that way, most of the time." Eleanor does all her own housework; Bill usually works overtime two nights a week at office, often stays up till midnight making repairs on new house.

Just two days before the wedding, the ceremony was called off indefinitely because neither would compromise. Eleanor cried, Bill said nothing and both decided tacitly that the whole friendship had been a mistake. But the next morning Bill called, said briefly he "couldn't live without her" and they were married the following afternoon by a Catholic priest—Bill in his marine dress blues, and Eleanor in a smart beige suit and hat, with a small mink scarf and two purple orchids.

They had a five-day honeymoon in New York, visiting Jack Dempsey's restaurant, walking up the 168 steps in the Statue of Liberty, and eating Boston cream pie. After nine months of living together with her parents, Bill was sent to North Carolina for (Continued on Page 289)

"COMBAT FATIGUE" IN MARRIAGE

BY LESLIE B. HOHMAN, M.D.
Professor of Psychiatry, Duke University

FROM February, 1942, to February, 1947, Eleanor and Bill Conrad have had a surfeit of emotional experience and trouble. Within this time the thirty-one-year-old ex-marine and the twenty-six-year-old ex-Government worker courted, married, went through a war separated, then had two babies within eleven months, had to buy a home, and ran into a pile of bills—hospital bills among them—which the ablest financier would have difficulty paying out of a Veterans Administration clerk's salary.

The experiences of these five years have had a marked effect on each of these young people trying to get their family life started. Bill is a somewhat silent man who complains very little about a stump still painful after four operations. The leg, amputated by a Navy corpsman during combat, is present still in his nerves. "It" feels as though it were being drawn constantly in a tight vise. Somber depression and "nerves" occur more often since his three combat landings on Pacific islands.

Circumstances have pressed heavily, too, on Eleanor. Long separation from Bill, then word of his wounding, a second baby conceived and carried before she had time to recuperate properly from the first, terrible anxiety about her first baby's serious illness, overdue bills that could not be met, a husband who could not work regularly because of his war injury and his war nerves—all these trials have gradually but definitely frayed Eleanor Conrad's nerves.

> Character is long-standing habit. —PLUTARCH.

The result of all this is a very serious strain on their marriage relation. It would be strange if this were not true. Bill and Eleanor, after 4½ years of marriage, can hardly reach out and touch each other's hands. Bill, inclined to take counsel with himself rather than to spill out his thoughts, is tormented by his wife's constant fretting about things that he thinks he cannot easily change. He's a doer, not a talker, and he can't meet Eleanor's demand for discussion about their worsening affairs. Her trying to force him to talk has the effect of shutting him up the tighter. When intolerable conditions build up to a quarrel, Bill walks out of the house—too often to a bar and several bottles of beer. Thus it goes, until the nerves of both are jangling and they draw farther and farther apart. Last summer the Conrads nearly found their way out of the forest, when Bill stayed home and the burdens were lifted a little. But then a new baby arrived and the problems began piling up again, bringing the old quarreling.

It should be clear that trouble has pyramided on these two young people too smotheringly to let them be themselves, the two persons who fell in love five years ago. Their marriage is certainly not in robust health now. What chances have they of salvaging it?

For one thing, both have a certain stubbornness about their marriage that may serve as a loadstone to pull it together. Bill has said over and over after violent, recriminating quarreling or after long silence between them, "I love you and you love me, and we will never really want to leave each other." Eleanor, even after a tearful quarrel, will say, "I know I love him, and I know I won't leave him no matter how much I may talk about it."

This stubborn holding on should be a lesson to many married couples who are going through the storm of early-marriage discord. It can be put into a rule.

Rule 1: As long as love is recognized and admitted, there is a good chance for ultimate successful marriage. Don't be afraid to admit it and hold on to it.

Although they have been badly confused by their ragged nerves and worries, these two have other assets that go to make successful marriage. Each has complete trust in the other's fidelity. In all Eleanor's anger over Bill's absence from home and his spending money for beer, never once has she suspected him of being with other women. And Bill trusts his wife absolutely.

Rule 2: The likelihood of success in adjusting and maintaining a marriage is tremendously increased if there is no infidelity or jealous suspicion of infidelity.

Another element of strength in this marriage relation is that, barring their emotional separation by anger or silence, there has been no break in their high feeling of physical attraction for each other. They can say without reservation that sex has never caused any difficulty.

Rule 3: Couples, as long as they are bound together by marriage, should keep passionate affectional relations alive. Sex alone cannot make a marriage successful, but it can help couples over many a seemingly dangerous and impossible barrier.

Finally—and this is important—both Bill and Eleanor are essentially gentle and mild. Neither has any fundamental desire to do mean or hateful acts. When Bill is not harried by pain and combat nerves, by worry or by quarreling, he likes to do the simple, thoughtful things that are so dear to any woman. In the courtship days it was the bringing of a flower; now it is taking the feeding of the baby out of Eleanor's too tired and too busy hands, helping to wash the dishes without being asked. Eleanor can smile through tears of despair to say that Bill is sweet and lovable. And Bill gives the same report of Eleanor. He says she takes care of him as though he were a baby and is ever self-sacrificing.

Rule 4: Marriage success is possible when two people keep alive their tender thoughtfulness of each other. The negative corollary to this rule: don't, no matter how bitter the temporary feelings during marriage discord, allow the essential gentleness toward each other to be buried.

So far, in an attempt to assay this marriage relation, I have pointed out its assets. Now let us see that there are definite and dangerous roadblocks to be removed.

Both are making mistakes, mistakes made by many people not beset by the burdens of this couple. Bill is running away from trouble, not standing to fight his battle as he did in the Pacific. He will not force himself to sit down with paper and pencil to find out what he owes and how to budget his income against his expenses. He should try to solve the admittedly difficult problem of paying the most urgent bills, or at least making small payments to show honest intention. Most of his creditors will be sympathetic if he shows this intention.

Rule 5: Failure to meet the problem of indebtedness straightforwardly, however difficult the problem, will jeopardize marriage success badly.

Husbands frequently underestimate—more accurately, are unthinking of—the amount of physical work their wives must do, especially, as in this instance, when a newly acquired home badly in need of repair has to be made livable, and two babies have to be cared for. And this wife has the additional handicap of fatigue brought on by too rapid childbearing. If Bill were not himself harried by worry and nerves, he would see this. Likewise, Eleanor should try to remember that her husband cannot at once overcome the effect of many months of combat, and that his wound, even though he bears it rather stoically, makes Bill unhappy and inclined to brooding. What these young people—and many other couples subject to somewhat the same pressures—should stop suddenly and remember is this: both are struggling under handicaps, which they did not knowingly place upon themselves, and which reduce normal vitality and good humor.

It is, of course, the fault of both that Bill leaves home as often as he does and goes to bars. Bill's weakness here is not to be condoned; he is running away from conditions that seem too much for him, and he might not do so if it were put to him in these terms, since he patently has enough courage of other kinds. But if his wife understood this, and were willing to go considerably more than halfway to avoid the conditions that bring it on, Bill would not want to escape his home for a bar.

Rule 6: Whatever your legitimate complaints, however heavy the burden already upon you, don't make home an unhappy place to come to. Don't make a bar seem a happy refuge.

What stands out in this marriage problem—and I want to emphasize it—is this: Here are two young people whose marriage is in danger not because they are basically incompatible, not because no love bond exists between them. This is proved by their periods of happiness, even under difficulty. The real cause is that tormenting burdens have piled up too fast to be carried by their normal strength. Such conditions as they are struggling under demand a superstrength, which these two must find somewhere if their marriage is to be salvaged. And it is entirely possible that they will find this strength.

I was sent into this situation as a psychiatrist because the editors of the JOURNAL felt that a good marriage adjustment was possible between these two people. It was a gratifying experience to find both of them completely open and honest in their desire for help and in their willingness to change their ways so that the marriage conceived in love could be kept together by continued love. Neither of the Conrads had ever had a chance to talk out their problem with a nonpartisan person whose judgment they trusted. After many hours of discussion in which each could have his say without anger, and could be advised where he was wrong or unwise, a kind of hopeful light glowed between them, and much of their unhappy resentment seemed dissipated.

I am not predicting a smooth course for their immediate future. I told them they had many battles to win. But I believe they now have a better understanding of their combat strengths and of the pitfalls; and I believe they have the natural forces necessary for success against the pressures that have attacked their marriage.

Their relief of tension, their eager hopefulness and their confidence were expressed by Bill as he dropped me at the railroad station: "This is the best conversation I've ever had in my whole life." THE END

BEAUTY...AND YOUR BABY TOO

By Dawn Crowell

Beauty Editor of the Journal

WHEN Eleanor Conrad married, she weighed one hundred and forty pounds. Now, after the birth of her two children, seventeen and five months old, she weighs one hundred and ten. For every pound Eleanor has lost in weight, she has gained an impressive amount of good health and vitality.

Modern doctors are as anxious to produce a happy mother as they are to produce a healthy baby. Here are some suggestions from one such medical authority. They contain the kind of advice which has enabled Eleanor Conrad to be a lovely mother as well as an efficient one.

BEAUTY BRIEFS. Your baby thrives on a regular schedule. How about letting this schedule work as a beauty schedule for you?

Baby takes his daily naps. You need your naps too! Break up your new sixteen-hour working day with at least two half-hour rest periods. This time can also be used, once every week or ten days, to shampoo your own hair. Speed up the process by taking your bath and shampoo all in the same shower. Select a quick-acting shampoo that will finish the job in fifteen minutes. Partly dry your hair with a towel and set it. Then, while your hair is pinned up, covered with a net or very sheer scarf, choose the most important housework to be done. And go after it easily. It won't run away from you! Overwork within the first two months after your baby is born will leave its mark with fatigue and even ill-health.

Baby takes his morning airing. Fresh air and sunshine are your cosmetics too. You should manage at least one hour a day out-of-doors. On the day you shampoo your hair, take this opportunity to give it a sunshine drying. This is a good time to cover your hands and wrists with a cream softener, put on that old pair of white cotton gloves, and repair the damage done by constant diaper washing.

Baby has his bottle prepared. What better time for you to get in that between-meal glass of milk?

Baby goes to sleep at night! Dinner's over, dishes done, your husband's comfortably settled in the living room, and with your young ones off to dreamland a heavenly calm envelops your house. A peaceful moment with a practical purpose! Take this time to carry out a few more beauty rituals. Many-step manicures are not the most practical. Instead, well-trimmed nails with colorless polish will insure nonchipped-looking nails during the week. Save your bright colors for special occasions. The brushing of a woman's hair has always held a fascination for men. Choose this time, with your husband for company, to get in seventy-five strokes on your own locks. You might even get him interested in doing it for you now and then. (This is an effective time, too, to try the back-relief exercise illustrated on this page.)

EASY EXERCISE. Most new mothers begin simple exercises in the (Continued on Page 295)

Postnatal diets should be low in fatty foods, high in protein. In reducing, avoid dangers of self-diagnosis and prescription by consulting a doctor!

CLOSE FIGURING

By Louella G. Shouer

PAYDAY is a day for rejoicing in most anyone's house, but when Bill Conrad brings home his pay check every two weeks it's a real event, for this is the day he and Eleanor leave the children with mother and go on an all-out food-shopping trip to a near-by supermarket.

Eleanor buys enough food and household supplies to last two weeks—spends about $15. During this two-week period, she has to figure on about $5 at the corner grocery store for extras and $8–$10 for milk, butter and eggs, which are delivered by the milkman. As she expressed it, "After a shopping spree we usually have fresh meat, but along about the second week we have to fall back on chipped beef, canned luncheon meats and eggs for our main dinner dishes."

It isn't easy. To keep family meals low in cost means sticking pretty closely to the same cuts of meat, mostly the same vegetables and fruits, and using the same dodges most of the time.

Dishes for less than a dollar. Suppose your absolute limit for a main dish for dinner for four hungry people is a dollar. You'd be surprised how many good dishes you could add to your repertoire that weigh in under that figure—many of them way under. Here are a few for a start—one even costs as little as 30 cents—plus two good, inexpensive sweets to serve company with a cup of coffee. We've figured the cost of each recipe according to food prices of February 7 in a supermarket. Predictions are that you're going to see prices getting nearer to normal as the year progresses.

Bolstered with eggs, canned corn makes an attractive, good-to-eat meatless dish that belies its little cost. For a spring dinner, try baking this corn concoction in a ring mold, if you have one. Turn out and fill the center with creamed peas or fresh spinach. Later on, when asparagus comes down in price, try it with this annual treat too. Crisp bacon is perfect with this if your budget can manage it.

canned tomatoes may be substituted.

What would we do sometimes when we've run the gamut of low-cost meat cuts in economical meals if it weren't for hamburger? Good by itself, but it makes so many good dishes better—even a little of it. Our JOURNAL file of recipes using ground beef seems to grow and grow. And here are two more!

MEXICAN RICE

Cost, 88¢ Serves 4.

Cut 2 slices bacon into pieces. Fry. Add to pan 2 large onions, sliced; 2 green peppers, chopped or diced; and ¾ pound hamburger. Brown all together in the bacon fat for about 5 minutes. Then add 3 cups canned tomatoes, ½ cup washed raw rice, 1 teaspoon chili powder, 1½ teaspoons salt and ¼ teaspoon pepper. Mix well, cover and simmer over low heat about 1 hour or until rice is tender. Toward the end of cooking, add additional chili powder to taste, and a little water if mixture has cooked down too much. It shouldn't be soupy—but not too dry either.

BEEF-AND-ONION DUMPLINGS

Cost, 69¢ Serves 4.

Fry 1 cup chopped onions in 2 tablespoons shortening or salad oil. Mix ¾ pound ground beef with ⅓ cup soft bread crumbs, ½ cup milk. Season with salt and pepper. Shape into 4 cakes and brown quickly in 1 tablespoon shortening or salad oil. (Only partially cook them.) Now make a biscuit dough: Sift together 2 cups flour, 3 teaspoons baking powder and ½ teaspoon salt. Cut ¼ cup shortening into dry ingredients with pastry blender. Add ⅔ cup milk all at once and mix lightly. Roll out very thin. Cut in 4 squares. Put a spoonful of the fried onions in the center of each square and a meat cake on top of the onions. Fold corners of the dough over the meat and onions and pinch together. Bake on greased cooky sheet 12–15 minutes in hot oven, 450° F., until nicely browned. Serve hot with a mushroom sauce made by heating 1 can condensed mushroom soup thinned with ½ cup milk.

Perhaps the most popular of all economical meat dishes is the stew. Down South they make a beef-and-vegetable potpie with a corn-bread top. A Southern reader sent the recipe to us. We liked it so much, I'm passing it on to you for your collection. You could use a biscuit top, but then it wouldn't be Kentucky Potpie.

Bill had to hang his coat on a "hick'ry limb": the portiere rod!

Five Feet of Closet

—and how they grew from none!

BY JUDY BARRY

"HANG your clothes on a hick'ry limb" was almost literally what Bill and Eleanor Conrad had to do, they found, when they moved into their newly bought house. No closet on the ground floor at all, no linen closet, bedroom closets (only two!) so shallow that it was impossible to hang clothes on a rod in either of them. Bill, who naturally, with his artificial leg, didn't want to climb a flight of stairs every time he came in wearing street clothes, was forced to hang his overcoat on the portiere rod between living room and dining room. Eleanor, worried because that looked so untidy, was even more concerned about what she would do when the children grew older and were running in and out all day.

Frankly, when we first saw the house, we almost felt that no one but a family of nudists could possibly live there comfortably! But we continued to puzzle and measure and roam about with rulers; finally came upon the solutions you see pictured here. Which just goes to prove that where there's a will there's a way, even with anything as baffling as nonexistent closets. Portable closets or wardrobes would have helped temporarily, of course, but since the Conrads owned the house, the permanence of plywood and rocklath seemed preferable, and the initial outlay of money a real investment in living comfort.

Since lack of closet room seems to be a problem shared by many of the houses built before we all realized how important closets are to easy and efficient housekeeping, perhaps it's one of your problems too. Often a jog in a PROBLEM: No closet anywhere on the first floor in which to hang outdoor clothing. The house has no entrance hall, front door opens directly into living room. A mock fireplace jutted out 14 inches between the windows and the staircase. Space from windows to side wall, only 26 inches.

SOLUTION: Mantel taken off, space between windows and center jog utilized for a closet 26 inches deep, 41 inches wide. This left a 12-inch setback, which we used to good effect by placing the desk there, building shelves for books and knickknacks on the wall above it.

PROBLEM: No linen closet anywhere upstairs or down, and no space to make one except in a fairly large bathroom which must also take care of a soiled-clothes hamper. An old-fashioned tub set away from the end wall left a fine space for dust to gather, but which was useless for any other purpose.

SOLUTION: A new recessed tub, placed flush against the end wall, left sufficient room for basin between it and seat. Opposite, a ceiling-high closet was built, 15 inches deep, 36 wide, providing ample shelves for bed linen and towels above a built-in bin for soiled clothes.

PROBLEM: The back bedroom's closet, where the children's clothes are kept, was two doors long, only 12″ deep. Even Lyn's little baby dresses had to hang diagonally.

SOLUTION: Extended in length, built up to the ceiling and out as far as possible, to the window trim, it is now 24″ deep (except where a flue juts out at the end).

wall may offer a suggestion, as it did in the Conrads' living room. The space lost in the room will probably prove negligible compared with the joy of having a place to put things. A depth of 24 inches will take hangers crosswise on a rod comfortably. And if you're building "out" you may as well build "up" to the ceiling, to get storage space on high for seldom-used articles. If the necessary depth of 24 inches for placing hangers crosswise on a rod just isn't available, extension rods may help, but the doorway must be nearly as wide as the closet.

Now that material is a little easier to get, perhaps another look around in nooks and crannies, another consultation with your community's carpenter will enable you, too, to make extra closets grow in your house. You'll be surprised how much easier they make your housekeeping life!

In the Conrads' bedroom, the only closet was 13" deep, 30" wide, completely inadequate for two people's clothing. Again the ugly mantel was removed, and two closets built, each 40" wide, 30" deep (to enclose the old one). A long mirror was placed on each door. The new closets extended out 18" beyond the fireplace jog; the niche thus formed suggested a dressing table.

lents who had just been dismissed from ear-by school. One lad, who had been in Army for a year, said with discouraged lism that he was destined to be a doctor. I hate science. I'm bad at mathematics," said. "But my old man wanted to be a tor and never made it. So I'm going on it, for now anyway."

Ve asked him what he preferred and he us about advice given by his teachers vocational counselors. All agreed that he a pleasing personality, that he got along 1 everybody. They had suggested he e some commercial course, consider he iness training and become a salesman. But I'll probably end up a bad doctor; ch out if you happen to get sick ten years n now!" he said, cheerfully enough.

The general picture would not be so disraging if high-school students appreciated ir limitations. The myth of white-collar eriority is imbedded in American conction, however, and it hasn't changed ch in two decades. In 1926 Dr. George Counts, then of the University of Chicago, estigated occupational preferences among ical high-school students. Last year ethel E. Deeg and Donald G. Paterson, he University of Minnesota, made a sim- sampling and compared the results. ese were published in the January issue of cupations, a journal devoted to vocational oblems.

In 1926 the occupation preferred above all ers was banking; in 1946 it was medicine. e physician and the lawyer were second d third in popularity twenty years ago; t year the banker and the lawyer were d for second place. But after these calls the preferences listed were remarkably ilar. They were:

It might be noted that the banker has dropped in prestige, possibly because he allowed the banks to close in 1933. The law moved up a fraction. Farming slumped still farther in popularity. Faint basis for hope that the tide is shifting may be seen in the fact that such practical callings as those of machinist, electrician, carpenter, plumber and coal miner are ranked higher than they were in 1926. This may be due to the fact that compensation paid these workers is now higher in many communities than teaching and other salaries. All in all, however, the white-collar callings are the ones that the boys and girls of America intend to enter, if they can.

But they can't. They couldn't even if they had the mental equipment. Yet deep in the hearts of American boys and girls—and of their parents too—persists this yearning to enter the "respectable" professions which are so gravely overcrowded. Dr. Harry D. Kitson, of Teachers' College in New York, an authority on vocational guidance, told us that 60 per cent to 70 per cent of each year's Don't be a "pot-watcher" use the Chef!

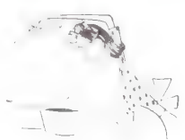
THERE'S A saying, "A watched pot never boils"! Well, here's how you can delegate this task, work on other jobs meanwhile, and get the most flavor out of your cooked vegetables—ALL AT ONCE!



Simply use the CHEF, a combination kitchen clock and alarm that times any household task to a second—and up to an hour! It enables you to be "two places at once" by timing the exact number of seconds vegetables should cook, or muffins bake.

Keeps watch over Pressure Cookers

As you know, asparagus and green beans are "Short Timers" in a pressure cooker. From one to two minutes is plenty. They should come out at the precise second. So you set the CHEF for, say, 90 seconds. When 90 seconds elapse—the alert sounds! Thus the CHEF contributes materially to the appetizing flavor of your vegetables.

Timesaver with Cakes!

Your layer cake takes about 25 minutes' baking. Simply set the CHEF and do your other work, carefree.

When time is up, the CHEF notifies you. Out comes your cake—and you've gained 25 "free" minutes. The CHEF is an invaluable help with all timed chores. In red, green, ivory, and white. A-C only.

Your kitchen needs a "NEW HOSTESS"!—$5.95 (plus tax)

At least, most kitchens need a new, smart, attractively styled kitchen clock with really visible numbers! The "NEW HOSTESS" is your clock. It's self-starting, self-winding. In four colors: red, green, white, ivory. A stand-out value on anybody's wall! General Electric Company, Bridgeport 2, Conn.

high-school graduates sought professional or semiprofessional positions, while hardly more than 7½ per cent of the opportunities were in that classification. In short, some 90 per cent of these young people are doomed to disappointment and frustration.

Doctor Kitson's findings were confirmed by teachers and by the students themselves, by every study we examined, by nearly every vocational counselor with whom we talked. A census of a recent graduating class at the Stamford, Connecticut, high school disclosed that three quarters of the available jobs appealed to less than a fifth of the graduates. Over two thirds sought clerical and professional jobs, while hardly more than 10 per cent obtained them in the two years after leaving school. All the high-school students in Nebraska were similarly questioned. More than 43 per cent of them wanted professional jobs, although only 7 per cent of all the workers in the state were thus employed. In Nebraska, as everywhere, the farm has lost its appeal. Less than 15 per cent of the students wanted to enter agriculture, and this in a state where almost 40 per cent of the people work on farms.

Six high schools in Alabama were also polled, with the same result—that high-school ambitions have small relation to the realities of the working world. Professional jobs were the choice of 36.8 per cent, but only .2 per cent got them after graduation. Only a fraction, .3 per cent, wanted to work on farms, although 39.3 per cent of Alabama's population is doing so.

The story was the same in White Plains, New York, where too many boys in this June's graduating class sought engineering, medicine, accounting and law. Only one of the girls, incidentally, said that she wanted to be a housewife, which probably provesnothing at all among so young a group. "Over-choice of professional and semiprofessional" occupations was also uncovered last year by the Division of Educational Research of the School District of Philadelphia.

The results are shown in this table:

	PERCENTAGE CHOICE OF SENIOR BOYS	PERCENTAGE OF MALES ACTUALLY SO EMPLOYED IN PHILADELPHIA
Professional	32.8	4.8
Engineers	12.4	.7
Doctors	5.3	.7
Teachers	2.7	.5
Designers, draftsmen	4.8	.5
Accountants	3.6	1.4
Salesmen	4.2	8.9
Craftsmen	14.7	20.3
Carpenters	.3	1.2
Truck drivers	.1	5.3
Plumbers	.3	.9

The girls of the same graduating class were slightly more sensible than the boys. Yet 18.8 per cent wanted professional jobs, although only 9.4 per cent of the women working in Philadelphia, according to the 1940 census, held such positions.

In Washington, D. C., the best job opportunities are clerical and in such distributive occupations as retail selling. The 248 students who graduated last June from Eastern High School in the capital were asked to state their vocational intentions. More than half of the boys said they were going to college to enter professions which varied from creative writing to hotel management. About half the girls were also going to college, they said, and ultimately would choose careers ranging from diplomacy to accounting. Or two boys and two girls named retail sellir

In the opinion of William E. Myers, w made this study, which will also be publish in a forthcoming issue of Occupations, mc of these graduates are doomed to disappoir ment. Hardly more than 10 per cent of t employed in Washington are in professior fields. Mr. Myers' opinions were shared l Mrs. Mildred S. Percy and Mrs. Ruth Hall, of the Department of Guidance ar Placement in the District schools. The p mary reason for rejecting selling and facto jobs, they felt, was social prestige.

To ILLUSTRATE this they cited the two so of a leading Washington furrier. One is goi to be a lawyer and the other a doctor. Bo will probably qualify, Mrs. Percy and Mi Hall said, because they are bright. But tl furrier's skill is so rapidly dying in the U. that fur men are petitioning Congress admit Europeans who will enter the trad

It is not only the legitimate, if unwise, d sire to enter such professions as the la and engineering which leads to faulty jo choices. The glamour of such callings as tl stage and modelir influences thousanc of students, parti ularly girls, to try fo them. The nature the glamour job varie from time to time. few years ago, on principal told us, th American girl wante to be an airline hos tess. The work looke exciting. It led, so sh had been told, to rc mance with dashin pilots. Today, fo girls, the greatest lur is unquestionabl modeling and th stage.

For the past seve or eight years model ing has looked lik the easiest road t fame and wealth. Th Powers Girl, the Con over Girl and th Magazine Cover Gir have been publicize in Hollywood and i the theater. So Susie if she has any look at all, resolves to be come one. To get a picture of how likely she is to succeed we visited the Harry Con-over Agency in New York. We were told that between 250 and 300 applicants were interviewed weekly and that letters came from five times that many. The agency has about 2000 models on its books—including grandmothers, babies and men of distinction—and acceptance of one new girl a week is a high average. The girls who work full time may earn over $300 a week, although few of them do. More make $150 or less, working full time. But they have to supply extensive wardrobes. And the professional life of a photographic model is short, because new faces are wanted. Two years is about the limit for most girls.

Susie will keep on trying, of course, for that is the American way. She reminds herself that Lauren Bacall and Joan Caulfield, among others, began their rise as models. But the path to stardom, even to a decent living, is very tough indeed. The census figures again give stern warning against the siren song of Broadway. In the whole United States, in 1940, some 11,000 men and 7000 women were listed as actors. This does not mean they were talented; Uncle Sam's statisticians do not pass on talent. It does mean that they were professional thespians, however, because only people with actual experience in their callings are included in the totals.

Few of the 18,000 "experienced" actors and actresses seem to have done much work in 1939. Only 850 of the actors and 470 of the girls reported incomes in excess of $5000. In New York City, the nation's theatrical center, slightly under 1100 actors had jobs in 1940, while 1200 were looking for work. Some 850 girls said they had jobs, but over 900 were besieging producers' offices. And of the men who were working in 1939 only 168 earned $5000 or more; hardly 100 girls did so.

But Hollywood, with all its gold, is different? Everybody has heard of the staggering sums earned by Clark Gable, Joan Crawford, Gregory Peck and the other stars. These fortunes have an unhappy habit of vanishing into the sea of averages, though. It is true that a lot of actors and actresses haunt the sun-kissed streets of Hollywood, but few, very few, are in the big time. Of the 3700 men only 420 were in the $5000-plus income group in 1939. Only 166 of the 1925 girls were earning that much.

Failure to view the job picture honestly is not limited to city children. Census figures are not broken down to show details about the working populations of small towns and villages. But it cannot be doubted that the desires of their high-school students are identical to those in the big cities.

"THEY are more extreme, if anything," said one teacher, recently the head of a rural school. "They have the additional urge to move to the cities. They think that the sure way to get there is to become engineers or architects or lawyers."

The chances for a professional life are lower, of course, in the rural areas. In Iowa, where 730,000 men were at work, only 31,000 were classified as professional. Of 178,000 employed women in the same state, 33,000 were thus characterized. In Nebraska, where 43 per cent of the students said they wanted professional jobs, 370,000 men were at work. But only 18,000 of them were in the professions. Among 93,000 employed women a few more were rated professional or semiprofessional than for the men.

Over 200,000 Iowans worked on farms as compared with 140 architects, 1700 engineers, 2800 lawyers and about the same number of doctors. So in Nebraska: 116,000 farmers against 1000 engineers, 1750 lawyers and 1500 schoolteachers. Only 40 women practiced law in all of Iowa; only 30 in Nebraska.

The census figures we have used are for 1939 and 1940, the latest available. It is true that the postwar boom has made the job and wage picture brighter today. All experts agree, however, that 1939–40 were better than average years. They offer a fair picture of employment in normal times.

The war with its swollen wages has had a marked influence on the demands of high-school boys and girls for high pay, and has aggravated their difficulties in finding work for which they are qualified. At least 1,000,000 of them took full- or part-time jobs in munitions and other plants. Large numbers of these are finishing their educations, but are thinking about jobs. They remember their lucrative pay and reject the lower rates now being offered them. They do not realize that during the war employers, desperate for help because of acute labor shortages, cut their work standards drastically.

The records of all employment offices are jammed with cases of former war workers who are finding adjustment to peace very difficult. In Utica, New York, Jean left high school in her third year for work on an assembly line which paid $45 a week. V-E Day terminated the work, and Jean applied vainly for a similar job. Fortunately, she had sense. She agreed to take a daytime post as a salesgirl and to complete her education by taking commercial courses three nights a week.

But Andrew, living in Troy, New York, protested volubly when told that he could not hope to continue operation of a crane at 90 cents an hour. An employment counselor learned that Andrew had pursued woodcarving as a hobby and suggested that he fill an opening as a carpenter's apprentice in an upholstery shop. He scorned the 55-cents-an-hour wage, however, and did nothing for three months. Another boy in upstate New York left high school at seventeen with a little training in radio. It was inadequate for job purposes, but he demanded $35 a week and turned down all the posts for which he was really qualified.

Dr. John W. Walsh, principal of the enormous DeWitt Clinton High School in the Bronx, told us that he had discerned an increasing degree of unjustified conceit among a minority of his boys. They had swollen ideas of their ability and importance, he thought. Clinton is a school which prepares primarily for college. Yet half of the boys do not stick it out to graduation. Among the ones who do go to college, Doctor Walsh said, too many do so merely because they think a college education will put them in higher-income brackets.

The most extreme case of conceit and confusion we encountered was that of a boy in Washington who had informed his vocational adviser that he intended to become a Latin teacher. She was puzzled, because his grades in the subject were only fair. She suggested that we talk with him. When we saw him, Robert airily repeated his decision. Why?

"Because I can make $10,000 a year," he said.

Yet the influence of the war has not been wholly evil in so far as realistic education of young people is concerned. Its most important contribution was stimulation of the school-work programs throughout the country. These programs vary greatly in quality. Sometimes they are merely a device whereby children of inferior mentality are persuaded to stay in school a year or two longer. Occasionally they make possible the industrial exploitation of young people, disguised as education. We ran into a large number of first-rate school-work projects, however, and heard about others. The Federal Government is encouraging their spread with $35,000,000 in funds this year. The states are putting up two and a half times as much.

Deep concern is felt at the United States Office of Education over the glaring disparity between vocational aspirations and the jobs which exist. In January, 1944, Commissioner John W. Studebaker appointed a committee of eminent educators to study the problem. As much pressure as possible—too much brings protests against Federal interference—is being applied to persuade state school systems to expand and improve their vocational schools and courses.

Dr. Harry A. Jaeger, chief of the Occupational Information and Guidance Service of the Office of Education, feels that some progress has been made. He thinks that in possibly 3000 out of the country's 27,000 high schools excellent systems of vocational guidance are operating.

"A lot remains to be done," Doctor Jaeger said to us. "Vocational guidance should start in the elementary school. It's there that the teacher gets intimate knowledge of her pupils. She should note any special habits, good or bad. The file then begun should follow the boy or girl through high school.

"Many aptitudes, or their lack, are discoverable at an early age," Doctor Jaeger continued. "Merely to give intelligence or other

The old lady who was about to die called Lucile, her niece, and said: "Lucile, I'm going to die, and I don't want anyone to be fooling about it. When you come to lay me out, I want to be laid out in my black silk dress; but take out the back panel and make yourself a dress from it."

Lucile said, "Oh, Aunt Dorothy, I don't want to do that. When you and Uncle William walk up the golden stairs I don't want people to see you without any back in your dress."

"They won't look at me," the old lady replied. "I buried your Uncle William without his pants."

Happy colors make meals brighter with Niblets Brand whole kernel corn adding fresh color and tender, young flavor

Colors as gentle as spring in this meal of breast of guinea hen on Virginia ham, with the soft gold of Niblets Brand whole kernel corn for sunniness. The centerpiece in tender shades of green is simply a formal arrangement of any young, growing things from your garden, fruits and vegetables picked green—little green apples, grapes, pears, quinces, green tomatoes, strawberries, pea pods, cucumbers.

In the summer fields where the corn grows for Niblets Brand Corn, there comes a moment when soil and sun have given all they can of tenderness and flavor to the young kernels (grown from our exclusive breed, D-138).

That is the moment we work and watch for. A refractometer test of the kernels tells us when it has arrived. Then we get the corn from field to kernel to can in record time—"picked and packed at the fleeting moment of perfect flavor" to give you the sweet, tender flavor of just-picked corn the year around.

many communities start vocational ice at the primary-school level. But lelphia does. Robert C. Taber, director Division of Pupil Personnel and Coun- , described the system which was started ears ago. Mr. Taber had served as a probation officer in the Philadelphia juvenile courts and had become convinced that much delinquency and even more mental difficulties stemmed from the frustrations of the wrong job.

In the Philadelphia elementary schools, he said, 107 full-time vocational counselors are employed; in the high schools, 109. Observation of Johnny's abilities and faults begins in his kindergarten class. If he reads slowly during the next two or three years, an attempt is made to learn the reason. Parents are encouraged to visit his classes. It may turn out that Johnny, although no scholar, is especially skilled with his hands. He may then be persuaded to go to some vocational school where he can learn a trade.

Like the New York City school authorities, Mr. Taber believes in having children of non-college type take part-time work in the latter years of their schooling. This minimizes the strangeness of office or factory. It gives the child some knowledge of the higher standards of the outside world.

"He learns," Mr. Taber observed, "that seventy per cent isn't a passing grade."

Baltimore also begins vocational guidance in the elementary schools. Dr. Charles W. Sylvester, director of the work, told us that counselors visited as many homes as they could. The importance of this lies in obtaining the confidence of the parents. He has learned, with the years, that proud fathers are not nearly so insistent upon making bankers or lawyers out of their sons when vocational counselors, who really know the boys, advise against it.

Too Many White Collars?

IT'S not only the youngsters who glorify professional status; the same tendency exists among the whole population!

A survey conducted by the American Institute of Public Opinion (Gallup Poll) supplies resounding statistical support for the Pringles' observation that a large part of the responsibility for young people's yen for the professions must be shared by parents.

In the Gallup survey, this question was submitted to a cross section of the nation's adults: "If you had a son with ability and he could have any training he wanted, what business, profession, trade or occupation would you most like to have him take up if he wanted your advice?"

Specific replies mounted to 76 per cent; of these, only 10 per cent named farming or a trade! In contrast, about half named such professions as medicine, the law, the clergy, and the like. (The rest of the 76 per cent said business, or named a field of activity in which the individual's status depends on his own particular work. The non-specific replies included a group who had no opinion, a realistic 7 per cent who would let the son decide for himself, and a miscellaneous category.)

Here are the details of the specific replies:

	Per Cent
Medicine	25
Engineering	9
Law	7
Farming	6
Clergy	5
Go in business, be a merchant	4
Be a mechanic or electrician	4
Teaching	3
Science (chemistry, physics)	3
Others, each named by 1 per cent (Architecture, real estate, journalism, radio, advertising, accounting, Army, air transport, dentistry, sales)	10

To be sure, the wording of the question is such that it probably encourages people to name the employment they consider most desirable, rather than the one they consider most likely, since it assumes a son with ability and the opportunity for training; but that is exactly the point. When the adults of the country assume they have free choice, somewhere around half of them would like to steer their sons into professions!

Note, too, that this survey embraced a cross section of the adult population, meaning that the great majority of persons interviewed in the survey were not themselves professional workers! (For in a cross-section survey, the proportion of people interviewed in each type of occupation must correspond to the proportion engaged in that occupation in the whole population; and the great mass of the nation's employed are nonprofessional.)

Rector's MOR Recipes

Pan-fried MOR and Eggs

Cut one can of MOR into ten slices. Melt 1 tbsp. fat in a skillet, add MOR slices, and brown on both sides. Serve with fried eggs. Serves five.

MOR Cheeseburgers

Pan-fry MOR slices on one side, turn, and place a square slice of cheese over each two slices of MOR. Continue cooking until second side of MOR is browned and cheese is softened. Place half of a toasted bun, cut side down, on the cheese and with a pancake turner flip the sandwich, bun side down, onto a serving plate. Serves five.

So Simple—

AND SIMPLY DELICIOUS

Tis but a step high in "taste tempters" for breakfasts and lunches, just try "MOR and." You'll be surprised how crisp-fried MOR complements the sunny eggs. And for a snack in a hurry or a tasty lunch, whip up some quick MOR cheeseburgers. These simple recipes are here for your convenience.

Wilson's MOR is the handy meat for many tasty and convenient dishes. Made of fine pork shoulder meat—with nothing added to change the delicate ham-like flavor—it's processed and seasoned the exclusive Wilson way. You always have meat in the house when there's MOR in the pantry. For breakfast, for lunch, for dinner, it gives you the satisfying goodness of meat with the same vitamins and minerals with which pork is so richly supplied. Only Wilson makes MOR—first in flavor. New York City, with its wealth and huge pulation, can afford special vocational ools which prepare for the automotive,

Miss Evelyn Murray, of the New York ate Employment Service, is in close touch th New York's vocational program. She ls that outside work on the co-operative an is essential. Otherwise the training nds to be purely theoretical. The girl who s merely taken a commercial course in gh school, Miss Murray thinks, does not quire high-enough standards of speed and curacy to meet the requirements of the siness world.

It certainly seemed to us that the girl students, at least, who were working outside were far above the average in appearance and grooming. At Julia Richman, for example, the trend is toward trim suits, neat frocks and long stockings rather than bobby socks and flying shirttails. Why not? They are professional women in the true meaning of the word. Since 1929, co-operative course pupils in the New York schools have earned over $4,000,000. Last year alone, their salaries came to $588,000.

THE New York authorities have made no inquiry on how the students spend the money they earn, perhaps on the excellent theory that it is nobody's business. Mr. Dillon did so for the National Child Labor Committee in San Francisco and Los Angeles, however, and the figures are probably typical enough. About 500 girls and boys gave details of their budgets in San Francisco, with the following allocation of their monthly earnings last year:

Contribution to home	$15.26
War bonds, stamps	7.28
Savings account	8.41
Clothes	9.90
Spending money	11.79
	$52.64

The figures for Los Angeles were very similar. The boy or girl who can average $15.69 monthly in War bonds and savings out of $52.64 in earnings would seem to be acquiring excellent habits of thrift.

Happy marriages do not get into the newspapers. A New York physician asked a hundred married men and a hundred married women this question: "If by some miracle you could press a button and find that you had never been married to your husband or wife, would you press the button?"

One hundred and thirty out of the two hundred said "No." Sixteen said "No, with qualification." And only twenty-eight said "Yes."

—DEAN INGE A Rustic Moralist (Putnam & Co.)

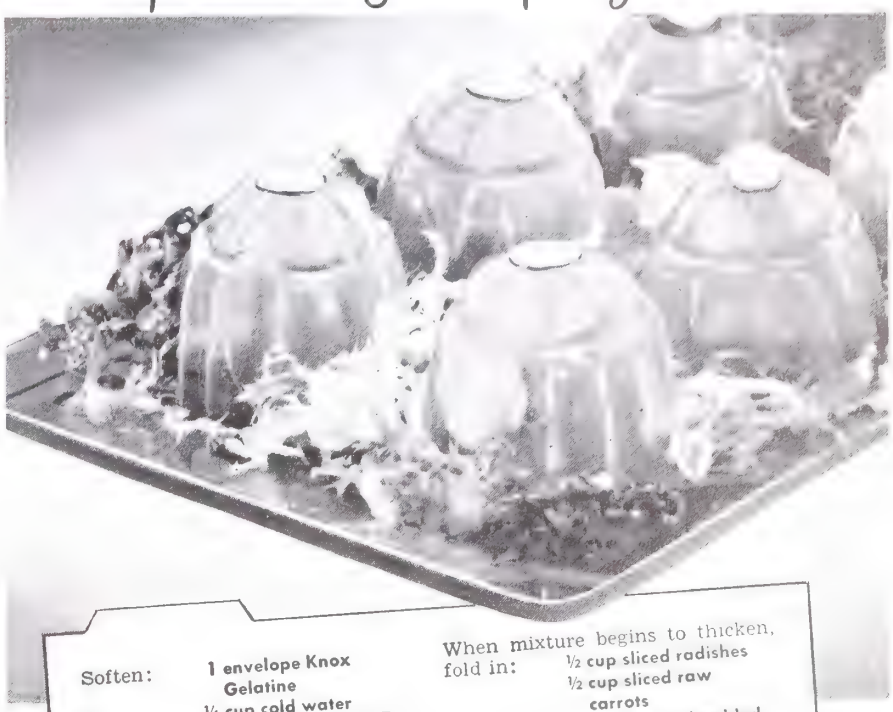
A neglected field in vocational-guidance programs has been in the distributive and service occupations; that is, retail trade and such callings as the operation of filling stations, cleaning establishments and restaurants. People drift into them with no training and rapidly join the 50 per cent of proprietors who fail in business the first year. Yet it is an enormous and growing field, of particular appeal to the boy or girl who cherishes independence. The census listed 2,400,000 men working as "proprietors, managers and officials" in 1940, and 430,000 women. Most, but not all, of these were running a small business.

Such vocational experts as Mr. Taber of Philadelphia are aware that more must be done to train boys and girls for business. Federal funds can now be used for courses to that end. New York City, again, appears to be in the lead in affirmative action. A selected group of 500 students chosen from fifteen vocational high schools is already taking a new course called "Small Business Management." Associate Superintendent George F. Pigott, Jr., in charge of vocational high schools, explained its purpose.

A good many boys and girls have real, if latent, talent for running establishments, he said. But "young people have never been told how, and as a result they open a garage or a beauty parlor with a large floral wreath in the window, and six months later they are closed. After such an experience you often find a frustrated individual who is receptive to all kinds of ideologies."

Happiness is not pursued successfully through the bankruptcy courts. The path to it does not lie in being a lawyer without clients or a doctor without patients. Nobody is so wretched as the incompetent man in the job too big for him. The square peg does not lie comfortably in the round hole. Last September the JOURNAL published the results of a nation-wide survey on the circumstances of day-to-day existence which, generally speaking, make for happiness or its lack. This revealed that 70 per cent of the happy people liked their jobs and got satisfaction out of their work. Only 35 per cent of the unhappy did so. Thus, today's educational system is doing far less than it should to bring happiness, in the years ahead, to the boys and girls of America. THE END

My! What a good "spring salad"



Soften: 1 envelope Knox Gelatine in: ¼ cup cold water
Dissolve over boiling water. Remove from heat.
Combine: 1½ cups tomato juice, 1 tablespoon sugar, 1 teaspoon salt, ⅛ teaspoon pepper, 2 tablespoons lemon juice
Stir in dissolved gelatine. Chill.
When mixture begins to thicken, fold in: ½ cup sliced radishes, ½ cup sliced raw carrots, ½ cup thinly shredded cabbage, 4 minced scallions
Pour into large or individual molds that have been rinsed in cold water. Chill. When firm, unmold on crisp salad greens. Serve with dressing, and, if you like, deviled eggs. Serves 6.

When to add vegetables to gelatine

ORANGE JUICE
PACKED FOR YOU BY THE GROWERS THEMSELVES

QUICK AND EASY for Two

BY LOUELLA G. SHOUER

THE domestic instinct may be very strong in you, but along about now, when the days are warm and balmy, enthusiasm for cooking and dress meals begins to peter out. It's express meals you want now with no local stops—at least several nights in the week. With so many canned and frozen foods to help out, you can have good little dinners with a minimum of trouble. Here are some that are really "rapid transit."

Broaden Your Tastes

Shrimps de Jonge
Artichokes With Lemon Butter
Melba Toast
Fruit Salad
Coffee

You aim to try a special dish now and then if it fits into your time to cook and is easy to do. This shrimp casserole should measure up to all requirements; and while you're in this adventurous mood you might try a different vegetable too. If you're an old hand at cooking and eating artichokes, it still is a good taste choice with the shrimps. In another month they won't be quite so plentiful, so have them while you may. Later fresh asparagus takes their place.

SHRIMPS DE JONGE

Mash 1 small clove garlic with ½ teaspoon salt. (It's quickly done, as the salt seems to liquefy the garlic.) Add 6 tablespoons butter or margarine, a dash of Tabasco sauce and ½ cup fine dry bread crumbs—buy them already prepared in a package—1 tablespoon lemon juice and 3 tablespoons milk. Blend together smoothly. Clean 1 package frozen cooked shrimps, thawed, or 1 can shrimps, drained. In 2 individual baking dishes, place alternate layers of the shrimps and bread-crumb mixture. Sprinkle a little chopped parsley over the top of each. Bake in hot oven, 400°F., 20–25 minutes.

ARTICHOKES—LEMON BUTTER

If you've never cooked an artichoke, there are a few things you might like to know. The large ones are the meatiest. Plan on 1 apiece. Select those with tightly packed leaves or petals, as you do a solid head of cabbage. If the leaves look dry and brown, pass on to the next vegetable stand. Cut off the bottom stem or stump and remove some of the bottom leaves. Wash thoroughly under a running faucet and then in a pan of water. If you had time, you could let them stand awhile in cold salted water. Cook whole in boiling salted water until soft—about 20–25 minutes. Italian cooks add a clove of garlic and a few tablespoons olive oil to the cooking water, but you'll have the flavor of garlic in the shrimp dish tonight and won't want it twice. Save this idea for another time. Drain artichokes upside down. Spread center leaves apart and remove and discard the choke, which is the fuzzy portion down in the center. If your husband knows his artichokes he can leave it to be done at table. Serve the artichokes on separate plates with little saucedishes for lemon butter—2 parts melted butter or margarine to 1 part lemon juice. Since all you're having on your dinner plates are the individual casseroles of shrimp, your table won't be crowded, as you're having the salad for dessert. To eat the artichokes, pull off the leaves—dip them in lemon butter. You eat only the white, tender portion at the end, though what there is of it is wonderful. Your reward is the meaty heart at the base. The best shall be yet.

What to do? Well, here's a meal that you can serve with pride and ease. It isn't going to take any skill or time because you're going to be smart and do hardly any cooking.

The stir-frying method of cooking used by the Chinese is really quick. Meats and vegetables are cut or shredded beforehand. The meats are not cooked long enough to toughen them, or the vegetables to lose their crispness. The secret is in having everything ready for the dish before you start the cooking. Try this one and see if you don't approve.

CHINESE PEPPER STEAK WITH RICE

Buy a thin ¾-pound slice top round of beef. Cut diagonally against the grain in thin slivers or strips. Cut 2 green peppers into thin strips—it's quicker than dicing. Cut enough celery into thin crosswise slices to make ½ cup; mince 2 tablespoons onion and 1 clove garlic. Now you're ready to start the cooking. Put 2 tablespoons salad oil in a skillet. When it's good and hot, put in beef. Stir quickly over high heat until beef is seared and brown. Add the onion, garlic, green peppers and celery. Add ½ cup consommé or stock made from hot water and bouillon cube or meat paste. Season with salt and pepper. Cover pan. Turn down heat to moderate and cook just 5 minutes. Thicken with 2 teaspoons cornstarch blended with 2 tablespoons water and 1 teaspoon soy sauce. Simmer 5 minutes more. Serve immediately with freshly boiled rice.

Do you know about the frozen pineapple chunks? They are a newish item on the long list of prepared frozen foods, and a nice change for dessert. We like them best when they aren't completely thawed—still refreshingly icy. They are already sweetened. If you are going to add anything at all, let it be chopped mint.

MIXED GRILL OF CHICKEN

For your grill tonight, use ½ broiler, ½ raw tomato and ½ cooked potato apiece. Marinate the chicken halves in French dressing. Cut the cooked potato in half lengthwise. Dot with butter or margarine and season with salt and pepper. If you didn't cook an extra potato yesterday, or didn't have potatoes on your menu anyway, substitute mushroom caps. Remove blossom end of 1 tomato and cut it in half crosswise. Dot with butter or margarine and sprinkle with dill or chopped chives. Start broiling your chicken first, as it takes 20–25 minutes or so to get it tender. Have the heat moderate or chicken will dry out. About 8 minutes before chicken is done, put potato and tomato halves on broiler.

AVOCADO HALVES WITH ORANGE SECTIONS— COTTAGE-CHEESE DRESSING

Peel a ripe avocado and cut it in half lengthwise; remove the pit. Sprinkle each half lightly with salt. Fill cavity of each with orange sections. Serve on salad greens with a cottage-cheese dressing—quick to make: Thin ¼ pound cottage cheese with 2 tablespoons lemon juice; add ¼ teaspoon sugar and a little salt. Beat with rotary beater.

A Betty Crocker Double-Quick New Method Recipe

BAKED ON MERINGUE CAKE

Pour Cake Batter (recipe below) into a generously greased and floured round layer pan, 9-in. diameter, 1½-in. deep. Pile Meringue (recipe below) lightly and evenly over batter. Bake about 40 min. in moderate oven (350°). When done, let cool in pan on wire rack for 10 minutes. Then, loosen sides from pan and invert on palm of hand and place . . . right side up . . . on wire rack to finish cooling. Serve covered generously with sweetened berries. Other toppings that may be used are ice cream, custard sauce, whipped cream, or home canned fruit.

CAKE BATTER—For success—4 "musts"—

(1) Have all ingredients room temperature. (2) Preheat oven to 350° (moderate). (3) Measure level for accuracy. (4) Sift SOFTASILK Cake Flour, then spoon lightly into cup and level off. Do not pack.

Sift together into bowl . . . . . 1 cup sifted SOFTASILK Cake Flour, ⅔ cup sugar, 1½ tsp. double-action baking powder, ½ tsp. salt

Add . . . . . 3 tbsp. high grade vegetable shortening, ¼ cup milk, ¼ tsp. lemon extract, ¼ tsp. vanilla

Beat vigorously with spoon for 2 minutes by clock (about 150 strokes per minute). You may rest a moment when beating by hand; just count actual beating time or strokes. Or mix with electric mixer on slow to medium speed for 2 minutes. Scrape sides and bottom of bowl frequently.

Add . . . . . ¼ cup more milk, 2 egg yolks

Beat 2 more minutes.

MERINGUE. Beat until frothy 2 egg whites; add ¼ tsp. cream of tartar. Continue beating until stiff enough to hold a point. Gradually beat in ½ cup sugar.

Long, Long Ago...

1903—CHARMING MAXINE ELLIOTT, lovely actress, was the toast of the winter season in New York. Society also praised a famed yachtsman and tea merchant, Sir Thomas Lipton.

Miss Elliott delighted playgoers in the role of Georgiana Carley. Sir Thomas added to their pleasure a most enjoyable new blend of tea, perfected in his Ceylon gardens —brisk-flavored Lipton Tea.

1947—TERESA WRIGHT is one of the stars in Samuel Goldwyn's all-star production, "THE BEST YEARS OF OUR LIVES."

TERESA SAYS, "Sir Thomas created a really satisfying tea. So fresh, so spirited. I love it!"

The reason, Teresa, is this. Lipton's is brisk. Brisk means richer flavor—a pleasing result of Lipton's own way of blending as many as 18 different teas.

No wonder there's a delightful difference that makes Lipton Tea America's favorite. Try it. You'll enjoy it.

the window for a moment while her cheeks stung. Then she cleared her throat.

"Was there any mail today?" she asked with an effort at cheerfulness. "What do you hear from your mother?"

Angela slowly turned her head and looked at her stepmother. "I don't think," she said, "that I care to discuss my mother with you."

I mustn't allow myself to be so touchy, Jessie thought, but the adrenalin of anger poured into her blood stream and raced throbbing to her fingers. She's young—she's Todd's daughter—she doesn't know any better.

"Why, child," she said, trying hard to be calm, to be reasonable, "I don't want to discuss your mother. I don't know her and I never shall. I was only making conversation. We don't either of us seem to have much of a gift for conversation, do we?"

I would like to tell her, Jessie thought, that everything I know about her mother has been most uncomplimentary. And she has brought her daughter up to be rude, ungracious and insulting.

The girl bent her head, obviously getting back to her letter writing, and her hair fell half across her face, hiding her smooth pale cheek. She looked now exactly like one of those high-school youngsters in class today, head bent over the quiz paper, clumsily trying to concentrate on the Punic Wars. She was the same age too. What was the matter with her?

Jessie stood by the desk while her heart beat out the seconds, telling herself that she couldn't go on feeling as she did about this girl.

"You have beautiful hair, Angela," she said, and lightly brushed her hand against it.

The movement Angela made was so violent and so sudden that Jessie started. Angela had jerked her head away as if there were contamination in the touch, and now sat staring straight ahead. "Please don't," she said in an ugly tone.

Jessie hurried blindly toward her bedroom, her eyes full of tears. But at the door she stopped, her hand on the knob. No, she thought bitterly, I won't hide in my room and cry. I won't let her hurt me like this. Todd will be here by six. I'll tell him that he'll have to send her away—home to her mother. I don't have to let her stay here. She took a deep breath and distinctly felt the fluttering in her stomach.

STEPMOTHER! A hateful stepmother. She had been so sure she would never be like this. Where was her intelligence? Why couldn't she cope with a simple emotional problem like having an unwelcome, ungracious girl in her house?

She had looked forward to knowing Todd's daughter. She had been prepared to love her. And look what happened. She wondered if she really hated the girl—yet. How can you tell the exact moment when dislike becomes hate?

"Angela," she said as firmly as she could, placing her back against the bedroom door, "your father will be here in about an hour. One of the things he likes best about his home is that I keep it rather nice. So will you please pick up your things and put them away? I shouldn't like him to see this room the way it is now."

The girl did not move. Finally she said, "I haven't any place to put them."

"Hang them in the coat closet. It mu obvious that we haven't a guest roon you." She went swiftly to the couch an gan to fold the blankets.

What will I do, she thought, if she jus there and won't move?

But Angela got up and carried an ar of clothes to the closet. Jessie was s lieved she thumped the pillows with v

"You know, Angela," she said, and ticed that there was only the slightest tre in her voice, "I've been thinking about and trying to understand you. I can un stand that you might resent the idea of father's marrying again. But now that know me, I hoped you'd get over that ing. Your father was divorced for three y before I ever met him."

Angela seemed concentrated on pic up her clothes.

"You can see for yourself that w happy together," Jessie added after a pa She picked up three ash trays and took t into the kitchen to wash. When she c back she said, "Angela, how long are planning to stay with us?"

"My mother said you wouldn't know first thing about hospitality. But it so l pens that I'm visiting my father. I ha right to visit father, if I please.'

"It's rather a point," Jessie s quickly, above agitation that lea up in her aga "Your father is a from Mondays u Fridays, and t apartment has b in my name for se years. So, of ne sity, you are visit me too."

Angela kept a st born silence.

"I'm sure t when you are mar and have a hom your own, you'll w to feel that you your husba share ——"

Suddenly the was crying. Te were already runn down her cheeks the time she co run to the bathro and shut the door.

Now what have I said? Jessie wonder The water was going furiously into the t so Angela must be sobbing and covering sound.

At any rate, this was the first human action the girl had shown. Always befo she had seemed as impervious as sh metal. Somewhere there must be a crack her armor. Perhaps when she comes out sh be softened up, and I can try again.

But when Jessie picked up a pair of w stockings hanging on the back of a cha with the varnish turned white from the mo ture, she was instantly so angry that s knew she would not try again. Surely a girl eighteen years old knew better than hang wet stockings on a varnished cha Either her mother hadn't taught her ar thing at all, or else Angela had hung th there deliberately to mark the chair.

Quickly she finished straightening t room and went into the kitchen to start d ner. After a while she heard Angela set the ironing board in the living room, a later she smelled the iron scorching son thing. She and Angela did not look at ea other or speak as she came and went, setti three places at the table.

At last Todd's key turned in the loc Angela ran to meet him with an "Oh, dadd daddy, I'm so glad to see you" that sound as if he had been away since before the w instead of since Monday. She threw her arm

Thrush Song

BY ANN WILLIAMS

Ah, there, it comes again, as it has done
Down through our years;
So tense, so sweet, till mind
And heart are numb with joy and pulse is one
With fullest measure of a breath, then twined
About each cell the blood's dark cinnamon
Spins aching outward thin ribbons to bind
This moment.
So shall it be some other spring
A thousand years from now should one thrush sing.

around his neck before he could set down his bag, and she kissed him with fervor.

"Well, well, how's my big girl?" Todd said heartily, while Jessie, waiting at the door to the kitchen, wondered uneasily if she could be jealous. Of her husband's own daughter. Surely not.

"The iron is scorching, Angela," she said.

Now Todd came to her, taking big steps across the little room, and put his arms around her and kissed her unresponsive lips.

"And how is my other big girl?" he asked. "Angela," he said, lifting his head and sniffing, "what's that you're burning? You're as bad as your mother. She used to burn up my shirts, with a smell just like that. . . . Well, teacher, are you glad to see me?"

She felt a foolish little prickle of pleasure where he had put his hand on the back of her neck. The tension loosened, and in a warm flush of gratitude to Todd, she found she could laugh. She was so glad he was here, big and natural and not all tied up with complex feelings. He wasn't ever going to be rich, he wasn't the most brilliant man in the world. But he was just the kind of man she had always wanted—nice-looking and sweet, and good to her.

"I've got your favorite dinner," she said, standing in his arms, her voice full of the soft confidence of one who is beloved. "It's all ready."

"Good, good. Come on, Angela, my girl," he said, rubbing his hands and eying the table. "Let's eat some of this good cooking and put some meat on your bones, honey."

Jessie slid into her chair and Todd sat down. They waited for Angela.

"I don't care for any dinner, thank you," Angela said, and they turned to look at her. She was settled in the armchair, and now she opened a magazine. "I had a sundae this afternoon."

"Sundae or no sundae," Todd boomed, "come eat some lamb chops and baked potatoes." He rose and picked her up with his quick, strong movements, swung her around once, and set her in her chair at the table. "Don't argue with your old man," he said with a big smile that showed his even, healthy teeth. Everything about him was clean and strong, Jessie thought with pride.

He rubbed his hand hard across the top of Angela's head, and she tipped her face up and smiled at him. She didn't jerk away from him.

"Well, Angela," he said, sitting down, "having any fun? What have you been doing with yourself all week?"

"Oh, nothing much," she said indifferently.

Jessie kept her eyes on her plate as she said, "I thought Angela would enjoy meeting some of the seniors. We could ask some over for an evening. But Angela didn't want to."

"Why, sure. Why not, Angela?"

"I just don't care to," she said coolly. "What I really want, daddy," she began, turning on the charm, gazing into his face, ignoring Jessie, "I have a friend—a friend from home who is out here, and I'd like to have my friend come and visit me for a while. Could I, daddy?"

"Can your friend sleep standing up?" Todd asked, grinning.

"Well, daddy, you're away all week, and ——"

The nerve of this girl! Jessie thought. It isn't inconvenient enough for her to move in on me, uninvited. Now she wants to bring another one, and she hasn't the decency even to ask me—she asks him. He doesn't have to put up with any of the trouble or the mess or the unpleasantness. After all, I'm the hostess.

"I'm afraid, Angela," she said, biting off her words, "that you don't know how much you're asking. I'm sorry, but we can't accommodate another guest."

A triangle of silence held the three of them until Todd said, "It's a pretty small apartment. Why don't you have her to dinner some night and go to the movies?"

Silence again. Angela pushed her food around on her plate and glared at Jessie. Jessie tried not to look up.

"How about the movies tonight, girls?" Todd asked with good-humored enthusiasm, and Jessie wondered if he was unaware of the strain in the air. "What would you like to see?"

"Oh, daddy! Let's not go to movies. Let's go skating!" Angela jumped up from the table and wound her arms around his neck. "Remember the time you took me to the roller rink when I was eleven years old? Let's go again tonight. You're a good skater."

"An old man like me?" But he seemed pleased by her obvious flattery, Jessie noted with disgust.

"You're not old, and you're the best-looking man I know, and I'm proud of my daddy." Now she had her cheek against his.

I'm not jealous, Jessie told herself. This girl is his daughter and it's natural that she's fond of him—if she is fond of him, and not just putting on an act. It wouldn't be decent of me to be jealous. Oh, I wish I knew what is the matter.

"What do you say, Jessie?" Todd was asking. "Want to roller skate?"

"Can you skate?" Angela said to Jessie, as if it were beyond the realm of possibility.

"No, thanks, people. You two go ahead. I'll grade my papers, and potter around. You can have Todd all to yourself, Angela. Don't let him break any old bones."

See, she thought with determination, I can be generous. I'll let her have him the whole week end. Tomorrow he can take her to Palm Springs, and Sunday they can go on a picnic to the mountains. They'll have fun together. There will be other week ends when I can see him. She'll know that I want her to have a good time before she goes home.

Jessie had gone to bed Sunday night when they got back. Todd came into the bedroom and sat down on the edge of the bed.

"Have a good time?" she asked.

He grunted. "Honey," he said, "I have to leave early in the morning. I just wanted to say—uh—well—see if you can be especially nice to Angela. Sort of strain yourself. You know what I mean. She thinks you don't like her."

JESSIE felt the stiffening of her legs, her arms, her shoulders. She looked intently at him and saw the troubled frown between his eyes. So Angela had regaled him with innuendoes and accusations all yesterday and today. Be nice to Angela! How could he sit right here, within a foot of her, and not sense that it was only the strongest self-control that kept her from saying loudly, "I don't like her. I hate her. I can't stand her!"

He smiled apologetically and bent over to take off his shoes.

Carefully, so that it would sound casual, she said, "Todd, how long is she going to stay?"

"Oh, I dunno. Why?"

"You don't think she's planning to live with us, do you?"

"Oh, no," he said carelessly. "She lives with her mother."

He was very tired and went right to sleep and she didn't get to talk to him at all. The next morning he left early. She had only a few minutes to drink a cup of coffee with him.

On the way out, he stopped beside the couch where Angela was asleep. "So long, kiddo," he whispered, and tiptoed out without turning around again.

Jessie dressed for school very quietly, not to wake Angela, gathered up her marked papers, her keys, her purse, and started through the living room.

But now, perversely, Angela was awake and sitting up. "I just wanted to tell you," she said in the impersonal tone she used for addressing Jessie, "that when you come home this afternoon, I won't be here."

"Oh." Jessie hesitated. If she asked any questions, Angela would think she was prying into what was none of her business. "Well," she asked, "will you be here for dinner?"

"No. I'm going away for a few days."

Jessie asked nothing, said nothing.

"I'm going up to Oakland."

She had the table set for two and dinner ready by the time Todd came Friday evening. His first words were, "Hello, honey—where's Angela?"

He didn't know about Angela's visit until Jessie told him.

"And she didn't tell you this friend's name, or address, in Oakland?" he asked.

"No. She tells me nothing. She does as she pleases. She came out here without asking us, you remember."

He took out a cigarette, looked at it, and then put it back. "I've been a rotten father."

She took his arm and started toward the table. "Well, darling, I don't think this is the time for you to get a hard case of delayed parenthood. Let's have dinner."

"I suppose I'm responsible for her while she's here, though. Her mother would raise Cain if anything happened to her."

"What could happen to her?" She meant the question to be rhetorical and reassuring, but it wasn't.

"Well, look, honey," he said, "she's eighteen. You don't suppose there's a man mixed up in this anywhere, do you?"

Jessie gasped. "Why, Todd! What a thing to say about your daughter."

He shrugged. "She's human. She's a big girl. Nobody knows anything about her—where she is, who her friend is, anything."

"Oh, no!"

"Stop being a schoolteacher, Jessie. Lots of girls get crazy over a man. I just think we ought to find out what goes on. I hate to do it, but I'll have to call her mother. Maybe she knows something about this Oakland deal."

He tried to put the call through, but the operator called back to tell him there was no Mrs. Lucy Morrison listed in the town of Fuller, Illinois.

"Listen, operator," he said pleasantly, although his fingers were drumming fast, "I know there is. It's a little town. You tell the local operator, and she'll find her. This is Mr. Morrison, and I must get in touch with Mrs. Morrison."

He held the receiver and waited. "I'd rather take a licking than talk to her," he said to Jessie and went on drumming the table. Then he noticed that he was doing it and stopped. He picked up a pencil and started marking on the pad.

"Hello? Lucy? This is Todd. They tried to tell me you weren't listed ——" A voice began coming over the wire with such vibration that he held the receiver an inch away from his ear. "Listen, Lucy, I just wanted to ask you ——" The voice came again. "Yes, she's fine. She's not here, just —— Listen, will you be quiet a minute —— Yes, yes, but do you know a friend of Angela's in Oakland?"

He was furiously drawing squares and triangles and jagged lines on the telephone pad, and his face was flushed.

Jessie could hear the voice on the wire, talking fast and continuously, and once she could distinguish the words, "'All right, go on out to your father,' I said, 'if you think ——'" The flood of talk went on and on, with Todd interrupting once in a while to shout a question. At last he hung up and dried his hands on his handkerchief.

"She's married again," he said.

ago, and that's why her name's not in the phone book. Married some guy that Angela didn't like, so Angela wanted to come out here, and came. Lucy doesn't know anybody in Oakland, but she says maybe the Davis boy is there. Angela was crazy about him when he was in the Navy, and he's not around. Lucy says it's just like me to let Angela go running after Pete Davis. Says I should have looked after her. She's having a fit." He rubbed his hand over his face. "I don't know why it is," he went on, "but I can't stand that woman. I got so that everything she did or didn't do, everything she said and the way she said it, rubbed me the wrong way."

He sat nervously fingering the telephone. Jessie had never seen him upset like this. Usually he was so easygoing that she thought he had no nerves. Now she came close and took his hand between hers. "I know, Todd. I'm that way too. I'm ashamed of it, but I can't seem to help it." She could tell him right now how she felt about Angela and he would understand.

He pulled her nearer, his arms around her waist. "When I think of all those years I lost," he said to her. "If I'd only met you twenty years ago instead of five ——"

She cradled his head in her arms and her throat began to ache as if she wanted to cry. Todd was here, and he loved her and they were happy together. She wasn't an old-maid schoolteacher, coming primly home at night to wash her stockings and grade her papers and be lonely. She was Todd's wife and his arms were around her.

"Do you suppose I'd ought to call the police?" he asked.

Oh, blast Angela, she thought impatiently. Hasn't she caused enough trouble? She looked at the nervous movement of his hands, usually so steady. She read the worry in his face.

"You understand these kids, Jessie," he said. "I don't know anything about them. What shall I do?"

"I don't understand Angela. But I'm sure she would never forgive you if the police brought her home. Angela is difficult——"

"Difficult!" he exploded. "She's a king-sized pain in the neck—always pulling and wheedling, and fixing it so I can't spend any time with you. But I'm her father, and I ought to do something for her. But right now, I don't know what."

"She's young, Todd," Jessie heard herself saying. She sat down on Todd's knee and fitted her head into the hollow of his shoulder. "She's really very immature. I'm sure there must be a reason why she's so—so awful. She dislikes me, and I dislike her, and I can't be rational about it. I've tried ——" She heard a sound and stopped. It was the key turning in the lock.

> —MARK TWAIN.

ANGELA came in, one shoulder dragged down by her suitcase. She stood just inside the door, her face pale and tired, her whole body drooping with exhaustion.

"Well," she said, "here I am."

Todd got up quickly, pushing Jessie off his lap. "We've been worried about you, young lady," he said sternly.

She lifted her chin in a tired travesty of independence. "You needn't have been. I'm married, and I wouldn't have come back at all if we had found a place to stay."

"Married!" Todd echoed loudly. "You went off and got married and didn't say a word about it to me, or to Jessie, or to your mother? And who did you marry?"

"Whom," Jessie said in an undertone, but they paid no attention.

Angela's lips were stiff and her voice was tight. "A boy I know in Oakland."

Looking at her, Jessie knew that Angela was going to cry in a minute.

"A fine thing to do," Todd was shouting, "run off and ——"

"Todd," Jessie interrupted quietly in her crisp classroom manner, "never mind about being the stern parent now. This child has gone off and got married, and it is too late to do any good by yelling at her. I don't think this is quite the welcome sh normally expect."

"I didn't expect any welcome," said sullenly, with her eyes on he

"Well, I'm rather sentimental ab riage," Jessie said. "And I think th to be a pleasanter time for you."

"I walked and I walked," Ang talking to her hands. "We didn't c little it was—just one room." H began to shake and she talked "Pete's landlady wouldn't let me st with him. And I couldn't find—just a that could be our own." She turned and stood there with her shoulders square while she cried. "Surely it's much to ask," she said indistinctly.

NOBODY said anything for a full Jessie reached for Todd's hand, but watching the slight tired girl cryin end of the room.

Vividly she could see Angela and suit-case, tramping block after block, loo a furnished room. She could see her the house where her mother and husband lived, carrying her suitcas off alone to her father. Then the sa and hat, the same suitcase as she wen the steps away from this building wh father and his wife lived. Lookin home and someone to love her. Then back, the coat wrinkled from travel, t case pulling at her arm, worn out and ed, to this door where she knew she wanted.

"The poor kid," whispered. "The po lonesome kid that have anybody. Th body wanted." squeezed Todd's bi and felt it cold and But hers was warm fore I had you, Tod said softly, "I knew what it was to be But I guess I'd forgotten." She across the room. Todd's voice boomed in the little "Bring him in. Don't let him stand o What kind of a father do you ——"

"And Angela," Jessie said, "dinn two is done and getting cold. Why do and—and ——"

"Pete," Angela said, and there was thing touching in the sound of th romantic name. "Pete Davis."

"Why don't you and Pete eat it? father and I are going out anyway."

"Oh, Jessie, could we?" Never befo Angela called her Jessie. "Here, all b selves?"

"Well, I can take a hint," Todd sai a smile that was almost natural. He p arm around Angela and half lifted her floor. "We're going out, and we'll pro be home good and late. Now bring tha in here before he gets scared and runs a yourself, "Hey, what's this? When do I get a chance to talk?" The answer is, you don't. When you've started to help someone by listening, your own worries and even your cleverest comments on his difficulties must be set aside for some other time. Good, helpful listening is utterly unselfish.

4. Since this is the talker's hour, you must let him run the conversation. This means that you can never probe, never ask a question to get information you may think necessary to judge things fairly. Judging is not your task, so curb your curiosity—otherwise the talker might tell you things he would later regret having said. The only questions permitted a listener who is really on the job repeat, in another form, what the speaker has already said. For instance, it may be helpful to say, "So you're fully determined to give up your job?" or, "Then you don't see anything good about her?"

The advice not to probe is especially valuable to wives and mothers who want to be helpful to returned veterans in their talkative moods. Such men, if they have had combat experience, dislike being "drawn out" even more than being shut off and told to "forget it all." Most servicemen want to talk; but men who have been under fire often have some memories they wish to protect from civilian eyes. An amiably meant question may intrude into a place where the soldier is not ready to admit anyone just yet.

5. Don't cut off the expression of feelings the speaker has begun, no matter how much these may appall you. If a man bangs the table and pours out an unreasonable hatred of someone, by all means let him bang away; if you interfere by saying, "You shouldn't feel that way," you will only succeed in bottling up his anger inside of himself—the last place in the world you want it to be stored. Let it come out.

If a woman cries and sobs, the good listener will never try to stop her by a short-sighted comforting. To say, "Don't cry. Everything will work out somehow"; or, "Hush now. You're making yourself sick," is a refusal to continue listening. A "good cry" is exactly what she wants and needs—let her have it out.

6. A real faith in the other person's ability to work his own way toward light and air and hope is necessary, if we are to keep still. Try to develop it. Dr. Carl Rogers, of the University of Chicago, reports that such faith is invariably justified: "When the individual's negative feelings have been quite fully expressed, they are followed by the faint and tentative expressions of the positive impulses which make for growth. There is nothing which gives more surprise to the beginner than to find that this positive expression is one of the most certain and predictable aspects of the whole process. The more violent and deep the negative expressions, the more certain are the positive expressions of love, of fundamental self-respect, of the desire to be mature."

There are thousands of case histories to prove this point. There are cases of AWOL soldiers, interviewed during the war, who began the talk with the defiant words, "I won't go back," and ended them, after no interfering advice, with the words, "Of course, I know I'll have to return and face the music." There are cases of women who said, "Don't try to argue me out of getting a divorce. My mind is all made up." Forty-five minutes later, after their own uninterrupted talk, they have said, "A divorce is no solution." In these and in other successful counseling interviews the listener would have bitten off his tongue rather than try to push the talker toward such a decision.

Silence is hard for a listener; its practice is at war with the tendency to "set things right" which makes busybodies of us all. When a husband is discouraged, a wife's impulse is to rush to his side with soothing words; she longs to stop his silly talk about being a failure. Naturally she does. When a child sobs that he would like to kill some teacher, it is hard for a mother not to say, sh. You mustn't say things like that." n either case, the woman will be much helpful if she holds back her words until talker has run down. And by that time won't be needed; the mere expression of views, the mere getting-rid of them, s the talker to begin to think in happier more friendly terms.

While all this violent or unhappy talk is g on, what should we say? One expert nmends a series of "eloquent and en-aging grunts." Counselors are trained sert such little comments as "I see," -m-m-m," "That's how you feel?", "I I understand." But if the talker gets and cannot go on although he ently wants to—a few seconds of silence o harm. The "expectant pause" is one e ways by which we can indicate our pathetic willingness to hear more along our acceptance of the fact that the er doesn't have to tell us anything. This versation is his show, not ours; so long he listener keeps that fact well in mind, responses will be in the proper key.

nalysis of successful interviews with ple who wished to "blow their tops" has wn that the listener always talks less one quarter of the time sometimes much less. His remarks never introduce ew idea into the conversation and er steer it in a dif-nt direction. But tener may repeat, other words, what talker has already l. Sometimes he sharpen the aker's remarks put them even e brutally, so that talker realizes ex-ly what kind of gs he has been ing. That slight ggeration of what been heard is as se as a good ener ever comes to ecting the talker. Take an example: nan has been pour-g out a great deal unintelligently ter feeling about some group of people om he dislikes. The "facts" he has pre-nted are all absurdities that could be ans-ered by other, sounder facts. But to answer em in this way would accomplish nothing e man is expressing emotion, and his notion had better be allowed to show itself all its ugliness. Then the speaker himself ll begin to see that he has gone too far.

An intelligent listener can help this process ong in a gingerly and discreet way by rowing back at the speaker his more ex-eme remarks, so that he will himself see w unreasonable they are. "Then you'd ally be happier if your wife were dead?" is ch a shocker, which might be used if that is hat the man's complaints of her have said. r, "You'd like to have everybody who goes strike put into jail?" is such a remark, d "You'd really rather see refugees die in isplaced Persons camp than let them into is country?" Such remarks are not made win the talker to your own viewpoint; eir only purpose is to let him see what he as actually said, so that he can examine it d consider whether he likes to be the kind person who can make such remarks.

8. Listening, as you can see, is hard work. demands a difficult kind of self-discipline we wish to do it helpfully. And one of the ardest of all the rules governing it is this: Don't pass moral judgments." Your role in stening is not that of the reformer—you are ot attempting to make the speaker over into our own image.

The things that the talker is saying, no matter how hostile and unattractive they ound, are a part of the person you are trying o help. Perhaps he will never feel this way gain as long as he lives. Perhaps you will be quite as gloomy or angry a state of mind ext month. Better lay off the practice of rowing stones at the listener, even inside our secret thoughts.

The refusal to pass judgment applies to both sides of the case that you are hearing. You should not only avoid saying, "You're wrong," but, if you are wise, you'll also refrain from saying, "The other person is wrong." Many marriages have been hastened toward the divorce court by the sympathetic friends who said, "Don't stand it for another day."

9. Even if the speaker asks you directly for your advice, you need not give it to him—and you will not, if you are honestly determined to help. The temptation to answer such questions with a sentence beginning, "If I were you," is strong. But remember, you aren't the speaker.

"No person is ever wise enough to advise on another person's problem," is one of the fundamentals taught to Harvard and Radcliffe students by experts in this field. The giving of advice, even when it has been requested, may also keep the man or woman in trouble from pushing on to a real solution of his own.

When a husband says, "Don't you think I'd be perfectly justified in quitting tomorrow?" there are a dozen things a wife will be tempted to say. Most of them will only add to his trouble. For the only answer that can help, in such a case, is one that lets the husband decide the matter for himself. A wise wife will simply repeat back to her husband what he has told her of how he sees the problem. She will say, "You feel you can't go on for another day?" or "You've definitely decided you want to quit?" She will not smuggle into the conversation the question of what kind of job he could get in place of the old one, or ask him how they are to live if he does not work. Those matters will come later, when the husband has talked out his present rage.

10. The only remark worse than "I think you're absolutely wrong" is "I think you're absolutely right." Those in distress are not helped by judgment or by approval of their angry states of mind.

Counselors are told, "We don't help people by wading into the same emotional puddle in which they find themselves." You don't cure a consumptive by contracting tuberculosis; you don't help a person in distress to get a burden off his chest by putting it on yours.

Those who have made listening their lifework have found that one simple method of handling this difficulty is to identify themselves with the talker as he will be when this problem has been solved. The temptation to become involved in his rage or his pain can be avoided if we think to ourselves, "After all this is out of the way, I want to talk to him about books or fishing trips or tell him that amusing story about Jim." The person with whom you wish to establish friendship is not the bewildered, sick-at-heart or angry talker of the moment, but the serene individual he will be when this is off his chest.

11. Be genuinely interested, and show it—good listening is impossible if your thoughts are wandering off to the planning of the next day's menus. Actually, it has been found, the effort to be attentive is needed only in the first few moments of a conversation with someone who really wants to talk. You cannot long remain detached; you will find your spontaneous interest increasing as the interview goes on. At the end, you may well discover that you have experienced as much relief from your tension and worries as the speaker has. The interview is a two-way street, with both of you involved.

But because you are a human being and not an angel, your own emotions may be unpleasantly aroused during the course of the talk; something the speaker says may outrage you and make you indignant. Admit this to yourself, and set the problem aside to be considered later, when you are alone. While you are listening, it is not your job to express your sentiments, however proper and superior to the speaker's you may consider them.

With this viewpoint in mind, you will find it possible, if not easy, to avoid the two worst sins a listener can commit: interrupting and arguing. We interrupt only to "set people right," and we argue only when we are more concerned with the subject under discussion than with the feelings of the speaker on the other side.

Those are the rules of helpful listening; they are immensely hard to follow, for they require the major virtues of humility, patience, self-control and restraint from judging others. Few of us, without practice, can listen perfectly for as much as a half hour. Most of us need to exercise self-control to obey the rules for even five minutes. But Dr. Leonard Himler, of the University of Michigan, offers us this hope: "Some people," he says, "apparently without any special effort, seem to have a natural ability to make their contacts meaningful and effective. But on the basis of my own experience and of observation of students in training, I believe that anyone who has a genuine interest can steadily improve in practicing this art."

Woman—the gods be thanked!—is not even collaterally related to that sentimental abstraction called an angel. —BROWNE.

Is it important that we learn to listen? Yes—according to the men who have dealt most seriously with the subject, it is immensely important. Employees in firms which provide counselors often report that interviews with them have been the most valuable experiences of their lives. "One friend, one person who is truly understanding, who takes the trouble to listen to us as we consider our problem, can change our whole outlook on the world," Dr. Elton Mayo says.

Many case histories show that this is true. A young man incapable of forcing himself to look for a job landed in the office of a counselor who did nothing but follow the rules outlined above. The man was at outs with his family, with the girls he knew, with the possibilities of his chosen work, with himself. After half-a-dozen talks, this client said, "Now I see the mistake in thinking I was making. Thanks." The counselor had not inserted a single word to bring him closer to the answer; life, the greatest physician, had healed his difficulties more skillfully than the counselor could have done by any glib pep talk or solution of his own. As counselors are told, "We are most helpful to a person when our desire is not to solve his problem, but simply to accept and understand him."

But listening may seem to be a kind of social-service work within the circle of your family and friends. "I am not," you say, "particularly interested in becoming a do-gooder. I don't welcome the chance to have everyone in the neighborhood come spilling his troubles into my lap. Let the professional counselors and priests and psychiatrists do this listening to other people's problems. I've trouble enough with my own."

The answer to that, as given by the scientists of social relations, is that you are a social being, whose problems are inextricably involved with those of the people around you. Listening and talking are things all of us are compelled to do from birth. If you do not listen to others with sympathy, the chances are very strong that you will not be able to pour out your troubles to them when you need help. "To have a friend, be a friend," can be rendered, "To have a listener when you need one, be a listener when someone else wishes to talk to you."

Listening pays dividends in other ways. Students who took the "Human Relations" course at Harvard last year discovered that their listening practice made even the most casual conversation a more enriching experience than it had been before.

"None of the girls who shared my dormitory ever poured out her soul to me," a Radcliffe student told her teacher. "But my relations with all of them improved after I had studied the rules for listening."

Another graduate of the course, faced with a family situation in which there was opposition to the marriage of an older brother, found that by skillful listening to both sides, he was able to bring about a happy solution.

"Imagine," he said later, "how far I'd have got with these older people if I had gone to them with my two cents' worth of advice about allowing the marriage. They'd have thrown me out as an impertinent brat. But they were all aching to explain to someone why they felt that way, and I was the only one around who was willing to hear them through. They told me all about their objections to the wedding—and when they'd finished telling me, they didn't object any more."

So long as we are not hermits, we have to do some listening every day we live. Our chances of leading lives that are rich in friendships and love may be considerably increased if we let the scientists' studies show us how to listen well.

WHICH IS THE WEAKER SEX?

Another fact, not yet explored, which may be one cause of the greater strength of the female, is that in the sex union it requires two sex chromosomes (sex-producing elements), one from each parent, to produce a girl, whereas only one is required to produce a boy. Most people are surprised to learn that the initial "cause of sex" has long been well known. I say initial cause, because in some lower animals, such as rats and chickens, females have been changed to males, and males to females, after birth.

One would suppose that after this trying ordeal, the boys who are born would be stronger, on the average, than the girls. Not so. In 100,000 deaths during the first month, in Germany, 1276 were boys to each 1000 girls. During the twelfth month only 1017 boys died to 1000 girls; this showed that death was still taking the weakling boys. In the United States, about 137 boys to 100 girls die in the first month, but in the fourth month, only 132 boys to 100 girls.

Another dramatic line of evidence is found when we examine multiple births. Whereas in single births, 1060 boys are born to 1000 girls, yet among twins only 1040 boys pull through to each 1000 girls. Among triplets only 1007 boys survive to each 1000 girls; and among quadruplets, only 548 sets of boys are born to 1000 girls. We have records of only 35 quintuplets, and the sex is not known in all cases; but all the evidence indicates that had the Dionne Quints been boys, they would not have survived. Plainly, in the case of multiple births, the fight for life is more desperate than in single births, and a higher and higher proportion of females win.

As we go on from the cradle to the grave, the males continue to die earlier than the females. Prof. Warren Thompson, population expert, points out that out of every 100,000 of each sex born every year, only 91,567 males live through the first year, compared with 93,268 females. This would seem to have weeded out all the weakling males; yet, all the way from 15 to 45, right through the childbearing period, there are, in every single year, more male than female deaths. True, men have somewhat more industrial accidents, but these hardly balance the risks of childbirth. Finally, when the race is about over at age 75, there are 26,667 women still living, only 23,401 men, out of the original 00 of each sex who started the race of together. These figures apply to the ed States during the past 40 years, in h we have had comparatively few deaths ales in war.

umming up this line of evidence, the U. S. tality statistics show that of the 189 uses of Death," the male, at all ages, has higher death rate from every cause except ooping cough, which, for unknown reasons, ore fatal to girls. Even accidents of the e type are fatal to more men than to nen, and surgeons testify women survive same type of surgical operation better n men.

When we come to the two supreme tests of anic strength—total and average length of —we find the average life of white men in United States is just over 63, and of men, just over 68 years. The total length life is even more impressive. The late Raynd Pearl showed that out of every 100,000 ite babies of each sex born alive, 2291 feales but only 1523 males live to 90 and beond. Nearly 80 per cent of those who pass e century mark are women.

So far we have considered only the relive physical strength of the sexes, but the ental and emotional differences are just as riking. Dr. Neil Dayton, former Director f Statistics and Director of Division of ental Deficiency, Massachusetts Departent of Mental Health, after analyzing 0,000 cases of mental disorder, shows that males suffer nervous and emotional breakown to every 5 females. This does not tell e full story until we consider the ages at hich breakdown occurs. With men there re fewer and fewer breakowns up to age 30; but ith women, breakdowns ecrease until age 40. his means that the ougher mental and nervous constitution of the woman enables her to meet he strains of life ten years longer, on the average, than the man, before breaking down; and this, too, right through the chief childbearing period. From 40 on, women hold up better nervously than men. With men, mental unbalance begins to increase at 30, and goes up faster and faster to the end of his shorter life; but with women nervous breakdown does not begin to increase until age 50.

In extensive studies of marriage as related to health and length of life, Doctor Dayton has revealed a large array of entirely new facts relative to the stronger make-up of women. Up to 55, single men break down nearly twice as often as married men; but up to that age, the rate of breakdown of married men and women is almost the same. After that age, even the protection of marriage can no longer preserve the emotional balance of the husband. After 55, husbands break down one third oftener than wives; after 65, 50 per cent more often.

Looking at marriage in another way, Doctor Dayton shows that while single men suffer nervous breakdown nearly twice as often as married men, yet single women break only slightly more frequently than married women. You might surmise that single men break down more frequently than married men because women may have selected the stronger and sounder men. This may be a partial explanation, but does not account for the fact that single and married women hold their balance almost equally; nor for the further fact that single men break down about 50 per cent more often than single women.

Paraphrasing Doctor Dayton's conclusions from the largest amount of data ever assembled, marriage seems to give men "something" which greatly decreases their chances of mental disease. But whatever this something is, it does not give it to women. Instead of marriage being "the whole world" to women, and "merely another activity" to men, it proves to be man's mental and emotional lifesaver, while for woman it proves a poor bargain. With reference to mental disease, she gains little over her single sister, whereas the gain of the married man over the single is, as Doctor Dayton says, "tremendous." We can only infer, but the evidence is strong, that the greater constitutional vigor of the woman, with its protective influence, is the "something" that proves to be the lifesaver to the less vital man.

Turning lastly to the purely mental abilities of the two sexes, millions of intelligence tests, together with an equal number of school records, show that the average of the mental abilities of women is the same as that of men; and since psychologist Irving Learge, of Columbia, has shown that mental power never declines by a single degree from its highest level at 27 or 28, this intellectual equality of men and women continues to the end of life.

While, as pointed out, the abilities of the sexes average the same, they are measurably different in a few areas. Boys and men excel somewhat in mathematics, while girls and women excel in language. This probably accounts for the fact, as shown by the Minnesota University Tests of Clerical Ability, that women make better stenographers, typists and office workers than men. However, the most surprising and important discovery is that made by the Minnesota University Tests of Mechanical Ability—the best tests of a special ability in existence, except, perhaps, the Seashore Tests of Musical Talent. These tests prove, beyond dispute, that women have equal mechanical ability with men. They disclose that in the use of tools and objects that depend on training, college-graduate women do no better than eighth-grade boys; but on operations requiring in-born mechanical aptitude college-graduate women do as well as college-graduate men.

> If a man would know what he is, let him anger his neighbor.

The practical implications of this revolutionary discovery for industry, education and the future economic and even social life of both men and women are at present beyond calculation. When viewed in the light of the amazing success of women in every field of mechanics during the war effort, it brings up at once the question of giving mechanical tools and toys exclusively to boys, and dolls exclusively to girls. Many psychologists are tending to believe that girls do not "take naturally" to dolls any more than do boys, and do not play with them from any "motherly instinct," or even think of them as "babies," but rather as playmates and companions. They find that boys, at least up to puberty, if given dolls and reared in a feminine atmosphere, manifest almost identical reactions. The motherly "drives" in girls not "instincts," as most psychologists doubt that we have any instincts -do begin to assert themselves at puberty, but even these are largely affected by training

It seems impossible that these masses of evidence will not work important changes in the relations of men and women, to the benefit of both. Certainly, whatever may be the arguments for denying women "equal rights with men," or "equal pay for equal work," they can no longer be based on the age-old theories of the mental, emotional, physical or even mechanical inferiority of women.

It will always be true that the basic facts of motherhood, homemaking and child training will give woman a different "sphere" in many respects from that of man at least during the first four decades of life. The male must always be the "provider" for mother and child during their period of helplessness. Sociologists believe this fact, and not love, was the real origin of the family. Fortunately, however, in the long run Nature has balanced the burdens of each; but the fiction of woman's inferiority, which has made her burden heavier than need be, must be given up. From now on the world must be carried on, as never before, in complete co-operation between equals, and not as a battle for supremacy, with the assumption that woman is the weaker sex. Science has exploded this age-long belief, and the road is now open for man and woman to go forward hand in hand, as equals, toward building a better and a sunnier world.

Transplant yourself

. . . out of the laundry, into the sun—any washday. First you set the Bendix dial and put in soap. Then off you go! All by itself your Bendix fills itself with water . . . washes the clothes . . . changes its own water . . . rinses 3 times . . . damp drys clothes . . . cleans itself . . . drains itself . . . shuts itself off. You never put your hands in water. There's no lifting or stooping with the Bendix basket-level porthole. And the Bendix leaves no clean-up work for you . . . no washday mess . . . no steamy odors.

Only the Tumble-Action principle of the BENDIX washes clothes so clean, so gently . . . with so little hot water and soap . . . and no work at all!

EVEN YOUR GARDEN TOGS don't get too soiled for the Bendix' thorough Tumble-Action cleansing. It tumbles clothes hundreds of times in extra-active suds. And every load gets fresh soap-and-water sudsing, so clothes never get that dirty water dullness, from chilled-off water and soil-weakened suds.

YES! Plenty of hot water left for your shower — thanks to the Bendix Water-Saver Cylinder, that uses gallons less hot water. And with less water in the cylinder, you need lots less soap, too.

NOW PASTELS ARE "PRACTICAL" — because your Bendix washes them fresh and lovely—with Tumble-Action so gentle you don't need to do them by hand. There's no agitator wear and tear. And with Bendix' Triple Rinsing those colors stay clearer, brighter — linens wash daisy white.

WHAT A REPUTATION! For nine whole years the Bendix has been doing such a wonderful job of workless washing, that now you'll find the Bendix in half a million homes. See why the Bendix is the favorite — see your dealer's Bendix demonstration!

Summertime slip covers in watermelon colors cool and refresh the room.

SEASON WITH SLIP COVERS

DRAWINGS BY DAVID PAYNE

Change of face for winter via slip-cover magic.

BY H. T. WILLIAMS

SOME of the best-dressed rooms in America have taken to wearing slip covers all year round. Their flexibility seems to suit our way of life, with its desire for frequent change of pace and mood, so much better than the rather static quality of upholstery. It's pleasant and, with slip covers, easy to change the feeling of one's room in harmony with the changing seasons, without disturbing the basic design.

The wrinkled shrouded look of not so long ago is gone, of course; today's smart slip covers are trimly tailored, excitingly colorful, closed with slide fasteners to achieve perfect smoothness.

The room we've sketched wears, in wintertime, slip covers of violet raw silk, blue-violet-and-green-print chintz. When warm weather comes, a change of slip covers cools and refreshes, suggests other simple changes in accessories that make the room look delightfully summery. Watermelon printed chintz, a chair or two in watermelon cotton serge splash clear gay color against the cool ice-blue walls. Paintings, cornices, formal draperies give place to masses of green leaves, airy curtains of sheer striped voile billowing out beneath deep shirred headings. Over its wintertime lacquered top, the coffee table takes a shiny brass tray for summer's plants and flowers. A washable rug of willow-green textured cotton supplants winter's broadloom.

As this suggests, the smartest slip-covered rooms don't match too much! If you use print for a piece or two, take one of its colors to use in solid rest space for other pieces. And don't be afraid to spice it all with a stripe. Here in this room, a bold pattern, stripes and clear solid colors summer together in perfect harmony.

Fabrics and textures in infinite variety lend themselves to slip-cover treatment. Consider, as well as the ubiquitous chintz, failles, blocked linens, cotton twills and serges, dyed towelings, certain spun rayons (now treated to make them wrinkle-resistant and shrinkproof), and the very new and very practical plasticized fabrics, which may be wiped clean with a damp cloth. Just be sure that the fabric you choose isn't too light in weight to tailor well.

It's important for most slip covers to be washable or cleanable, since their freshness is a great part of their charm. If you plan to wash them, be sure to use only preshrunk fabrics.

If you buy furniture in muslin, and want a more or less permanent cover to take the place of upholstery, follow the exact lines of the muslin covers put on by the manufacturer. Modern furniture especially is often treated in this manner, since its simplicity of line makes it very easy to slip-cover.

Covers in solid colors may save your decorating day if you, with a vanful of patterned furniture, find yourself moving into an apartment with patterned walls, and the landlord won't redecorate! Plain fabrics, however, need even more expert fitting than patterned ones, since every error in tailoring will be painfully evident. But if you want to disguise a tired old chair or sofa, a flowered fabric will camouflage its bumps better than a plain one would.

A tailored look may be pointed up by matching welting, crisp box pleats or kick pleats at the corners. If your room needs a frivolous touch, there are any number of decorative tapes and braids and bindings and fringes for the purpose. Appliquéd stripes on solid colors are smart in many rooms.

Making slip covers at home is, according to many women, much easier than making clothes fit the uncertain human form. Sewing-machine centers give expert advice and information. There's a JOURNAL booklet, too, called THE HANDBOOK OF SLIP COVERS, to guide you toward a professional-looking job. throat. The girl's expression, which so far had been immobile, broke into a beautiful, radiant smile. The lump in Peter's throat burst and he became aware that the young man in the white dinner jacket was staring at him. He was staring in a manner that indicated he did not approve of this exchange of glances. Peter picked up his soupspoon and started on his vichyssoise.

"Good," Dan said. "Now maybe we can get on with the dinner. They are waiting to bring us the next course."

Peter put down the soupspoon. "It's no good. I can't eat."

"What's no good? The soup?"

"No. The soup is fine," Peter told him. "It's just that I can't manage to eat it."

"That girl at the next table."

"Yes, that girl at the next table. In some way she's taken my appetite away. I can't explain it."

"We'll move to another table." Dan started to call the waiter.

"No, no. It's all right. I'll be all right in a minute."

"Look," Dan said. "Do something. Go over and grab her by the hair. Say 'My name is Peter Whipple and I want you.'"

"Don't be ridiculous."

"What would Tim Ireland do? I ask you. What would he do?"

"I don't know what Tim would do."

"Then I'll tell you. He'd tap the guy on the shoulder and ask him where he got such a good-looking suit. In another five minutes he'd be sitting next to the girl and have the guy five blocks away looking for a parking space."

"I'm not Tim Ireland. I don't like this guy's suit; and besides, he thinks I'm trying to pick up the girl already."

"Okay. But I hate to see all this good food going to waste."

"Think of something for me to ask him."

"Say to him that he looks familiar and you wonder where you've seen him before."

"He'll see through that. He's mad at me already."

"All right, but they're eating fast. In ten minutes they're going to get up and walk right out of your life. You'll never know what she is."

"It's incredible," Peter said. "You won't believe this. I hardly believe it myself. I've seen her before . . . in a dream . . . dream I keep having."

"This is beginning to sound more like musical comedy every minute."

"I keep having a dream about how I'm walking under a big tree and a girl's face appears in the foliage and beckons to me and when I climb up in the tree there's no one there."

"Now you know why. She runs off with the Napoleon. It must be some kind of an advertisement."

"I'm not kidding, Dan. That's the girl who lives in the tree. I've got to do something." Peter thought for a minute. Then he leaned toward the young man, who had turned so that his back was toward Peter. "I beg your pardon," Peter said.

The young man turned and looked at Peter. "Yes?" he said irritably.

"I—ah—I notice that you are hurrying through your dinner. I—that is we—were curious to know if you are going to the theater."

"Yes," he said. "Why?"

"Oh, nothing. Just curious. That's all." The young man lowered his eyebrows at Peter and turned back to the girl. Peter grabbed a fork and shoveled four enormous chunks of lobster into his mouth. "There, you see," he whispered to Dan. "What would Tim Ireland do now?"

"Tim Ireland would slug the guy in the nose."

"That's very interesting," Peter said. He scowled at Dan and moved closer to the young man on his right.

"What are they talking about?" Dan asked.

"Sh-h-h. I can't hear. They're talking too low."

Peter sat tense, staring into space, trying to catch a word of the modulated conversation on his right. It seemed hopeless. Even "...so we rented the old haunted house!"

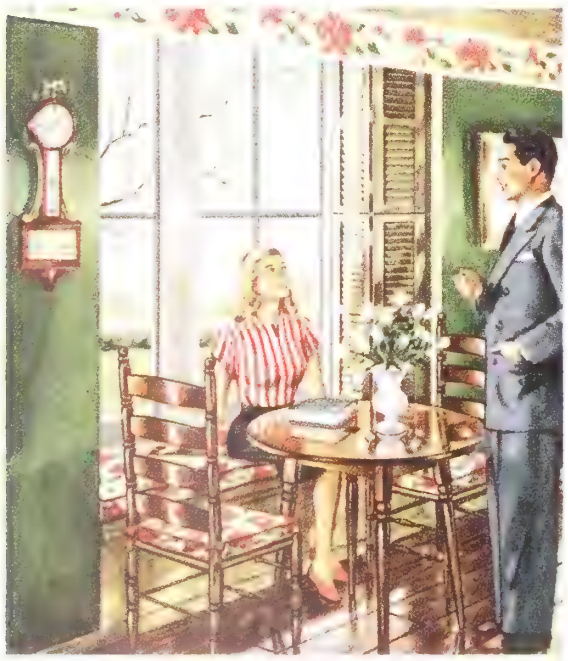
We knew it was hard to find a place to live—but we never dreamed we'd end by renting the creepy old house on the hill. You should have seen it . . . the shabby old floors alone were enough to send a bride home to mother.

LUCKY FOR US we knew about Johnson's Wax—we pitched right in on those floors, and oh, what a difference wax can make! Our floors shine like a ballroom now . . . and they are so easy to keep clean and bright!

OUR FURNITURE is a mixture—partly old and partly new—but we're awfully proud of it since we polished it with Johnson's Wax. First off, we waxed Grandma's walnut rocker and old mantel clock, and you ought to hear the compliments we get. Our few new pieces aren't the finest, either—but Johnson's Wax gives them a rich, mellow luster that adds so much to their beauty.

WE HAD NEVER REALIZED there were so many things that need waxing . . . bookcases, radios, window sills, leather articles, woodwork . . . and a hundred others. And it's so comforting to know that wax protects our treasures against dirt, wear and moisture.

I've found out something else . . . Johnson's Wax actually saves me hours of work. The smooth, dry wax finish cuts my dusting time in half.



Use Liquid Wax, too! A fine floor cleaner . . . removes dirt quickly and easily . . . leaves a protective wax coating that polishes to a bright, rich luster. Excellent, too, for cleaning and waxing furniture, woodwork and for 100 other uses listed on the label.

Never going to amount to anything, he mumbled to himself. Never going to amount to a thing. Spend the rest of my life eating lobster thermidor in the Napoleon while life passes me by. Never can rise to a situation. Never meet a crisis halfway. I'm a little man destined for little things.

He stopped in front of a jeweler's and looked at the window display. A jade picture frame, some silver-backed brushes and a diamond pendant were arranged on a piece of black velvet. Peter was not aware of what he was looking at. If there had been a live boa constrictor in the window he would not have noticed it.

But, he went on, I don't want to be a little man. I must mend my ways. I must thrive on crises. I must decide what is to be done and then do it—do it with dispatch and courage. If, in the process, someone is hurt or offended, it is regrettable but necessary. It is imperative that I assert myself. The race, most certainly, belongs to the swift.

Peter left the imaginary stick in front of the jeweler's show window and started off down Fifth Avenue, his head high, looking passing pedestrians in the eye with such strength and forthrightness that a path opened in the crowd before him.

At Forty-fifth Street Peter stopped. The seventy-five-piece band that had been playing a John Philip Sousa arrangement of the Marseillaise in his breast dropped its instruments with a crash. A girl was walking up Fifth Avenue, coming right toward him. Not a girl; the girl. The one from the Napoleon. She was walking along briskly, her short skirt swirling in the light breeze and the gold hair blowing back from the side of her face. She was only fifteen feet away now, walking fast, right down the middle of the sidewalk, and glancing into the shop-windows. When she was five feet away she turned her head, looked straight at Peter and smiled. The lump formed in Peter's throat. It was as if someone were holding him. He was unable to move a muscle. He knew that his jawbone had dropped about an inch and he was powerless to raise it. Then the lump burst. Peter turned and started running crazily up Fifth Avenue.

Stopping to stand on tiptoe, he could see her head bobbing up and down in the crowd about a block ahead of him, but when he caught up with the bobbing head it was always someone else. When he got to Radio

"Remember our first crystal set?"

1. WIFE: "REMEMBER HOW WE USED to listen with earphones on, trying to distinguish the music from the static? That wasn't long after the first World War. You gave it to me the same Christmas you gave me the living room rug."

2. WIFE: "WE'VE BOUGHT A dozen radios since then. Not to mention new cars and furniture. But we still have the same old rug. It's so shabby I'm ashamed to have anyone in any more. We got our money's worth out of it years ago. Can't we afford . . ."

3. HUSBAND: "GOSH IT IS A wreck, isn't it? Sure, go ahead and get a new one. Heh! Where are you going?"

WIFE: "SHOPPING."

4. HUSBAND: "THAT WILL MAKE OUR LIVING ROOM. But it looks as if it will put a big dent in the old budget. What make is it?"

WIFE: "IT'S A SMITH FLOOR-PLAN RUG. And don't worry about the cost. It fits the budget as beautifully as it fits the floor." . . . If you are planning to replace your old rug, send for Clara Dudley's new color-idea booklet, Colorama.

City he doubled back, looking into stores where she might have gone, but it was no use. She was gone.

Peter stopped at Forty-fifth Street. He stood on the corner and scratched his chin.

This, he said to himself, is no time for self-pity or philosophical conjecture. It is a time for incisive thought and decisive action. I have but two clues; and slight though they are, they are most certainly clues. The first, the word "Myopia," might refer to a hunt club near Boston. On the other hand, it might refer to a disease of the eye. The second, the proper name "New Haven," coupled with the age and general appearance of the young man, clearly indicates a visit to the campus of Yale University.

Peter was on the noon train for New Haven. He took a taxi directly from the New Haven railroad station to the university library, drew yearbooks for the preceding five years and settled himself in the reading room.

It seemed to Peter that he had passed many hours in close scrutiny of basketball teams, dramatic clubs and debating societies. His eyes were weary at the sight of so many meaningless sons of Eli when he was rewarded for his diligence. Peter turned a page and there, scowling up at him from a picture of the chess club, was old White Dinner Jacket himself. Peter looked under the picture for the name. There it was: Wellington Partridge III. He consulted the catalogue. Wellington Partridge III, resident of Timothy Dwight, Room 1602; home, Beacon Street, Boston. Wellington Partridge was still in college. At this very moment he was in a near-by classroom. The trail was getting hot.

In four minutes Peter was outside the door of Room 1602 Timothy Dwight. He knocked. There was no response. He knocked again. There was still no response. He tried the doorknob. It turned and he pushed open the door. The quarters of Wellington Partridge III were no ordinary ones. Over the mantel was a Matisse drawing. Beside the huge easy chair was an inlaid chessboard on which stood a set of hand-carved ivory chessmen. The books in the built-in bookcases which flanked the fireplace were bound in heavy leather. These were the rooms of a very elegant young man.

The door to the bedroom was closed. "Hello?" Peter said. There was no answer. He opened the door to the bedroom and found it unoccupied. He glanced at the top of the bureau, sure he was going to find her picture there. Save for a bottle of cologne, a brush and comb and a decanter, the top of the bureau was bare. On the desk he found a book of matches. He picked it up. It bore the name Myopia Hunt Club. Peter walked out of the bedroom, through the living room and into the hall. He listened attentively for the sound of approaching footsteps. All was silence. He returned to the bedroom and opened the desk drawer. In one corner was a packet of letters in light blue envelopes with white edging.

With a slightly trembling hand Peter picked up the packet of letters. They were all in the same feminine handwriting. He turned the packet over in his hand. There was no return address, but they were all postmarked Boston. Peter listened again. There was no sound. Quickly he slipped one of the letters out of its envelope and turned to the back page. The letter was signed "Love, Mother."

Peter put the letters back in the desk and turned his attention to the bureau. There was nothing in the drawers but clothes. In the closet were suits, coats, hats, shoes and four polo mallets. He tugged at a white sleeve. It was the white dinner jacket. Peter went back to the living room, closing the bedroom door behind him. He sat down in the big armchair, pulled a copy of Town and Country from the magazine rack and commenced to thumb the pages.

In an hour Peter had scanned all the magazines in the rack. He sat back in the armchair wondering if Wellington Partridge III was out of town, perhaps hunting at the Myopia Hunt Club, playing in a chess to ...

nament in Chicago or even dining with her at the Napoleon. As he played with this idea Peter's eyes came to rest on the doorknob. It was a very bright, very shiny brass doorknob. As he watched, it turned, the door opened silently and Peter found himself looking up into the hostile eyes of Wellington Partridge III.

"Hello," Peter said, and got up from the chair.

"Yes?" said Wellington, glancing about the room to see if any of his valuables were missing.

"I suppose this is rather unusual, my making myself at home like this."

"It is rather."

"Four years ago I occupied this room. Senior year and all that. I just came up from New York to see if I could recapture the old days, but it's no use. Gone forever, I'm afraid. Sort of tragic, don't you think, living in the past as I do?"

"I am moved by your story, Mr.—Mr. ——"

"Whipple; Peter Whipple."

"I am moved by your story, Mr. Whipple, but unfortunately I have no time to talk with you, as I am already late for dinner."

"That's too bad. I had hoped to have a little chat with you. Get the undergraduate point of view. What young America is thinking. That sort of thing."

"I regret that it will be impossible. I'm afraid that I must say good night. Good night, Mr. Whipple."

Peter narrowed his eyes at Wellington. "You know, it's a very funny thing. I get the impression I have seen you someplace before. Is it possible you were dining at the next table to mine in a restaurant known as the Napoleon last night?"

We cannot ignore the tragic fact that science has given man control over nature before he has gained control over himself.

—SIR JAMES H. JEANS:
Quoted in Native American, by Ray Stannard Baker (Charles Scribner's Sons).

"I was at the Napoleon last night."

"Ah-hah! I thought so. I never forget a face. With names I have a great deal of difficulty. For example, the young lady you were with I know very well, but her name escapes me for the moment."

"That must be a great handicap." He was pushing Peter toward the door. "And now if you will excuse me."

"That name. It's so annoying not to be able to remember a name. Joan! Joan Something-or-other. Is that right?"

"No, it is not right."

"Nancy, then. That's it—Nancy Dalrymple. Of course."

"It is not Nancy Dalrymple. Perhaps it will come to you later."

Peter braced himself against the door jamb. "You are mistaken, I'm sure. Now that it has come to me, I know that girl's name is Nancy Dalrymple. Perhaps she didn't give you her real name."

"The name of the young lady happens to be Anne Whitney, and there is not the remotest possibility of her giving me the wrong name."

"Anne Whitney, of course. How could I have forgotten? Tell me, what's Anne doing these days? Still the same old Anne, I suppose."

"What do you mean 'still the same old Anne you suppose'?"

"Still living out there in the same old place in whatever the name of that town is?"

"Yes."

"H'm-m-m. Same old job, I suppose."

"As far as I know, Anne has no job. As far as I know, Anne has never had a job in her life. Rather difficult going through college and having a job at the same time, don't you think?"

"Yes, I guess they keep them pretty busy up there at Vassar."

"Anne is at Smith."

"Smith. That's what I meant, Smith. Well, I'm afraid I must be getting along now. Awfully nice to have seen you again."

Peter turned and walked rapidly out the door. He heard it slam behind him. It was too late to do anything before morning, so he ate dinner and took a late train back to New York.

At nine o'clock the next morning Peter was at the telephone. He dialed a number and waited.

"Hello?" a woman's voice said.

"Is this the Smith Club?"

"Yes."

"Do you have an undergraduate directory?"

"Yes."

"Would you look up a Miss Anne Whitney, please?"

"Certainly. Just a moment." Peter waited, drumming nervously on the telephone mouthpiece. "Yes, we have an Anne Whitney listed."

"What class is she?"

"When she comes back in the fall she'll be a member of the senior class."

"Oh. And do you have any idea where she can be reached during the summer?"

"Her home is listed as East Juniper, New Jersey, but there is no street address."

"Thank you very much. Good-by."

"Good-by."

Peter found a New Jersey telephone book in Grand Central Station and suffered his first reverse of the day. There were thirty-five Whitneys listed under East Juniper, New Jersey. He got three dollars' worth of nickels and dimes and settled himself in a telephone booth. Starting with Adolf Whitney, he moved down through the imposingly large list. Each time it was the same:

"Hello, is Anne there?"

"What number do you want? You must have the wrong number."

Peter was discouraged. He was down to the Samuel Whitneys. By the law of averages he should have hit it by now. At the Samuel Whitneys it was the same story:

"I'm afraid you have the wrong number. There is no one here by that name."

Seldon Whitney was next, and there were only four more Whitneys left in East Juniper, New Jersey.

"HELLO," Peter said. "Is Anne there?"

"This is Anne," said a cool, melodious voice.

"Huh?" Peter said.

"This is Anne," the voice on the telephone insisted.

"Oh."

"Hello?"

"Yes?" Peter said.

"I say this is Anne."

"Anne," Peter said, "this will seem very mysterious to you, but a matter of the utmost importance has come up and it necessitates my seeing you at once."

"Who am I talking to?"

"Well, my name happens to be Peter Whipple."

"Oh, hello, Peter."

"Hello, Anne."

"What is this matter of importance?" She was laughing now. Not taking him seriously, he thought. In a moment she would hang up.

"Well, I can't exactly tell you over the phone."

"Oh."

"So I wondered if you could meet me someplace."

"Like where?"

"Well, if you aren't doing anything for dinner ——"

"I'm not."

"Could you meet me at the Napoleon around seven?"

"I'd love to."

PETER spent the remainder of the day having his gray flannel suit pressed, getting a haircut and bringing his pebble-grain oxfords to a high polish. At seven o'clock he stood in the foyer of the Napoleon, nervously fingering the bunch of keys in his trouser pocket. At five minutes past seven she came in the door looking more beautiful than even Peter had remembered her. She walked up to Peter, smiling, her eyes sparkling.

"Hello," she said.

"Hello," Peter said. He was ill at ease and didn't know what to do with his hands. He wondered how she could be so pleasantly self-contained at a time like this. For all she knew he had invited her out for dinner so he could murder her. It certainly was strange, a nice girl going out with anybody that called her up on the telephone. Why, he might have turned out to be fifty-five years old, with a wart on the end of his nose. Funny business.

"Well," Anne said, "how've you been?"

"Just fine," Peter said. "How've you been?"

"Just fine," she told him. "I wondered why you didn't speak to me in here the other night."

"I wanted to, of course," Peter said. "You saw that, I guess. It was the person you were with. He gave me the impression that he would resent it."

"Oh, don't be silly," Anne said. "He was a bit stuffy, but I don't think he'd have minded your speaking to me."

"I don't know about that."

"My goodness, it's been a long time since we've seen each other, Peter. How long has it been, Peter?"

"It does seem like a long time, but actually it was only yesterday morning, on Fifth Avenue."

"No. I mean before, the summer in Nantucket."

"The what?"

"The summer in Nantucket," Anne told him.

"Oh. Oh, yes. The summer in Nantucket."

Peter's mind raced back rapidly. Nantucket. Six summers ago his family rented a house in Nantucket. He had been a freshman at college. There had been a family next door. He couldn't remember their names. Now it was coming back. They had a scrawny little girl with pigtails; she used to throw sand at him on the beach.

"Why, I guess that must have been all of six years ago," Peter said, "and you ——"

"Had pigtails. I knew you were going to remember that." Anne laughed a delightful, bubbling laugh.

Peter laughed too. He looked at her intently. He was trying to see the pigtails, the impish, freckled face, the hands hurling sand at him. He could not. Anne was looking at him, smiling, and she looked more beautiful than ever.

For Mimi: Age Four

By Eunice Mildred LonCoske

May all shapes of flowers press
Deeply, in her consciousness.

Let all winds and trees and birds
Teach her silver singing words.

Let the edges of her will Stretch to reach the highest hill.

May dusk's silence be a part
Of her tongue and of her heart.

Teach her, earth, that she may own
Every stick and every stone;

All that's beautiful and brief:
Frost on grass, snail on leaf.

If she grasps them not, then find Ways to store them in her mind
As a river to refresh
Arid heart and altered flesh!

NEVER A DULL MEAL

By Sheila Hibben

Again the Journal welcomes Sheila Hibben. Mrs. Hibben sums up her philosophy about food as follows: "I am more and more convinced that the best food is simple food, beautifully cooked." Mrs. Hibben's latest book, American Regional Cookery, is now in all the bookshops.

ALTHOUGH a well-planned menu may not inevitably insure a good meal, it is certain that unwise planning, or no planning at all, can turn the finest ingredients, and even the finest cooking, to dust and ashes. Let me see your notes for tomorrow's three meals scribbled on the back of an old envelope and I think I can predict with accuracy whether tomorrow's eating will be a graceless routine or cheering and comforting refreshment. No meal is too simple to require careful construction, and no dishes are so grand that they can be trusted to take care of themselves without thought for what follows and what precedes. The woman who writes "bread" on her menu is to me suspect. What kind of bread, I should like to know. Is it the bread that brings out all the harmonies of flavor in the dish it accompanies? Does the vegetable really complement the meat? And is the dessert light enough or substantial enough to round off agreeably what has gone before? It is these considerations, and more besides, that must be pondered by those happy ones who eat for pleasure.

Dinner

*Pork Chops in Sour Cream

Fried Sweet Potatoes *Onion Soufflé

Corn-Meal Muffins

*Orange Pudding Coffee

Pork Chops in Sour Cream: Pan broil 4 loin pork chops in the usual way. When tender and a good brown, skim fat from pan gravy and add ⅓ cup sour cream. Continue cooking for another 15 minutes, basting several times.

Onion Soufflé: Peel and cut 6 onions into quarters. Cover with rapidly boiling water. Boil 10 minutes, drain, and cover with more boiling water. Continue cooking until very soft. Drain thoroughly, chop fine and drain again. Season with salt and a few grains of pepper. Cream 2 tablespoons butter or margarine and 2 tablespoons flour together. Bring 1 cup milk to a boil and add to flour mixture gradually. Cook until thickened. Beat 3 egg yolks until pale yellow and add to cream sauce, then add onions, and finally fold in the 3 egg whites, well beaten. Turn into greased baking dish, set in a pan of warm water, and bake in moderate oven (350°F.) 30 minutes.

Orange Pudding: Cream 2 tablespoons shortening and ⅔ cup sugar until fluffy. Add 2 well-beaten egg yolks, 2 tablespoons flour, grated rind of 1 orange and ½ lemon, the juice of 1 lemon, and 1 cup milk. Mix thoroughly and fold in 2 stiffly beaten egg whites. Turn into greased baking dish, set in pan of hot water and bake in moderately slow oven (325°F.) for about 45 minutes. Serve as soon as taken from the oven with sweetened whipped cream, over which orange peel has been grated. The pudding should be firm on top and a soft consistency underneath.

1 egg and ½ teaspoon baking powder and beat thoroughly. Form into balls the size of a marble and drop into boiling salted water, being careful not to crowd. Cover, and cook 10 minutes. Take out carefully with a skimmer and place in a shallow baking dish. Cover with 1 cup thin cream sauce, sprinkle with grated Parmesan, and moisten with melted butter or margarine. Bake in hot oven (425°F.) for 15 minutes, or until brown on top.

Lamb Balls in Broth with Rice: Wash ⅔ cup rice well in several rinsings of cold water. Bring 6 cups meat broth or canned consommé to a boil and add the rice slowly. Mix together 1 pound ground raw lamb, 1 onion, chopped fine, 2 tablespoons chopped parsley, ⅓ cup finely rolled bread crumbs and 1 raw egg. Season with 1 teaspoon salt and ¼ teaspoon pepper. Form into small balls, roll in flour, and place carefully in the saucepan with the rice. Cover and let simmer until rice is tender, but not soft, and meat is cooked. Remove meat balls when done. Beat 2 egg yolks, add juice of ½ lemon and 2 tablespoons cold broth and add to rice-and-broth mixture. Stir lightly and remove at once from heat. Season with salt and pepper, and turn onto a hot serving platter, arranging meat balls on top of rice.

A certain doctor had ridden over a mile in a taxi when he suddenly discovered he had no money with him. He tapped the window and told the driver, "Stop at this cigar store a minute. I want to get matches so I can look for a ten-dollar bill I lost in the cab somewhere." When he emerged from the cigar store there was no taxi in sight.

Almond Soufflé: Beat the yolks of 8 eggs until thick and lemon-colored; add 1 cup powdered sugar, sifted, and continue beating for 2 minutes. Chop ½ pound blanched almonds very fine, then crush even finer with a rolling pin and stir into yolk-sugar mixture. Fold in the stiffly beaten whites of the 8 eggs and turn into a greased baking dish. Place in a pan of hot water and bake in a moderate oven (350°F.) for 30 minutes. Serve with a sweet sauce or whipped cream.

Cassoulet: Pick over 1½ pounds navy beans carefully, wash, and set to soak overnight in cold water. Drain and put in a saucepan with 3 quarts cold water, ¾ pound bacon cut in pieces, ½ bay leaf, ¼ teaspoon thyme, 8 whole black peppers and 4 onions. Let cook over low heat for 2 hours. Drain, saving the water. Rub 6 pork chops and 3-pound shoulder of lamb cut into serving pieces with salt and pepper and brown in a little fat with 6 onions and 1 clove garlic. Trim all meat from bones and cut pork into serving-sized pieces. Put a layer of the cooked beans in the biggest casserole you own, cover with half of the meat and browned onions, add more beans, another layer of the meat, and then the remaining beans, in which half bury 1 pound French or Italian sausage, diced or sliced; the bacon; and 1 garlic clove, minced. Add 1 teaspoon salt to the water in which beans have cooked, and pour enough of it over the beans to just cover them. Put a cover on the casserole and bake in a very slow oven (250° F.) for 3 hours, moistening with more of the bean liquid if the dish becomes too dry. Serves 12.

Brown-Sugar Squares: Cream ½ cup shortening; add 1 cup sugar gradually and beat until light. Add 2 egg yolks, one by one. Add 1 teaspoon vanilla and beat well. Sift together 1½ cups flour, ¼ teaspoon salt and 1 teaspoon baking powder. Add to first mixture. Beat well. Spread evenly in greased baking pan. Beat 2 egg whites until stiff, add 1 cup light brown sugar gradually and 1 teaspoon vanilla. Spread over the mixture in the pan and sprinkle with 1 cup chopped pecans. Bake in slow oven (300° F.) for 30 minutes. Cut into squares while warm.

YOUR LIFE

hat really brings us to Rule Number ee: Economize on the necessities, so you enjoy the extravagances. This may sound sy-turvy, but you will have to admit it is flourishes that add zest to life, especially ey give you something to remember long rward. The kind of financial fling that is t rewarding is one that gives an immedi- lift to the spirit and at the same time adens the horizons. Travel is, obviously, exceedingly pleasant way to do this, but not the only way. A hobby can get you ut mentally, even if your actual locomo- is limited to prowling around museums, que shops or libraries. You can, for ex- ple, have a wonderful time getting ac- inted with old china or glass through rowed books, public exhibits and shops ore you ever spend a cent. In the course urthering this acquaintance you will ac- re considerable lore about foreign places, also learn some surprising facts about r own country.

uctions, too, are a rich source of educa- and inspiration even before you become uyer. Finally comes the wonderful day en you take the money you have saved, having your shoes resoled or by doing r own shampooing and manicuring for weeks, and choose your first "collector's item." With that purchase you have promoted yourself. You have joined the class of people to whom life is something more than just getting by. You have made an investment in imagination. You are developing your own sources of pleasure and appreciation. By giving yourself a new taste, you are also giving yourself a new talent.

Every additional thing you understand and enjoy may be capital for you someday, with a possibility of golden dividends—literally. Through your adventures in spending—and living—you will gain greater confidence, wider appreciation. As your mind becomes better informed and more responsive, and your scope of experience widens, you will become an increasingly valuable property to an employer. High wages are not paid for routine jobs or to "routine employees." As you develop into a more interesting and better equipped person, you will be able to set a higher price on your services and get it, because you will be worth more.

You would like to be well-to do someday. Naturally. Who wouldn't? All right. Here is how you start. From the beginning of your wage-earning days, think of yourself as building up an "estate." Doesn't that have a solid, prosperous sound? Millionaires leave "estates." There is no reason you shouldn't have an estate, too, and maybe quite a sizable one before you're finished. It certainly is a more stimulating goal to work for than a "rainy-day fund," or an "old-age-and-emergency account." It doesn't have to include vast property holdings, company ownerships and long lists of securities. Your estate consists of the material accumulation of your lifetime, including your investments.

There is the magic word: investment. Not to be confused with speculation! Investment, in your case, is giving your money honest and responsible work to do so that it can hasten the happy day when you will be the possessor of substantial holdings. It also offers you another opportunity for education: in the field of financial management and planning.

Too many wage-earning women fall into one of two classes about their money operations. They are either overeager for quick profits and, therefore, completely gullible, or so frightened at the thought of any outside handling of their hard-earned funds that even to deposit them in the stoutest savings bank seems venturesome. They would really prefer to have a roll of greenbacks sewed up in the mattress.

And in each person I catch the fleeting suggestion of something beautiful, and swear eternal friendship with that.

—SANTAYANA: Persons and Places, vol. II—The Middle Span (Charles Scribner's Sons).

Savings banks are wonderful institutions, and particularly good, in my opinion, for fostering growing accounts until they are sturdy enough to be put out to heavier work. A savings account, however, is not very interesting as an end in itself, nor very profitable, in view of the low interest rate which is paid.

One form of investment which every businesswoman owes it to herself to investigate is an annuity. These come in various forms, and can be combined with life insurance or other provision for dependents, or can be used simply to assure eventual years of leisure or travel for oneself. The girl who signs one of these contracts in her early business days and makes faithful payments can feel with pride that she is the possessor of a steadily increasing estate. This form of accumulation is particularly good for women who need the spur of "must payments" to organize themselves financially.

A quick way to acquire the thrill of being an investor is to buy stock. Even one share gives the feeling of being a part owner in a great company. Here is where you show how sensible or how completely stupid you can be. A moment of honest thought will convince you that no matter how well equipped with native wit you are, you cannot possibly know by instinct about the soundness or investment desirability of the various companies whose stocks are publicly offered. Nor should you listen to well-meaning friends and relatives. Most especially, you should refuse to be hypnotized by smoothly worded offers to "let you in on the ground floor." Please, please, if you are considering a stock purchase, go to the investment department of your bank, or other recognized authority, and be thoughtfully advised! When your handsome, engraved certificate arrives, you feel that you have indeed entered the world of high finance. From then on, you will read the market and money pages of your paper with new interest; not only the stock report, but the comments of the editorial writers. You will even find yourself interested in statements of company reorganizations and earnings. All part of a useful education!

Real estate is a tempting investment consideration for many women, because of their basic interest in housebuilding. A number of women I know have combined this home-promoting instinct with a moneymaking plan by buying small houses, paying for them over a period of years while improving them, and finally selling them at a profit. This can be a satisfactory operation if you are content to work hard for reasonable returns, since very often the measure of your profit will be in direct proportion to the time, imagination and effort you yourself have given. Before you commit yourself to such a venture, you must reconcile yourself to the stern truth that there will probably be times when you will be hard pushed financially, due to the fact that reconditioning a house is almost as unpredictable a business as bringing up a family. There are sure to be emergency operations, and demands for unexpected furbelows!

One further word of caution about looking for your pot of gold in real estate: don't fall for the old dream of "far pastures being greenest." Every locality has good and bad points, so you had better stick to a geographical setting you know all about, whether you are buying a lot, a house or a mortgage.

It seems almost unnecessary to add that in building your estate you ought to include a proportion of Government bonds. These are the gilt-edged holdings which make your elders admire your perspicacity and give you a solid sense of inner comfort, in the knowledge that there is no safer way of assuring yourself of future capital. Moreover, in most organizations the buying of them can be made practically painless by means of having them automatically deducted from your pay. You can subscribe for small or big denominations, to be paid for over long or short periods. But whatever your commitment, every time one of Uncle Sam's crisply legal, promise-to-pay notes is delivered to you, you can pat yourself on the back and say, "There is a good time coming by and by!"

By keeping your eye on a warm and golden future (not a pinched and ailing one!) you will find present-day denial easier to take. Not day-in-and-day-out scrimping. That's bad, as pointed out in the earlier part of this article. But certain present deprivations in favor of future rewards are wholesome. Keep the picture of your final goal in mind. It will stiffen your current sales resistance. Try it. For instance: Your first objective may be a trip to Mexico. Good. Provide yourself with an armful of those glorious folders and booklets distributed so gladly by travel agents. Study cruise pamphlets. Get travel books from the library. Read up on Mexican art and history. And while you are sailing away on winged words, you will be perfectly content with your lunch of sandwiches and fruit!

Here is to all your happy tomorrows . . . made from your spirited, forward-looking todays.

If you are married, you just go ahead and have the baby, more or less philosophically. Usually it proves the finest thing that could have happened. If you're not married—well, I know of no modern improvement in the methods of dealing with that. Women still die as the result of abortions, and it's a sordid, painful and most unhappy business. Girls still have to choose between getting married after all, often to a reluctant male—and the possible heartache of finding that the romance is over—or the even greater heartache of giving up their babies.

It occurred to me that it would be helpful to learn just how many illegitimate babies are still being born in the United States today in this era of birth control. The Children's Bureau writes me that the latest figures, those for 1944, are 87,000 illegitimate live births in 38 states and the District of Columbia. Not included in this report were California and New York, two of our largest EASY on the sugar, the arm, the eye!

—THIS Swans Down "Mix-Easy" Cake!

SPRING DESSERT CAKE

Preparations: Have shortening at room temperature. Line bottom of a deep 8-inch layer pan with waxed paper; grease. Start oven for moderate heat (375° F.). Sift flour once before measuring. Notice how few utensils you need! Mighty little dishwashing after a "Mix-Easy" baking!

(All measurements are level.)

Measure into sifter:

1 cup sifted Swans Down Cake Flour (And be sure it's Swans Down!)
1½ teaspoons Calumet Baking Powder
½ teaspoon salt
¾ cup sugar

Measure into small mixing bowl:

4 tablespoons shortening

Measure into cup:

* Milk (see below for amount)
½ teaspoon vanilla

Have ready:

1 egg, unbeaten

*With butter, margarine, or lard, use ½ cup minus 1 tablespoon milk; with vegetable shortening or any other, use ½ cup milk.

Now—Swans Down's "Mix-Easy" Part! Beating cut in half! No creaming!

(Mix by hand or with electric mixer at low speed.) Stir shortening just to soften. Sift in dry ingredients. Add ⅔ of the milk and mix until all flour is dampened. Then beat 2 minutes. Add egg and remaining milk and beat 1 minute longer. (Count only actual beating time. Or count beating strokes. Allow about 150 full strokes per minute. Scrape bowl and spoon or beater often.)

Baking: Turn into pan. Bake in moderate oven (375° F.) about 25 minutes. Cool. Pile Strawberry Cream on top of cake and serve.

Strawberry Cream. Sweeten 1 cup sliced strawberries; drain. Fold into 1 cup cream, whipped.

Swans Down guarantees this delicious cake—but not with any other flour. Be sure you have Swans Down—for that famous downy-soft fineness, the mark of a true Swans Down cake!

states, and Massachusetts and Connecticut, both heavily populated, so it's not unreasonable to put the total at 125,000 as a minimum. Probably a large number of these unmarried mothers thought they knew the answers, but their methods were faulty. The rest simply yielded to impulse.

I can see the next questions coming up: "But suppose a girl is willing to take the comparatively slight risk of pregnancy—after all, many women do it today. Or suppose, as Jenny suggests, she actually wants to have a baby, marriage or no marriage. What then? Is there any really good reason why we girls should remain virgins until we are married?"

BLOSSOMTIME AGAIN

waited for the spring. In short, why not have a little party on the porch or in the patio if the day is warm and the sun behaves? But indoors or out, you'll find this gay May luncheon party, with its birds and blossoms, a pretty nice business. And if you don't fall in love with the bird cage of flowers, I shall be mistaken.

Cool as a cucumber. The way that expression started is because a cucumber is cool. You hunt up one, someday, hidden away close to the ground in its cradle of green leaves. Give it a hasty wipe, preferably on your sleeve, and bite into it. This performance ought to be spontaneous; but if you were brought up in the never-eat-cucumber-skins school, you may get out your jackknife and do a paring job. Whatever happens, the cucumber will be found to be about as cool as a watermelon's inside. And you know how cool that is.

So the beautiful little bowls and their candy-colored plates are full of fresh pineapple-and-rhubarb cocktail, done with pineapple and rhubarb juices and decorated with mint—which, should it impart a memory of its flavor to the fruit, will do no harm. Have it all very, very cold. Colder than a cucumber. After all, this is a fruit cocktail and has no truck with a cucumber at all.

Mistchavior Pattern

By Christabel Morley Cordell

Knowing it's just a passing phase
Consoles the harried mother
Until she learns, as years go by,
One phase succeeds another!

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

From cold to hot. Later in the season we'll be pining for cold lobster and iced trout and big platters of thin-sliced ham and chicken and such. Because the hot days suggest such things and a lot more besides. But right now let me introduce you—or the other way round—to a nice hot dish that has a lot to recommend it. It tastes good, for one thing. And that's the acid test.

CHEESE-AND-NOODLE RING

Cook 3 cups of medium-wide noodles in boiling salted water until tender. Drain and rinse with cold water. Melt 1 package of processed cheese in 1 cup of hot milk in the double boiler. Add 2 tablespoons of butter or margarine, 1 teaspoon of salt and ½ teaspoon of paprika. Mix with the noodles. Beat 4 egg yolks until light and fold in. Now beat 4 egg whites and fold these in. Have a ring mold very heavily greased and chilled. Pour in the noodle mixture. Set in a pan of hot water and bake 45 minutes in a moderate oven, 350°F. When it's done, take out and loosen around the edges with a spatula. Turn out on a platter. Fill the center with ham-and-asparagus mixture. Garnish with sections of fresh tomato and hot ripe olives.

The filler-upper. No noodle ring is better than what goes into it. Fancy a noodle ring as empty as an OPA sugar bowl. Just wouldn't make sense.

But the noodle ring presented here is full of ham and mushrooms and asparagus, and all in a sauce to make you hungry and leave you satisfied. By the way, it's no asparagus season again. Don't cut it abov the ground. Stick your knife down under th stalk and cut with a quick sideswipe motion And next year you will find that each stalk s cut will show up with a family of litt asparagi (this will stop you!), and that is a to the good. "Be fruitful and multiply." And so now for the filler-upper of the noodl ring, for we must be getting on. First thin we know it will be getting dark.

CREAMED HAM, ASPARAGUS AND MUSHROOMS

Cut ¾ pound of cold boiled ham int small pieces—like dice or less, you know Cook and drain package of frozen as paragus tips or bunch of fresh as paragus cut int pieces. Make 3 cup of medium crean sauce from 1 cup o cream, 2 cups o milk, 5 tablespoons of butter or marga rine and 5 table spoons of flour. Cook in the double boiler, stirring all the time until it is about as thick as heavy cream, and exactly as smooth. Season with salt and pepper to taste, and a pinch of dry mustard. Add the ham and the asparagus. At the last sauté 1 pound of mushrooms, sliced, in 2 tablespoons of butter or margarine, and add to the sauce.

Only one last word. Tomatoes, especially the little hothouse ones, taste wonderful at this time of year. Just as if they were made for May and had been waiting for blossomtime. They are tender and sweet and haven't that bored flavor some old tomatoes get. As if life had caught up with them at last, and their laurels were all behind them.

So, to garnish the noodle ring, cut sections or slices or, if they are small enough, use hollowed-out whole tomatoes, the kind I spoke of with regard. The little fellows may be filled with chopped scallions or chopped cucumber. (See how cucumbers keep cropping up? Well, nothing wrong with that.)

Then for the taste and contrast have some hot ripe olives. Their black skins are very decorative, and a ripe olive is better than anything except itself when it comes to eating.

HOT RIPE OLIVES

Heat to boiling 1 small jar or can of ripe olives in their own juices with half a clove of garlic (if you don't mind it) and 2 tablespoons of Worcestershire sauce. Or if you prefer, don't add anything, just heat in their own juice, but serve very hot. They don't keep hot the best of anything I ever saw, so heat them the very last thing.

CRUSTY ROLLS

You can make crusty rolls as easily as any others—including mine. About the only difference is, instead of using milk, just depend on good old tap water—or well, if you have a well. And another thing: instead of the whole egg, use two whites. That bolsters the roll without letting it get a caky texture. Also—bake the rolls on a greased sheet or pan which you have dusted over with corn meal. That does something—I never know just what; has to be brushed off afterward, so it's not for added nourishment, that's sure.

Have a very hot oven and put a pan of hot water in the oven under the racks. This helps out the crustiness. I guess that's all. But just to be sure you get a good crusty roll, here is the whole receipt:

Soften 1 cake of fresh yeast in ½ cup of lukewarm water. Put ½ cup of lukewarm water into a bowl and add 1 tablespoon of sugar, 1 teaspoon of salt and 2 tablespoons of shortening. Add 1 cup of flour, beating well. Add the softened yeast. Add ½ cup more of flour, beating well, then fold in 2 egg whites, beaten. Add enough more flour to make a soft dough—about 2 cups, or 3½ cups of flour altogether. Knead on a floured board until smooth, satiny and very elastic. Put in a clean greased bowl and let rise until doubled in bulk. Punch down. Let rise until doubled again. Knead down lightly. Cover and let rest for 10 minutes. Roll out. Cut into rectangular pieces about 1½ inches wide and 2½ inches long. Pat each rectangle flat. Fold long edges under so they meet. Snip off short ends with a sharp knife to seal dough and make nice pillow shapes. Place on greased pans that have been sprinkled lightly with corn meal. Slash top of each roll with sharp knife. Brush the rolls with butter or margarine. Cover with a towel and let rise until double in bulk. Bake in a hot oven, 450°F., for 20 minutes.

They are not pies. Nor are they tarts. Know what they are? They're blossoms. Such as never grew on the land or on the floor of the endless ocean. But they grew just the same, right in our kitchen, and, having no root and no bud, they are flowers of the imagination. Dream blossoms, sheer magic. And to make such, go to work on a few simple rules and you can't miss. They will bloom for you every time.

LEMON-MERINGUE BLOSSOMS

Make the meringues first. Add ⅛ teaspoon of salt, ½ teaspoon of vinegar and ¼ teaspoon of vanilla to 3 egg whites. Beat to a stiff foam. Add 1 cup of sugar gradually and keep on beating until very stiff. (Your arm should be fairly stiff by now too.) Shape in mounds on a cooky sheet covered with plain ungreased paper. Make a well in the center and shape them up into nests or cups with a spoon. Bake in a slow oven, 300°F., for 45 minutes. Remove from the paper immediately or the paper will become a permanent fixture. Cool. Fill with lemon filling.

Lemon Filling: Mix ¾ cup of sugar with ⅛ teaspoon of salt and 3 tablespoons of cornstarch. Add 1½ cups of boiling water gradually. Cook until thick and no taste of starch remains. Do this in the double boiler and stir it every minute. You wouldn't want a lump, would you? Add a small amount of the hot cornstarch mixture to 3 egg yolks that have been beaten until very light and spongy. Mix well and add the juice of 2 lemons and 2 tablespoons of grated lemon rind. Stir this into the rest of the hot mixture. Cook in the double boiler, stirring until thick—about 10 minutes. Cool, but don't chill it. Fill the meringues with this mixture. Serve with a strawberry sauce.

First of May. The streams are unbound and I shan't stay with you more than a minute or two longer this time. I was up in the attic the other day, looking things over, and I found things weren't so good. My fishing clothes (I shan't inventory them here) are in a deplorable state. I am perfectly certain someone has been wearing my—well, wearing one item, anyway. And while a general denial has been entered in by my household, jointly and severally, I feel sure I know. I just haven't the evidence, that's all. So I've got to get busy. Then my tackle looks as if the cats had had a Walpurgis Night with that. But Susie isn't allowed in the attic. And Weffy lives in another part of the house. So how account for that? Unless we have poltergeists. There's a hard day's work for me.

So excuse me if I leave you now. Oh, I must run. I hear something in the garden. It is, it is my mourning dove. Come home again for the summer. Good-by. THE END

It's molasses-mint!

Grandma's new taste-thrilling ice cream!

Turn back the clock and recapture an old-time flavor favorite—rich, mellow molasses tingly with tangy-sweet peppermint. You could bribe an angel with such a treat! But you must use Grandma's Old Fashioned Molasses for heaven-perfect results . . . only this molasses has the smoother, more delicate flavor that makes dessert divine!

ICE CREAM

Grandma's Molasses-Mint Ice Cream

2 teaspoons cornstarch
2 cups light cream
2 eggs separated
¼ cup Grandma's Molasses
¼ cup sugar
Few grains salt
Few drops peppermint extract

Combine cornstarch and ¼ cup of cream; mix until smooth. Add 1¼ cups of cream; cook over boiling water, stirring constantly, until mixture has slightly thickened. Beat egg yolks and add the remaining ¼ cup of cream; stir into the hot cream mixture. Cook over hot water, stirring constantly, until mixture coats the spoon. Chill; add molasses. Beat egg white stiff, gradually add sugar, beating constantly. Fold into molasses mixture; add salt and peppermint extract. Pour into ice tray of refrigerator. Set control at point recommended by manufacturer for freezing ice cream. Freeze to a mush. Place in chilled bowl. Beat smooth. Return to tray. Freeze firm. Serves six.

Vary your molasses-mint ice cream with different toppings—grated semi-sweet chocolate, shredded cocoanut, or nuts—it's superb with any of them. Just be sure you always use Grandma's Molasses. Because it's sweeter than ordinary molasses (1 cup equals a cup of sugar in sweetness), its finer flavor holds in freezing. And Grandma's is the only nationally sold brand that does not contain sulphur dioxide—you'll like it better for cooking and table.

BY JAN WEYL

WHEN Nan and I were ten we formed a business partnership called Sunshine Enterprises, Inc. The partnership had one aim: money—as quickly and easily as possible. We were planning to run away, and needed funds.

The "sunshine" in our name had no particular significance. At the time, a sunset was the only thing we could draw at all well, and we agreed that our products should have some special touch all their own. As it turned out, they had a distinctive quality even without the sun.

Because I was then planning to become a do-or-die, scoop-a-minute newspaper reporter, we inaugurated our partnership with The Sunshine News, a daily newspaper 5x3 inches, which featured such current items as the big puddle on the street or the detour on Van Dyke Avenue. Each paper, its front page ablaze with a setting sun, sold for three cents a copy. We thought this was a smart price, since the town's regular evening newspaper was selling for four cents a copy. And we carried many items which our competitor missed.

Nan and I were coeditors. We did everything from reporting to editing to typing. We started out with a child's typewriter—one of those where you have to turn the wheel around for each letter—but when it appeared that the paper was going to be a steady thing, someone donated a very old office typewriter. This creaked and groaned and sometimes wouldn't work, but we thought it lent just the right air to our office. We lived in a continual buzz of copy and carbon paper.

The circulation and distribution angle was handled exclusively by my brother Tom, aged four, and his friend Ned. They had little burlap bags with setting suns painted on the sides and shrieked up and down the neighborhood, "Sunshine News! Only three cents! Hot scoops!"

We had hot scoops too. The papers were a running commentary on our families and their friends. No one was safe, and no one knew in advance what the day's news items would be. After mother canned tomatoes, The Sunshine News announced that "Mrs. R. C. Weyl is canning many tomatoes this year. 'I get my tomatoes at Turnbull's,' says Mrs. Weyl. Advt." Mother, who gets her tomatoes at Salamack's, almost lost a good grocer.

When Nan's mother bought a new girdle, the news was faithfully reported. And after her father had a particularly successful day at the Saratoga track, we carried a complete account of his winnings copied from his racing program.

DAD received the prize blow, however, when we headlined the news, during the days of prohibition, that "Mr. R. C. Weyl has converted his mahogany phonograph into a liquor cabinet. All are invited to inspect same. Come on over and have a drink." Dad, who had been receiving a bootlegger named Shorty at the back door, was in no position to convert the liquor cabinet back to a phonograph. He did the next best thing and tried to buy up all available copies of The Sunshine News. But for the first time our delivery system had functioned perfectly. All fifteen copies had been delivered to their rightful owners.

Dad poured himself a highball and sat down to wait for the blow to fall. He decided that readers had a choice—they could either call the cops or drop in for a drink. Fortunately, all those who did anything dropped in for a drink.

After that a censorship system interfered with the free flow of news in The Sunshine News. Chief censor—R. C. Weyl.

The Sunshine News was more than a gossip sheet, however. Nan and I had a strong social consciousness, and every issue carried an editorial on our peeve of the day. Each editorial was surrounded by a dark pencil line, and sometimes, if we felt the announcement was important enough, we used arrows for added emphasis. We never praised, always attacked.

"Blood's cat stuck on roof for two hours. What is fire department doing these days?"

paper came out intermittently during 1932 and ıd Nan and I were fully aware of the economic king place. Several of our editorials appeared in n of newsletter warnings. They always carried a d, "WARNING," and were surrounded by a -black line. The warnings coincided with whatper we'd been reading that day and were remarkTheir inconsistency — anything from extreme left me right. WOLF STORY

"Talk a little louder," said the boy. "What did the wolf do when he slinked out of the forest?"

"Slunk," said the man. "Or maybe slank."

"Make it that he crawled out of the forest," said the boy, "but go on."

"Well, Waldo crawled out of the forest and crept over to the henhouse. For a long time the wolf had been watching Rainbow. He wanted to eat her and save her pretty feathers to make an Indian headdress."

The boy knew it was a joke. He would have laughed, but he was too sleepy.

"The feathers were so beautiful," said the man. "Red and pink and purple and lavender ——"

"Oo-ooh-h!" yawned the boy.

"—— and magenta . . . and . . . violet . . . and . . . yellow."

The man got up quietly. He pulled the blanket up around the boy's chin and crept out of the room, almost as quietly as the wolf, Waldo.

The next evening the boy got ready for bed all by himself. He took off his clothes and left them on the floor, kicking one shoe under the bed where it would be hard to find the next morning. He also dropped his underpants in the wastebasket. Then he pulled on his pajamas, and called to his father.

His father came upstairs. "Did you brush your teeth?" he said.

"When?" said the boy.

"Tonight."

"Not tonight, no," said the boy. "Shall I?"

"Why not?" said the man. "And what about washing your face? Shall I help you?"

"No, no, no," said the boy quickly. If there was anything he hated worse than washing his face, it was having someone else wash it. He hurried to the bathroom and smeared tooth paste on his toothbrush and then on his teeth. He took a big mouthful of water, swushed it around and spat it out. Then he took a damp washcloth and gently touched his face with it, being careful not to disturb the dirt inside his ears. He dried his hands on his pajamas, raced into the bedroom and leaped onto the bed.

"Someday you'll wear out your face, washing it so hard," the man said.

The boy laughed and crawled under the covers. "Tell about Rainbow," he said. "But make it long."

So the man continued the story: "The wolf, Waldo, crept very quietly to the chicken yard. He was quiet because he did not want to wake up Mr. Tractorwheel."

The boy asked in a loud voice, "Mr. Who?"

"Tractorwheel. Isn't that a good name for a farmer?"

"Very good," said the boy. "And make it that Mr. Tractorwheel has a son."

"He has several sons. And the wolf didn't want to wake up any of them."

"No," said the boy, "or Mr. Tractorwheel would come running with a shotgun and shoot the wolf."

"Don't you want the wolf to be shot?"

"Yes," said the boy, "but not yet. It has to be a long story first."

"I see," said the man. "Well, when the wolf came to the chicken yard, what did he find? What is all around the chicken yard?"

The boy sat up in bed, thinking hard. Then he said, "A fence."

The man was surprised. "A fence is right!" he said. "You're a smart boy."

The boy smiled and lay down again, this time on his back, with his hands under his head and his elbows sticking out like wings.

"The chicken yard was surrounded by a fence," said the man, "and the gate was locked. So how could the wolf get inside?"

"Make it that there is a hole in the fence."

"No," said the man. "If there in the fence, the chickens woul

"Could he climb over the fence boy.

"You know a wolf couldn' fence," said the man.

"Oo-ooh-h-h!" the boy yawne up and get him in somehow."

"Well, the wolf began to di under the fence. Then he crawl the tunnel and crept over to the Very quietly. V-e-r-y . . . v—e- quietly."

The boy yawned again and t on his side.

THE man waited for a moment stood up. But without opening h boy flung out one hand and caug

"Go on," he said. "More."

The man sat down again. "I house he saw a hen with all differe feathers. Blue and gray and scarle vermilion . . . and . . . cob and . . . azure."

The man pulled up the covers the boy on the cheek. On his w stumbled over the tin wastebasket a terrible clatter, but the boy wa in sleep to be bothered by anyth

The next day was Sunday, and fast the man said to the boy, "Sha an excursion today?"

"Yes!" cried the boy. "To F Park! And let's take Steffy."

Steffy's real Stefan and he door. He was a than Michael.

"All right," man. "We co lunch up there. mind," he said to mother, "not fix lunch for us!

"Oh, that terrible," said mother. "If I d to fix lunch for be forced to go back to bed and Sunday papers!"

So the man and the two boys to Fort Tryon Park. They left the the entrance, and walked down so steps and through a tunnel to a big where the boys played until lunchti lunch in the restaurant they went the field and sat on the grass.

"Tell a story," said Michael. "T Rainbow and the wolf."

So, after explaining to Stefan happened so far in the story, the tinued, "When Waldo the wolf s bow asleep in the henhouse he gra in his teeth ——"

"Tell Steffy how sharp the wol were," said Michael. "Sharp as knives, Steffy."

"Go on," said Stefan.

"Well, as the wolf grabbed her, let out a loud cackle. This woke up t hens and they cackled."

"Did it wake up Mr. Tractorwhee Michael.

"Make it that it didn't," said St

So the man went on, "Waldo Rainbow to his den, deep in the dar and there he ate her and that is th the story. Now let's be quiet for a

"No!" shouted Michael and Stef

"He didn't eat her yet!" said

"O.K.," said the man. "He di her."

"Then tell some more, daddy Michael.

"No, you boys are sleepy."

"We are not!" cried the boys.

"Well," said Michael's daddy, "I you'll be quiet for a few minutes I'll more on the way home."

The boys closed their eyes and p to be asleep. In a moment there sound of snoring. Was Michael asle Stefan? No. Michael's father was asleep!

When Michael's father woke up, they walked back to where the car was parked. They got in and Michael's father pressed his foot on the starter. The engine coughed, but it didn't start.

"I smell gasoline," said Stefan.

"She's flooded," said Michael's father. He got out and lifted the hood. Sure enough, the carburetor was dripping. "We'll have to wait till it drains," he said.

"Goody!" said Michael. "Tell some more about Rainbow."

So Michael's father went on with the story: "We left off where Waldo took Rainbow to his studio—I mean his den.

"'Little hen,' said the wolf, 'I am going to eat you.'

"'But I haven't had my breakfast,' said the hen. 'I will be fatter if I have breakfast. There will be more of me for you to eat.'

"'What are you trying to do, kid me?' said the wolf.

"'A poor little hen like me try to kid a great big handsome wolf like you?' said the hen. 'Don't be absurd.'

"The wolf looked in the mirror. He was a very vain wolf; he was always looking in the mirror and putting stickum on his hair.

"'What do you eat for breakfast?' said the wolf.

"'Oh, a little grain, maybe. Or worms.'

"'I ain't got any grain or worms,' said the wolf.

"'Not here in your den,' said Rainbow. 'But I wouldn't mind scratching around outside while you boil the water and put out the knives and forks.'

"'What knives and forks?'

"'I hope you weren't planning to eat me in your fingers,' said the hen.

"'How do you eat chicken?' cried the wolf.

"'I,' said the hen, 'do not eat chicken.'

"The wolf thought for a moment. 'How do I know you wouldn't run away if I let you scratch around outside?'

"The hen laughed. 'A poor little hen like me try to run away from a ferocious, intelligent wolf like you? Ha, ha, ha.'

"The wolf looked in the mirror again. He smoothed one eyebrow with a paw. 'I see what you mean,' he said. 'Well, go ahead. Eat a lot. Get fat. I'll call you when I'm ready. And listen, hen. Keep clucking so I can hear you. If you stop I'll know you're trying to escape and I'll come out and eat you right away.'

"'Cluck, cluck,' said the hen.

"'That's the idea,' said the wolf.

"So Rainbow went clucking out clearing and the wolf turned on the and put a big pot of water to boil. ize, of course, that wolves do not ranges and this is all just a lot of n

"But go on," said Michael. "I Rainbow get away?"

"Does Rainbow get away?" said father.

"Yes! And the wolf gets kill Stefan.

"How?" said Michael's father.

"Make it that the farmer has a named Jimmy, and Jimmy kills t said Michael, "only not right awa it a long story."

"All right," said Michael's fat the car will start, we can finish the the way home." He pressed the sta hood was still up and the boys gasoline squirt right out of the ca "Boys, we're in trouble," said father."

"Goody, goody," said the boys.

"Goody my foot," said Michael "I'll have to walk to a garage."

He went away, and after a while man brought him back in a truck an the car to a garage. A mechanic carburetor apart.

"Have to put in a new float," "Take me about an hour."

"Goody!" cried Michael. "You about Rainbow for a whole hour."

"Oh, fine," said his father.

They went out and sat on the st house next door to the garage.

"Go on," said Michael.

"Well," said Michael's father, " was in the forest outside the den o the fiercest and most boring wolf in t when the sun came up, and Mr. wheel and his boys got up and wer do the chores."

"What are chores?" said Stefan.

"Little jobs like milking the cows the pigs and the chickens."

"Go on," said Michael.

"Young man, if you say 'Go on' j more, I'm going to have Rainbow g den and beat that wolf's brains ou Michael's father.

"All right, but stop saying 'Go on.' Well, Jimmy Tractorwheel was the farmer's youngest son. He was only about five, but strong, very strong. And clean. Always kept his hands and face clean. He ate spinach and carrots and ——"

"Did Jimmy go to the henhouse?" asked Michael.

"Yes, because it was his job to feed the chickens, and he came running to his father. 'Father, father, Rainbow is gone! Come quickly!'

"So they ran to the henhouse.

"'H'm-m,' said the farmer, 'she's gone all right. Must have flown over the fence.'

"'No, father,' said Jimmy. 'Look! See the big hole under the fence. I think the wolf dug it and carried Rainbow away. And, look, there's wolf hair on the fence.'

"'Danged if there ain't,' said the farmer.

"So he and Jimmy went back to the house. The other boys were already at the breakfast table. Jimmy told them about Rainbow. They all shook their heads sadly except Tom, who was always making jokes.

"'Did you see a pot of gold?' said Tom.

"'No, why?' said Jimmy.

"'They say there's always a pot of gold at the end of a rainbow, and this sure looks like the end of Rainbow!' Tom laughed so hard he fell over backward in his chair.

"'I don't think it's funny,' said Jimmy.

"'No, but it's true,' said his father. 'This is the end of Rainbow.'

"'MAYBE not,' said Jimmy. 'Maybe we could rescue her. The wolf must have taken her to his den.'

"'And den what?' said Tom, falling over backward in his chair again.

"'He ate her,' said the farmer.

"'Maybe not,' said Jimmy. 'Maybe he's saving her for supper. Let's all go into the forest and search.'

"'Good idea,' said his father. 'You boys do that. I have to see a man about a well rope.'

"'I have a date to pitch horseshoes with Derwood Quigg,' said the oldest boy.

"'I'm helping the Hargelroad girls make butter,' said the next oldest. 'They helped me last week.'

"'And one good churn deserves another,' cried Tom. 'As for me, I have to go to the doctor to have some stitches taken in my scalp.' The last time he had fallen over in his chair he had hit his head on the stove, which is the sort of thing that happens to people who go around making bum jokes.

"'I'll go alone,' said Jimmy. So as soon as breakfast was over he took a baseball bat and a small compass and went into the forest."

The garageman came to the door. "She's O.K. now," he said. So they got in the car and started home.

"You boys have been very good today," said Michael's father. "You deserve a reward. What will it be? Ice-cream cones?"

"More!" cried the boys.

"More what?"

"More about Rainbow!"

"Next Sunday," said Michael's father. "In the meantime, please do not mention Rainbow to me, or Waldo, or Jimmy Tractorwheel. Is that clear?"

The boys did not argue. They generously agreed to take ice-cream cones as their reward. Double ice-cream cones, that is.

At breakfast the next Sunday, Michael's father said, "Well, son, what about an excursion?"

"Yippee! Let's go to Jones Beach!"

"But it's too chilly to go swimming."

"We could play on the sand. And fly a kite."

"That's an idea," said his father, who liked to fly kites. "Maybe we could get that big box kite in the air." He had a box kite as large as a kitchen stove and almost as heavy. He had never been able to get it off the ground. He thought perhaps the wind at the beach would lift it—and also, of course, he wanted to go where his son wanted to go.

Michael went to get Stefan while his mother fixed a lunch for them and his father went to the basement to find the box kite, and soon they were driving toward the beach and Michael's father resumed the story.

"Let's see, where were we?" he said. "Oh, yes, Jimmy Tractorwheel went into the forest in search of Rainbow."

"He took a compass to find the wolf with," said Stefan.

"No, the compass was to find his way home," said Michael's father, "in case he got lost. Anyway, Jimmy went bravely into the forest. He walked very quietly. And every few minutes he would stop, turn his head slowly and listen very hard in every direction. Do you know what he was listening for?"

"Clucking!" cried the boys.

"Yes. And after a long while he heard it. 'Cluck, cluck, cluck.' He turned his head this way and that way and then he set off in what he thought was the right direction. But the clucking grew fainter instead of louder. Why was that?"

"Rainbow was getting tired?" said Stefan.

"The wolf took Rainbow in his den!" cried Michael.

"No. The clucking grew fainter because Jimmy was traveling in the wrong direction. So instead of going so much this way, he started going a little more that way, and the clucking grew louder and louder. He walked on tiptoe; tip . . . toe . . . tip . . . toe. So-o-o-o-o quietly. Suddenly he heard a bell ringing. Dingdong, dingdong! What could it be? He lay flat on his belly and peeked around a bush and there in the clearing, what did he see? He saw Rainbow! And across the clearing in front of his den, he saw the wolf, Waldo, wearing a dirty old pink apron and ringing a big dinner bell

Men have more ways of amusing themselves than of doing anything else they do.

— WALTER BAGEHOT

"'Come and get it,' cried the wolf. 'The water is boiling and I'm hungry.'

"Rainbow was so frightened she could hardly speak, but she managed to say, 'I'm not quite finished with my breakfast.'

"'Come on!'

"'I'd like one more worm.'

"'No!'

"'Give me till you count to twenty-five,' said the hen.

"'I will not! Quit stalling.'

"'You don't know how to count to twenty-five,' said the hen.

"'I certainly do,' said the wolf.

"And now," said Michael's father, "this is where we leave the car, and walk through that underpass to the beach."

The boys were so excited to be near the ocean that they forgot all about Rainbow and scampered off to the underpass, leaving Michael's father to carry a blanket, a lunch basket, two sweaters, a kite, and one, two, three, four, five, six balls of string.

Michael and Stefan took off their shoes and socks and ran in the deep, soft, white sand, getting it in their ears and hair and down their necks and up their sleeves and in their pockets. Michael's father sat on the blanket assembling the kite. Presently he stood up and called to the boys. The kite was ready. It was as large as Michael.

"Now watch her fly," said Michael's father. He ran across the beach, but the kite just bumped along on the sand. "The wind blows it down instead of up," said Michael's father.

"You can fix it, daddy," said Michael. "Come on, Steffy. Let's be cowboys," and the boys galloped away.

Michael's father studied the box kite very carefully. He untied a string here and put it there, and untied a string there and put it here. Then he called the boys.

"I'm going to try once more," he said. "If she doesn't go up by the time I get to the water, I am going to throw her in the ocean."

"Yipe!" cried the boys. They didn't know which would be more fun, to see the kite in the sky or in the ocean.

Michael's father began to run. Suddenly the kite left his hand. Slowly but steadily it began to climb. Up, up, up, higher and higher. Michael's father let the boys take turns holding the string. It was very exciting, because, if you accidentally let go, the kite would come tumbling down. They played with it till lunchtime and then they sat on the blanket and ate sandwiches and tomatoes, oranges and cookies, and drank up the vacuum bottle of milk. Then they stretched out in the warm sun.

"Think you could take a nap?" said Michael's father.

"First some Rainbow," said Michael. "Will that make you sleepy?"

The boys said no.

"It will me! Well, where were we? Oh, yes. Where the wolf said Rainbow had to come in this very minute to be eaten.

"'You'll have to catch me first,' said Rainbow. And she ran across the clearing toward the bush where Jimmy lay hiding.

"'Ha, ha,' cried the wolf. 'I can catch you in two leaps.' His big butcher-knife teeth were glistening in the sun. He made one great leap that carried him to the center of the clearing. And at that moment five-year-old James Tractorwheel jumped out from behind the juniper bush, holding the baseball bat firmly in both hands.

"'Halt!' said Jimmy.

"'Yipe!' screamed the wolf.

"Jimmy put all his muscle into one swing of the bat and brought it down on the wolf's head. Bong! The wolf smiled foolishly and sank to his knees. . . . Now what I want to know is this: Do you boys want Jimmy to hit the wolf again and kill him, or tie him up and drag him home and put him in a cage, or what? How do you want the story to end? Steffy, you're company. You say."

Stefan smiled shyly. "Ask Mike," he said. "It's his story."

"Steffy, you are a very good, kind, polite boy, a credit to your mother and father," said Michael's father. "And Michael, you are also a very good, kind, polite boy, and, as Steffy says, it is your story. What shall we do with the wolf?"

"Make it that he gets up and runs away," said Michael.

His father could hardly believe his ears. "Let the wolf run away?"

"Yes," said Michael. "As fast as his legs will carry him."

"You don't want him killed? Or even captured?"

Michael shook his head, no.

"This is the first time you've ever wanted a wolf to get away. What is this, be-kind-to-wolves week?"

MICHAEL'S eyes were shining and he spoke in a loud whisper. "If the wolf gets away he will come back and steal Rainbow again!"

"Yes," cried Stefan.

"You want that to happen?" cried Michael's father.

Michael nodded his head, yes. "That way we can have more story!" he said.

"Yea!" said Stefan.

"So go on," said Michael. "You can kill the wolf at the very end."

And so Michael's father made it that the wolf got up and dashed into the deep green forest, and then they all went to sleep on the blanket with the waves roaring agre their ears. And when they woke up t played on the sand till Michael's fat it was time to go home.

"No!" cried Michael. "Not so soo

"'We have filled up that hole un fence,' said Jimmy's father, 'so Rainb be safe in the chicken yard.'

"I don't want to make it too scary Michael's father.

"Yes!" cried the boys. "Make it too Horribly, horribly scary."

"Well," said Michael's father, Waldo ran off into the forest, he wa angry. 'Who does that little Jimmy T wheel think he is anyway?' he said t self. 'Hitting me with a ball bat! A only five years old!'

"He went back into his den and got a glass fruit jar. He caught a lot of fireflies and put them in the jar. When they all flashed at once he could see pretty well, and so he arrived at the farm without bumping into any more trees.

"'Ah! Perfect!' he said to himself. 'Everybody in bed, including that little smarty-pants Jimmy. Will he be surprised when he comes out in the morning and finds his pet hen missing! I'll eat her right in the chicken yard and leave some of the feathers, so he'll know I ate her. Heh, heh, heh!'

"Waldo crept toward the chicken yard. He held the jar of fireflies under his topcoat and let out just enough light to show him where he had dug a hole under the fence. It was filled up but with very soft earth.

"'This is too easy,' he said to himself. He stripped off his topcoat, put the jar of fireflies on the ground and began to dig. His sharp toenails ripped up the soft earth and threw it back between his front legs, against his empty belly, reminding him that he was mighty hungry. He had his nose right in the earth, and all of a sudden it bumped into the concrete wall.

"'Ouch!' he yelped. 'I skinned my nose!'

"In the house Jimmy Tractorwheel rolled over in bed, but he did not quite wake up.

"Waldo brought his firefly flashlight over to see what he had bumped into. 'Aha,' he snarled. 'They put a rock in the hole. Thought they'd fool old Waldo that way. Heh, heh. I'll show 'em. I'll dig around the rock!'

"He began a new hole right next to the old one. The earth shot out and rattled against his belly. And then, again ——

"'Ouch!' he yelped. 'I skinned my nose!'

"This time Jimmy woke up. He sat up in bed. 'Did I hear something?' Jimmy said to himself. He listened. 'Guess not,' he said, and lay down again.

"Meanwhile Waldo was snarling to himself, 'I'll show 'em. I'll go around to the other side of the yard. I guess they wouldn't think of putting a rock over there.'

"He picked up his fireflies and his topcoat and slunk around to the opposite side of the yard and began to dig. Faster and faster flew the soft black earth. 'Won't be long now,' panted Waldo. And then ——

"'Ouch! I skinned my nose!'

"This time Jimmy Tractorwheel distinctly heard a sound. He went to his window and looked out. He could see nothing but an occasional glow of light as if from an unusually large firefly.

"'That's funny,' said Jimmy to himself. He decided to stay at the window for a while to watch and listen.

"And now, boys," said Michael's father, "I hate to interrupt the story, but here we are at the Triborough Bridge and I have to get a quarter out of my pocket to pay the toll with."

"Let me hand it to the policeman," said Michael.

"You did it last time," said Stefan. "Let me."

"O.K., Steffy, you do it."

So when the car stopped at the tollgate it was Stefan who handed the quarter to the policeman.

"We're almost at the end of the story and I'll try to finish it before we get home," said Michael's father as they drove down the East Side Drive.

"Make it that Waldo skins his nose again," said Michael.

"Oh, no," said his father. "Waldo has skinned his nose three times already."

"But it's so funny," said Stefan. The very thought of Waldo skinning his nose made the boys laugh so hard they almost fell out of the car.

"But this time," said Michael's father, "the wolf decided to try to dig sideways. So he found a fresh spot and began digging with his left front paw and his left rear paw, so in case he ran into another rock he would not skin his nose. He was digging fast when all of a sudden ——

"'Ouch!' he yelped. 'I skinned my side!'"

Michael's father had to stop for a few moments because the boys were laughing so hard. Then he continued: "This time week after week. Your hand and arm tell you the difference more plainly than words. There is no heaviness. Your iron slips neatly forward and back. You flick it right or left almost effortlessly. As though by second nature you press and turn and press and fold and press and fold again. Each movement of the iron leaves its little path of gleaming perfect finish. Your fingers feel what your eyes have seen and you come to know enchantment in work that is not toil. A hint of woodsy fragrance comes from the warmth as your iron changes the dampened things to dry. Yet the softness remains in all your lightly starched things. Your curtains take on billowy loveliness, the ruffles, like petal forms, if that is the effect you wish. Dresses smooth into tailored form and finish. Shirts become easy to do. On the other hand, where a firm stiff dressing of starch is needed to give crisp or even rigidly white smoothness, quick elastic starch in heavy solution rubbed or clapped time and again into and on dry pieces enables you to do even a dress shirt front. In just a few moments you make your own perfectly fresh liquid starch. A cupful, a pint or a gallon.

Jimmy heard the wolf quite clearly. He ran into his father's room.

"'Papa, papa,' cried Jimmy. 'The wolf is trying to get in the chicken yard again!'

"'Oh, go back to bed,' said his father. 'You're dreaming.'

"Down in the yard, Waldo had given up digging sideways and was trying to dig backwards with his hind feet. Suddenly he let out the biggest yelp of all:

"'Ouch! I skinned my behind!'

"'You're right, Jimmy,' said Papa Tractorwheel, jumping out of bed. 'It is the wolf. We'll catch him.'

"They woke up all Jimmy's brothers. Jimmy's father took a shotgun, Jimmy took his baseball bat and the other boys took ropes and old tennis rackets. Quietly they crept out of the house.

"'We'll surround him,' whispered Jimmy's father.

"Half of them crept to one side of the chicken yard and the others to the other side. Waldo did not hear them, he was so furious. He kept digging, digging, digging. First frontwards, and he would yelp, 'Ouch, I skinned my nose!' Then sideways: 'Ouch, I skinned my side.' Then backwards: 'Ouch, I skinned my behind!'

"Suddenly Farmer Tractorwheel turned on a big flashlight. Waldo whirled toward the light, snarling viciously.

"'Stay where you are or I'll shoot,' said Farmer Tractorwheel.

"Then the ferocious wolf began to whine. 'Oh, please don't hurt me,' he begged. 'I didn't mean no harm. I only wanted to play with the pretty hen!'

"FARMER TRACTORWHEEL said, 'Jimmy, it was you that caused the wolf to be caught. You can decide what to do with him. Shall I shoot him?'

"'Just a minute, papa,' said Jimmy. 'May I ask him a few questions?'

"'Your witness,' said the farmer.

"'Wolf,' said Jimmy, 'what makes you so mean?'

"'I never had a chance to be nothing else,' said the wolf. 'I never been anything but a wolf all my life. I never had no opportunities. I ain't even been to school.'

"'Oh, shoot him,' said Tom Tractorwheel. 'I want to get back to bed.'

"'What do you say, Jimmy?' said Papa Tractorwheel. 'We can't stand here all night arguing.'

"'Well,' said Jimmy, 'I think we ought to lock the wolf up in a cage. Tomorrow I will come and talk to him some more. I will try to learn more about wolves. Then I will try to work out a plan for solving the wolf problem.'

"So the wolf was locked up. And every day Jimmy would come and ask him questions. Soon Waldo himself became interested in the wolf problem and he told Jimmy all sorts of things about the way a wolf is treated by his parents and what makes him so fierce. The more he talked about fierceness, the gentler he grew, until finally he was allowed out of the cage on a leash. Jimmy and Waldo became good friends, and wrote a book about wolves which was read by the farmers in that part of the country and helped them to understand why wolves behave as they do. As the farmers learned to understand wolves they grew less afraid of them. Some farmers made friends with wolves and even trained them to work as sheep dogs, wearing muzzles. And all this happened because Jimmy Tractorwheel was kind and grave and very curious.

"And that," said Michael's father, "is the end of the story."

"Start it all over again," said Michael.

"Yes!" said Stefan.

"You boys have been so very good today," said Michael's father, "that I will take you on another excursion next Sunday."

"And tell it again," said Stefan.

"Yea!" cried Mike.

And so it was that when Michael and Stefan got on the elevated train the following Sunday with Michael's father, the people directly behind them heard these words:

"Once upon a time there was a hen named Rainbow. . . ."

I'd like to be president of a bank up in Rockefeller Center, where all the real tony banks in New York City are now converging. I would not care to be a banker in Wall Street. It's too commercial down there and the commuting is not only difficult but dangerous. Rockefeller Center is the real place. The atmosphere is civilized and enlightened. Everybody is polite and says "please" and "I thank you." Ladies take off their hats in the elevators when there are gentlemen passengers.

I'd like to have an office with a huge, leather-topped desk that once belonged to Disraeli or the Earl of Cork. I'd have a big Paul Revere silver bowl of popcorn on my desk, and I would make loans to my friends and to other deserving and needy people, without once mentioning such sordid words as "collateral" or "amortization."

I've always wanted to be a nurse. Even today I have to sort of keep myself in check whenever a loved one is ill. My impulse is to run over to their homes, change linen, prepare broths, administer medicine and hover solicitously about. I have to check those impulses, however, the last time that happened, the nurse quit!

Do you know why cats always wash themselves after a meal? A cat caught a sparrow, and was about to devour it, but the sparrow said, "No gentleman eats till he has first washed his face." The cat, struck with this remark, set the sparrow down and began to wash his face with his paw, but the sparrow flew away. The vexed animal said, "As long as I live I will eat first and wash my face afterward."

I would like to direct Bing Crosby in a picture. I would like to see that boy act my way—something he's never done yet. In fact, I'd like to see him act. What happens when Crosby is in a picture? It's always the same thing: if I'm in it, Bing steals the girl; if I'm not in it, Barry Fitzgerald steals the picture.

If I had my way and could do something that would be both interesting and enjoyable, I would devote all my time to my farm. I would operate it on a self-sustaining basis, in the old-fashioned way—using the plow instead of the tractor, the horse instead of the automobile. In other words, I would like to emulate my grandfather—to achieve the kind of happiness he had.

When I was very, very young I wanted to change myself into a pony. Grandmother used to take me shopping and stick my nose up against the post, where I'd wait patiently until she returned. Later I wanted to become a boy, because baseball was my favorite occupation. Now I'd like to make my thirteen-year-old son into an artist. He wants to become a magician, and it will probably take more than sleight of hand to change his ambition.

"From size 18 to size 12 —it happened to me!"

—says Mrs. Valerie Derrick of Columbia, South Carolina

"It's almost unbelievable that a woman can be remade in a few short weeks," says Mrs. Valerie Derrick, of Columbia, S. C. "But here I am, wearing a size 12 after wearing 18 for years, profiting by a real knowledge of skin care, make-up, hairstyling, enjoying radiant health and vitality. All these the DuBarry Success Course made possible for me."

Mrs. Derrick had always been slim until her baby came. Then her weight went up to 149. Comments about her size made her unhappy. But the Success Course changed everything. Down in a few weeks to 116, gone those heavy hips and thighs. Back came a glow to her cheeks and back came the joy of living.

"I enjoyed every minute of the DuBarry Success Course," writes Mrs. Derrick. "And the cost was so small that I consider those dollars the best I ever spent."

How about YOU? Unhappy about your looks? The DuBarry Success Course shows you right at home how to remodel your figure, have a smooth, glowing skin, style your hair, use make-up for glamour, be at your best. It's exciting and it's fun. You follow the same methods taught by Ann Delafield at the famous Richard Hudnut Salon, Fifth Ave., New York.

In May, it is enough to stand, drink in the apple-blossomed air, dream of promises of spring, being glad you can begin again.

Diary of Domesticity

By Gladys Taber

AY is a month for dreaming. The rich fulfillment of summer is not yet come, and the stern reality of winter is one with all time past. Winter, I think, he frosty visage of a Puritan, and has raffic with light-mindedness. And ner is like a Greek goddess, templed in and robed in moon-silver, but she es in her hand the dark secret seed of w, for she forecasts beauty that must it May is enchantment without shadow. is the sweetness of love and the mys- of blossoming. And in May the faery come back to our New England hills the lands beyond the sunset. For like May too! My unicorn stamps his r hoofs on the massed wild violets in ight of the May moon, and the glossy t-shaped leaves bend as he passes. He s the dark-purple and the blue-and- e violets, and his polished silver horn the delicate rosy bells of the wild bush eysuckle as he moves up the hill. To on the fatal beauty of the unicorn is ie, according to the legends, but some look and live to tell of it, or how would know what the unicorn looks like?

Iay is like lyric poetry, and is the time read it, preferably aloud to someone love. Poetry ought to be read aloud way, because the sound of the words is sic. Like the music of Yeats:

sat grown quiet at the name of saw the last ember of dark wine d in the trembling blue-green of the sky noon, worn as if it had been a shell shed by time's waters as they rose and ell out the stars and broke in days and ears.

It is good for us, I think, to keep as much in life as we can. We busy ourselves h so many things that are not of the rt and spirit. We worry about money, agonize over the terrible state of the rld, we fret at household duties or bus- ss minutiae, we work, we argue, we uander our strength in a million ways. And all the time the wonder of life is ound us, the ecstasy of breathing air ravished by apple blossom, of walking on fern-cool driftways, of listening to young leaves moving in the moonlight, and of seeing the twilight stars in the violet bowl of the sky. There is joy enough in one spring day to furnish forth the world, if we but knew it.

Even if life seems too difficult at times and grief gets too intimate with us and death raises his umbrella between us and the sun, there is still joy to be had in the immeasurable gifts of life, if we accept it. I do not mean to be a Pollyanna, for I always thought she was a tiresome person. But I think one should never lose awareness of all that is lovely.

The problem of suffering we shall always have with us. When I read the figures of the casualties in our last war, or get a letter from a friend whose only son lies under a white cross in Switzerland, I know there are losses we cannot atone for. When my own mother died, there seemed to me to be no answer to anything. For a time the only universality was death.

And then I remember walking in the dusk along the quiet little street toward the house now so empty and meaningless. There was light enough from the sky to cast the lattice shadow of leaves on the walk. The sound of the river was steady and swift, and the air smelled of sulphur from the mills beyond it. As I looked up, a delicate petal of moon drifted into the tender blue, and all at once I thought, How wonderful that the stars still shine! And I

Now in May, the cockers are in ecstasy too. Cool nights and coin-gold days are just their dish. And the good smell of rabbit fills the thickets. They never, never catch a rabbit, but they have prodigious games at it. And as I watch them, I know their merry disposition is authentic, for their tails almost wag off. A cocker may have sad eyes, but never a sad rear half.

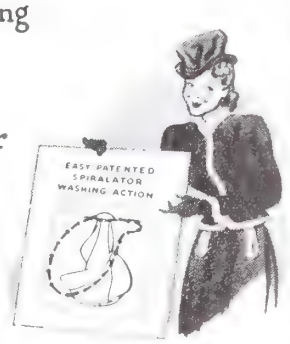
Speed with my washing
Is the thing I admire
It's done in an hour
With my Easy Spindrier



So gentle the action
In all parts of the tub
Clothes wash out completely Without harmful rub

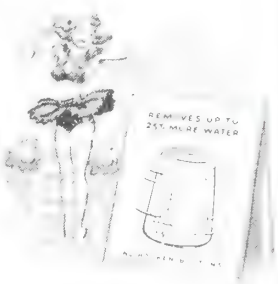
And when they are washed
They're so easy to shift
From one tub to the other
Not heavy to lift



But the thing I like best
There's no wringing to do
The clothes whirl around
Till your rinsing is through

With so much water removed
On account of the spin
The clothes dry much faster
Outdoors or in Come see it in action

And after you try 'er
You'll be glad you waited as big as he did. Staggering with effort, falling over and starting over, he made his triumphant way. Then he dropped it, withdrew and attacked fiercely. His growl is about as large as the sound of a small egg beater. He eats baby food, scraped beef, milk and egg, pablum, and has a droppertul of tomato juice and of cod-liver oil for tea.

Esmé and Tigger think very little of him, but if he lunges into their orbit they withdraw to a shelf and peer down. They seem to know he is a chewer and pouncer and lacks stability. Esmé shows her Siamese possessiveness by leaping on my lap and rubbing her head on my hand to indicate that the new little black thing is of no consequence.

Tigger, being a Yankee Manx, has a different idea. He is one of the most secure people we have ever known. Jealousy is not for him, nor doubt of our feelings about him. He does not yearn over us; he takes whatever loving he needs and then goes about his own affairs. He is never rushing up to say, "Do you still love me?" the way Esmé and the cockers do. He is a comfortable cat. We all admire his rugged individualism and so does Esmé.

I don't spend much time in May in the kitchen. Too much magic outdoors.

Last night we had hot deviled eggs in cheese sauce, asparagus on toast strips and Oberlin coconut loaf for dessert. This is one of our favorites and is easy to do. I soften 2 envelopes plain gelatin in 1 cup cold milk. Add ¾ cup sugar. Stir the whole over hot water until the gelatin is well dissolved.

In China, the first question a person asks the other on an official call is, "What is your glorious age?" If he replies apologetically that he is 23 or 28, the other generally comforts him by saying that he still has a glorious future, and that one day he may become old. Enthusiasm grows in proportion as the gentleman is able to report a higher and higher age, and if he is anywhere over 50, the inquirer drops his voice in humility and respect. People actually look forward to the celebration of their 51st birthday.

—LIN YUTANG The Importance of Living. (John Day Company, Inc.)

Cool until it begins to thicken. Then add 2 cups shredded coconut, 1 pint stiffly whipped cream and 1 teaspoon vanilla. Place in a wet mold and chill. Serve it with more whipped cream, garnished with maraschino cherries. Chopped fruits or nuts, or both, may be added to the extra whipping cream, too, for a variation.

We are always hungry in May. Jill works so hard in the garden that she comes in starving. If the children get home for a week end, they go straight to the kitchen to see what's available. Fortunately for us, Dorothy's new husband, Val, is definitely kitchen-minded. Happy the family that can achieve in-laws that seem indigenous to the household. We sometimes forget he hasn't always been here. He is gifted with a wonderful gaiety of spirit, an endless curiosity about how things are made, and a fine sensitivity to other people's feelings. And I think these traits should go at the top of the list on all those "What kind of man should I marry?" charts. Dorothy thinks so too.

This year we are going to double the amount of frozen food in the freezer. For last winter we had just as much company as we have in the summer, and Jill said all she did was climb the cellar stairs with both arms full of cartons.

And when four people turned up for a week end when the roads were bad, how easy it was simply to serve a dinner with no fuss. We had stuffed boned veal roast, creole squash, Frenched beans, ice cream and brownies, all from the freezer. And oyster stew for supper, with toasted English muffins and icebox dessert. The freezer again.

We try to keep a cooked roast put down, beef or lamb or a ham, which can be served as soon as defrosted. The fan speeds this up.

The home freezer is, to my mind, the greatest help a housekeeper can have. There is no such thing as its being hard to feed any number of people at any time if you have a freezer. All you do is choose your menu and lug it up.

Jill says we shall do tons and tons of chard, spinach and beet greens. I am nothing more than a rabbit, she says, for all winter I want greens intensely, all the time. I could even eat them for breakfast. And a spoonful of sour cream stirred in chopped spinach is a fine thing indeed!

We are too busy to make hollandaise now, so we use mayonnaise on the bowl of tender young beet greens. Although it is painting the lily to use anything but butter and salt.

Sunday my friend Maurice came over with a cranberry-glass pitcher for my collection. He saw it in a window in a junk shop, and popped in and secured it. It has little flowers painted on its rosy curve and the top is fluted delightfully.

With milk glass, a few pieces of cranberry glass are a perfect complement, and what nicer thing for a friend to do than to think of this while dashing down a busy street in the course of a day's work?

On thinking it over while scraping carrots for salad, I decided collections are valuable two ways: for the beauty intrinsic in the things themselves, and for the memory that is in them. Anyone who does not know the warm feeling of remembering the day a certain piece of glass or ironstone was secured has a real emptiness in his life. In my Wedgwood covered toddy cups lies a full glowing autumn day, a sky like a blowing sail, mountains like a symphony. And the ceaseless conversation of me and Bebe in the back seat of the car and the thoughtful murmur of Jill and my Cousin Rob up front. And the laughter of young Bobby.

This is all in the toddy cups, as well as the lovely old house where we found them and the extra delight of meeting some nice people around Elizabeth Curns' open fire. Even Bobby's trumpet is in there, playing Sweet Sue, and the tureen of homemade clam chowder that we had when we got home.

I like to go into the yard after supper, and sit a few moments and feel the moonlight slip into my soul. There is the house, steadfast against time, lighted and comfortable and well filled with cockers and cats. There is Jill's garden, growing like mad to the left of me, and there across the road comes George from milking, and I think what a fine thing it is to know George, with his strength and patience and thoughtfulness and his sunny smile.

And beyond my horizon, over the darkening hill where the old orchard dreams, are all those other places like Samarkand and Cathay and Alexandria and Tibet. The "old unquiet ocean" is rolling around the world and strange winds blow in the ship's rigging.

And here am I, and the May moon is weaving a silver web across the grass and the stars are young. And Honey is stepping softly to lay a velvet nose in my hand; Honey always follows my moods, so she is thinking too. Up the shadowy slopes moves my unicorn, making no sound with his silver hoofs, but the violet leaves are whispering.

For May is a month to dream. THE END

WITH THE CHILDREN

"So, I took the twenty-five cents for climbing in her window for her to teach her a remembrance lesson to always take her key. Children can teach grownups too."

"And now I know what you mean about thinking first. When I saw the scissors I only thought of cutting my hair. For a long time I'll have to look at silly hair. I feel badly because my hair is more 'portant to me than anyone. It isn't all my fault, though; you should of seen how big those scissors looked at me." —KATHRYN COFFEY GLENNON.

The only safe sure proven MOTHPROOF method used for years by big woolen mills and now sold for home use!

One spraying actually mothproofs the cloth itself for a WHOLE YEAR

If you want to be absolutely sure that moths will never eat your precious woolen coats, suits, dresses and rugs—you must actually MOTHPROOF the wool itself with LARVEX—the sensational magic spray which gives POSITIVE PROTECTION against moth damage—the safe, modern, proved way to mothproof which big woolen mills rely on.

It's Sure! Moths will commit suicide by starvation rather than eat anything treated with LARVEX. LARVEX penetrates each tiny woolen fibre and mothproofs the cloth itself. Protection lasts a whole year.

It's Quick! Just spray the garment with LARVEX and hang in its usual place ready for immediate wear. No wrapping. No storing. No mothball, camphor or cedar odor. No harmful vapors. LARVEX is odorless and stainless.

It's Inexpensive! It costs no more to LARVEX a suit than it does to get it dry cleaned. And LARVEX gives POSITIVE PROTECTION against moth damage. You can buy LARVEX for only 79¢ a pint. $1.19 a quart.

TESTS SHOW POSITIVE PROOF

The illustration shows, at the left, moth worms eating cloth untreated with LARVEX. At the right, it shows cloth treated with LARVEX. Notice how moth worms absolutely refuse to eat anything treated with LARVEX.

IN THIS STREAMLINED KITCHEN THERE IS A PLACE FOR EVERYTHING, INCLUDING A VERY SPECIAL PLAN FOR A YOUNG DAU

Mother-Daughter Kitchen

BY GLADYS TABER

WHEN I was very young, in the days before we settled down and built a house, we lived out of packing boxes. Father was a mining engineer in those days and it seemed that most of the time we were packing up to move or unpacking after moving. There was always the drastic giving away of toys that could not be stuffed in anywhere.

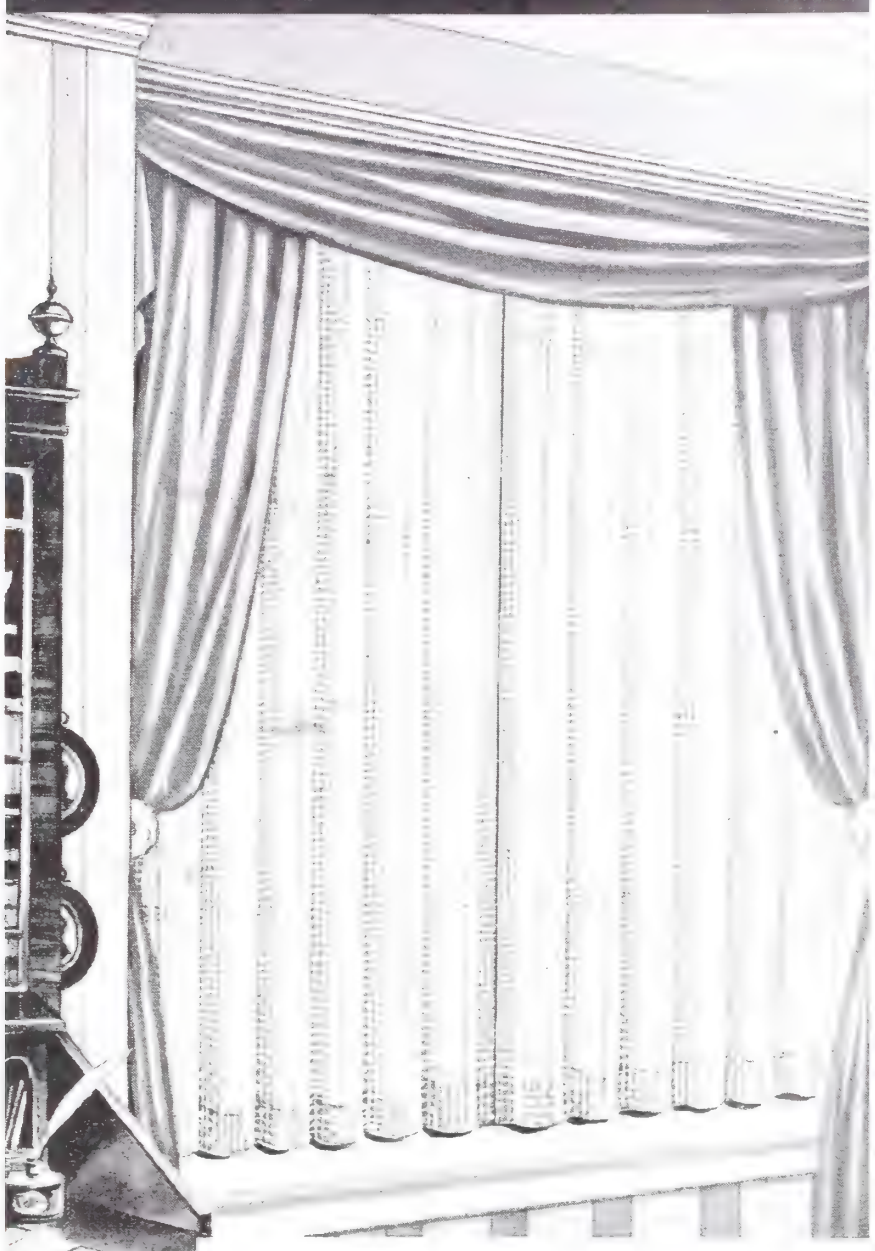
So I knew which toys were important. And the three that I clung to, from Mexico to California to Massachusetts to Illinois, were Jimmy the bear, Floradora the doll, and a little stove. The stove was a Christmas present from relatives in the enchanted region called "back East." It was a small cast-iron range, and had two pans to go with it. Jimmy and I learned to cook on it while Floradora practiced her music lesson.

When I walked into the kitchen-of-the-month, I felt a sudden ache in my heart. Jimmy and Floradora and I would have been in ecstasy over the miniature kitchen just for us! Not only a stove, but a sink and cabinets and an icebox! Dishes and silver and tiny, tiny cans of soup and chocolate, bouquets on the window sill—all exactly like the big kitchen and tucked cozily in near mamma's sit-down counter.

The play kitchen is a perfect copy of mother's. Use the space later for eating, sewing, ironing.

Craftspun Curtains

...ready to hang, without cutting or sewing!



SPRING COMES INTO YOUR HOUSE—in a matter of minutes—with these breeze fresh Craftspun* Curtains. There's no cutting, no sewing to do because Craftspuns come with beautifully tailored hems and headings, all ready to hang. Many come in 6 standard window lengths.

These wonderfully sheer, lace net curtains are unbelievably sturdy, too. Only fine 2- and 3-ply cotton yarns go into Craftspun Curtains. And thanks to Craftspun's famous tied-in-place weave, every thread stays in place through washing after washing! The weave won't shift or slip. You'll hardly believe the modest price tags for so much beauty and so much wear!

THE NET OF THEM ALL

When I stepped around the corner into the big kitchen, I felt as if I were leaving childhood behind all over again. I grew up faster than Alice in Wonderland. I thought, "What a happy, happy place for a young mother!" For in this kitchen she has everything—and her daughter too! A planned place for little Jane to play, safe and out from underfoot, and a place that she will love to be in. By the time little Jane is old enough to use the real range safely and learn to make simple dishes that are not imaginary, the play kitchen will have sown the seed for an interest in cooking which will be invaluable in later years when she has her own hungry family to feed. Since we believe so much nowadays in play as education, this kitchen should be a start toward better cooking and better organized kitchens for tomorrow's young mothers.

I sometimes wonder whether some of my friends who have to cook and hate to, and say it is such hard work, such drudgery, have that feeling because they never were allowed in the kitchen when they were little. The kitchen was a place to stay out of. And maybe the reason I love to cook is that I was forever hanging around the kitchen worktable licking spoons and tasting and scraping frosting bowls.

The ideal kitchen, this, it seems to me, for there is room enough for any family activity. When the babies are small a child's play pen would fit in here nicely. When the play kitchen is outgrown, the same space (which in this instance is 4′ x 6′) can be used for a family breakfast table, with the counter becoming the planning desk. Or it could be a sewing center, or a place for the children to do their homework. Or a special corner for ironing.

The small kitchen is easy to do. Much of the equipment is available in stores which carry toys. Cabinets, although not a perfect match, may be bought or can be made by daddy, or a brother in manual-training class.

The main kitchen has everything to make a young mother's work easy. The cabinets are built to order; a much simpler job than it used to be, for at last a manufacturer has developed a complete line of accessories. Towel racks, cake and bread drawers, bins, cup racks, flour sifters are now available and can easily be installed behind the cabinet doors with minimum effort and maximum efficiency. I particularly like cup racks, which fasten to the underside of the shelf and hold cups safely and conveniently. Then the sliding pan rack is a wonder, for it means you do not nest all those pots and pans, but hang them on the rack, and it takes up less space too!

The lighting in any kitchen is one of the most important single features, and in this kitchen there is a good central shadowless light, additional light for the electric range, and soffit lighting over the sink between the cabinets. There is a light, too, in the miniature kitchen, and that is the only wiring necessary for this section, as the other units are nonoperative for perfect safety.

THERE are extra drawers in the snack counter for silverware and place mats, and there is room at the end of the counter for the toys little Jane is not using. One important feature, too, is the placing of the counter so the play kitchen is shut off from the main work area. This means that the danger of burns from spilled things or spatters of grease is entirely eliminated. "Get out of the kitchen, you'll get burned," is a kind of nagging that little Jane need never know.

The plan for working is my very favorite one. Somehow it seems to me the natural way to work, with a sort of modified U for the plan. The sink is between the range and the refrigerator, with work surfaces flanking it, where I find it most convenien snack counter is handy for setting fo hot green-apple pies out of the way a ready to serve. Salads can be mixed coolest corner, away from the stove, the kettle boils.

This is a gay kitchen, just to fit young mother and a gay little girl. fit daddy and the boys too. Althoug the height of efficiency, I felt there was thing old-fashioned and homey ab a feeling that always delights my hear ruffled curtains, the lovely blue-c wallpaper and the cherry-colored back chairs give this effect. I partic like the border of wallpaper abo white cabinets, for I think too much makes a kitchen look too hospital-li impersonal. And a kitchen must be pe

THE curtains were made of a plasti material which can be cleaned with a cloth. Nothing is more discouragin limp curtains, and how fast they ge in any kitchen! The diffusion of su through them gives an enchanted so glow, which is calculated to make potato peeling pleasant.

The refrige has a built-in f locker which ho to 70 pounds of food. This con ment maintains perature low e that it can be to freeze small tities of food as store them. I have your own freezer, as I ha is good to be a bring up an a and cache it in the refrigerator; and haven't, then there is the place for a frozen peas and peaches you buy a store. It saves extra trips.

Also, this refrigerator never needs d ing. I am the world's most ardent def and I can hardly imagine what that wo like! But I'd be pleased to try it.

I have a friend who once said ing kept cold in her icebox at all couldn't freeze even ice cubes. It t out that she hadn't defrosted f year and a half. But then she writes teries and maybe she was too busy ing for clues to notice the clue i own house, which was inches and i of ice on the freezing unit in her refrige My freezer man says ½ inch of frost is to 2 inches of asbestos insulation! refrigerator in which frost never for worth its weight in gold.

I hope we aren't getting too mechan When Jimmy and I were growing up, had to carry the 150-pound hunk of ice in from the porch every day. The ic took it only that far. We emptied the pan every day. What would mamma of a refrigerator that made its own ic never had to be defrosted?

The river of time always flows in one tion, and nothing can change that. But I should love to row back upstream fo an hour! That would be the hour that Ji and mamma and I and Floradora spend in this kitchen. Jimmy could chocolate cake and I would have p pudding and Floradora could sit in cherry chair and be served miniature cookies. And mamma would be making birthday cake, angel food lighter than feather and frosted deep and soft with mountain icing, and there would be candles on it. For it would be my birt and I would be three years old, goin four!

"Put another hat on the table!"

We haven't been married long — but we've had time to make up our little family phrases and our own lonesome traditions. Our first tradition of course was our Sterling.

There's that hat business. . . . One day Ted got a bonus and insisted on splitting with me. "Go buy yourself a crazy hat, Joan. Like the one you wore the day we met."

I thought that was pretty sweet. Then I started thinking about it. Ted was buying a lawnmower with his half. So I compromised on something beautiful and useful that Ted could enjoy too.

A lot to ask — but it was easy for me. A place setting in my own Towle pattern was the answer — and, when Ted brings home an unexpected guest, he always uses our silly phrase — telling me to put another "hat" on the table. Besides, he says it's just as becoming as the hat I didn't get!

• • •

Many a girl's first purchase is her Towle Sterling. And many a wife adds constantly to her precious set, as her needs and her entertaining increase. Towle Sterling, although it is solid silver, is your finest investment — and is not expensive. A six-piece place setting costs as little as $22.50 — including Federal Tax.

See the selection of exquisite Towle patterns — Craftsman, Chippendale, Royal Windsor and many others — at your jeweler's; and, for new table-setting and Sterling ideas, write to Towle Silversmiths, Dept. L-7, Newburyport, Mass., and ask for the 16-page book, For Gracious Living.

AMERICA'S QUALITY MATTRESS FOR NEARLY 100 YEARS

doctor, it was decided to move Lyn to Children's Hospital for observation, and mother and baby were rushed off in an emergency police-patrol car.

The child was placed immediately in the isolation ward and fed an alternate diet of the milk formula and plain rice water, and was allowed no visitors. In the meantime, Bill and Eleanor put up their first Christmas tree, arranging Lyn's presents under the tree; but on Christmas Day Lyn was still in the isolation ward. After three and a half weeks of special dietary diagnosis, she was allowed to return home. From then on she was on a special diet with a no-milk formula. Back home once more, the baby suffered a stiff fourteen-day siege of colic. During the first six weeks of her life, the baby spent ten days in Misericordia Hospital with her mother, three and a half weeks in the Children's Hospital, and was visited three times at home by the doctor.

But suddenly Lyn turned into a model baby. By the time she was three and a half months old, she weighed over ten pounds. Her first fuzz of curly baby hair wore away and fine, straight brown hair grew in its place. Her eyes turned from baby blue to the gray-green of her father's, and her legs and arms were round and plump. When the baby was just two months old, her parents had taken $38 from their savings to buy her a handsome black-leather English cab, only to discover that their landlady wouldn't allow them to keep it in the yard, on the porch or in the cellar. The stairs to the second floor were too steep, so the buggy stayed two blocks away at "mother's," with Eleanor carrying the baby over and back in her arms. Since there were no laundry facilities in the apartment house either, most of Lyn's personal baby wash was done in the hand basin in the bathroom. Eleanor, with an almost fierce cleanliness, washed underthings every day, sweaters and blankets twice a week. And on Mondays she took the baby and the family wash over to her mother's, making it a social day, with her mother caring for the baby while she washed and ironed all day and came back with a clean week's laundry at night.

The Conrads rarely went out in the evening, because the budget was tight and because Eleanor didn't like to leave the baby with anyone. Sometimes Eleanor's younger brother, an ex-G. I. college student, stopped in for a late cup of coffee with some of his friends and an intellectual half hour of James Joyce and Proust in the kitchen. Once every two weeks, Eleanor went out to sorority meeting, a girls' club made up of young married women like herself, who liked to talk about husbands, children and shopping. When it was Eleanor's turn to have the girls at her apartment, Bill made a punch of grape juice and ginger ale and turned the evening into a real party.

He was still not working, but he had big plans. Before the marines he had learned no trade, but he was thinking either of going back to school to get his high-school degree or of studying air conditioning, and in the meantime he was drawing $20 a week unemployment compensation. With an old typewriter, left from high-school days and a special ad in the phone book, Eleanor did work during the morning and late afternoon as a public stenographer, typing manuscripts and business letters dictated by phone, and often making as much as $20 a week. They were buying furniture on a lay-away plan at $50 a month—a new desk for the living room, a coffee table, end tables and lamps. And after much discussion, they decided to hazard a $1000 college-insurance policy for Lyn, payable at $20.96 every six months till the child was twenty.

Life had almost begun to fall into a pleasant and routine pattern. But when Lyn was just three months old, the Conrads were stunned to discover they were going to have a second baby. Neither parent believed in planned families—Eleanor because of her religion and Bill because he loves children and wants them naturally, as they come. But the unexpectedness of this new responsibility was almost overpowering. The apartment was small, income was limited and irregular, Bill was still on the hospital sick list and the cost of living was almost prohibitive. There were already debts and unpaid bills. The child was wanted because it was on the way, and neither Conrad is the type to complain; but to both life became very grave.

During the first months of pregnancy, Eleanor was intermittently very ill, partly from the normal results of pregnancy and partly from worry. Bill was sobered and more silent. Both were still working hard for Lyn, but they were together too much, with too much on their minds. There seemed to be nothing to talk about together but money and worry. A home was growing up around the two Conrads, but there was too much illness, too much responsibility. Bill began to go out alone on an occasional evening. This tense living was a far cry from the daydreaming when Eleanor was wearing a bright green dress and Bill, strong and sure of himself, could make plans for "the most beautiful girl he ever saw." Both young people knew that things couldn't go on this way.

It was Bill who made the first major change. In May, after about four months out of work, and with bills piled up in the account book, he got a job as a filing clerk with the Veterans Administration. Those first days at work weren't easy. The weather was warm, the leg wound was still painful, and his months in the tropics had made Bill allergic to heat and muggy atmosphere. And the crowded streetcars in the big city are not easy travel for a man with a new leg. But Bill was making $37.50 a week, and that same month the first of his monthly disability-compensation payments of $104 came through. Bill Conrad was again taking care of his family himself, the thing that was all-important to him. He is almost jealously in love with his wife and needs her approval for everything before he is happy.

The summer was filled with hard work. Eleanor gave up typing so she could get more rest and because Lyn had become a full-time job. Eleanor kept an almost fanatic vigilance over her that first year, and never once did she have a bad fall, a burn or a bruise.

And then, in the middle of September, life changed for Lyn. From her own corner of the apartment bedroom, she was moved into a new room in a new house. Back in June, shortly after Bill began work at his new job, the Conrads went house hunting. The family this easier way to clean pots & pans

The trick starts here:
Take a scorched pan — dip the edge of an S.O.S. pad in water. Rub briskly first — then gently for high polish.

Now rinse — see the shine! S.O.S. cleans, scours and polishes in one simple operation. Quickly, easily, and positively! No other cleanser just like it.

Notice how the soap in the pad combines with sturdy S.O.S. fibers to give you a truly magic grease-cutting combination.

It never fails!
Test S.O.S. on any pot, skillet or pan: black, greasy or dull. S.O.S. never fails. And it's complete — the only cleanser you need.

was growing, the bank account was gone and everyday living was high, but before Lyn's first birthday they knew they would need room for one more child. A house was located, a six-room row house in West Philadelphia, but a family still lived in it. Bill and Eleanor got a G. I. loan to make the $250 down payment on the $6000 total purchase price, and arranged a mortgage to be paid off at $48.50 a month. On September fifteenth, the Conrads moved into the house. In twenty years, that home will be their own.

But on the first day, it was discovered that $620 was needed at once to make the house livable. The water pipes throughout the house were badly corroded; there was no water at all upstairs, and downstairs only a thin stream of hot water. That meant $20 for a permit from the city of Philadelphia to dig up the street in front of the house to lay new pipes, and $600 immediate outlay for new copper piping and an automatic hot-water heater to put hot water through the house. The sum was staggering, but the work had to be done. Then Bill and Eleanor got to work on the house themselves.

By six-thirty each evening Lyn was tucked in bed and Bill was in his old marine fatigue uniform, hard at work. Every room in the house needed almost complete repair. The new baby was due in just six weeks, and there was hardly time or money to do the bigger jobs. Materials were expensive, all labor had to be done in the evening, so the work had to be completed little by little, and Bill kept himself busy with the repairs that cost the least money till the second baby should arrive.

Both Conrads were still working too hard, but now they were working together. The tension of the past few months was lessened. Eleanor, who seemed to get even prettier and oddly fragile during pregnancy, tried to keep a feminine boy-girl attitude toward her husband. Actually a paragon of competence, she managed to look always as if she were leisurely doing nothing at all. Bill called home twice a day, to talk to Eleanor and the baby and to check on the World Series baseball scores. Lyn now weighed over twenty-one pounds and had to be carried up and down the stairs for her naps and bath every day, and the weekly wash still had to be done at "mother's." Eleanor, on a $10-a-week food budget, managed to go shopping for staples only every two weeks, put meats in the freezer of the icebox and bought fresh vegetables from hucksters who peddle through Philadelphia. Except for a suit at Eastertime, she had bought no new clothes since the day Lyn was born; but in skirts and white blouses, ironed till they shone, she looked appealingly lovely. She has the kind of bright coloring and unexpected beauty that make her loveliest at odd moments, when she is flushed from rushing with the supper or standing by the kitchen stove in her blue quilted house coat, heating Lyn's evening bottle. Babies and bills were still major problems, but the two Conrads seemed suddenly to have "grown up" together.

Near the beginning of November, when the fall weather was still bright, the Conrads got their first car, issued free by the Government to all amputee veterans who can pass a rigid driving test. But to the Conrads it was more than just a new car. It meant that Bill could get to and from work in comfort. It meant entertainment for the whole family: long drives on Sunday afternoon, quick trips to the country and, next summer, a trip to Chicago, where Bill's family can new family for the first time.

The birth of the new baby was Thanksgiving Day, and Lyn's first would fall on December fifth, just later. The Conrads were undecide what to do with Lyn while her mo in the hospital. Bill had already several days from his job to take L doctor's for diphtheria and chicken-p and to take Eleanor to her doctor natal attention when it became di manage both Lyn and herself on s The Red Cross and a nursing home f children were called, but, since nei nor Eleanor could make personal ap the days just slid by without result on the morning after Thanksgiving tiptoed down to warm Lyn's bo clock in the kitchen said six-thir waked with of his wife back upsta cups of co anced in he "I think today, Bill," said.

cut you usually buy for beef stews. Season with salt and pepper. Roll the pieces of meat in corn meal. Brown lightly on all sides in drippings or shortening. Drain off fat. Add water to cover. Put on lid and simmer over low heat until meat is almost tender. Add 3 carrots, sliced; 4 small-to-medium onions; 3 stalks celery, cut into pieces; ½ green pepper, cut into strips; a few sprays parsley and additional salt and pepper. This time leave out potatoes. Add enough more water to take care of cooking the vegetables and make a gravy. Cook until almost tender. Make a corn bread: beat 1 egg, add 2 tablespoons sugar, ¼ cup milk and ¼ cup melted shortening or salad oil. Sift together ⅔ cup flour, ⅓ cup corn meal, 1½ teaspoons baking powder and ¼ teaspoon salt. Add liquid ingredients all at once. Blend together. Do not beat. Bake in hot oven, 400° F., 20 minutes in greased deep 9-inch piepan. Remove from pan. Put stew in piepan and top with the corn bread. Bake in a hot oven, 425° F., about 10 minutes. Serve from the dish.

Tucking entertaining into a budget is sometimes a tight squeeze. Mrs. Conrad belongs to a sorority group that takes turns meeting at one another's houses. When they come to hers, she usually serves hot rolls or sandwiches, salad and a beverage. A group that meets regularly might not take to a change in refreshments, but a simple sweet that you can serve, along with sandwiches and coffee—or even without sandwiches—would be just as much appreciated, I should think—less work and less expensive. Here are two suggestions that won't make much of a dent in your budget.

Many women miss their greatest chance of happiness through a want of courage in the decisive moments of their lives. They shrink from sharing the stress of life and love offered by the man that every fiber of their nature declares to be their mate, but who perhaps cannot give them the padded luxury they think so necessary. There are others who embrace it passionately as the crown of their existence, and who deem it better to have stormed the heights undaunted by the dangers that confront them than dwell in smug complacency in the valley below. —WINIFRED GORDON.

APRICOT-JAM SQUARES

Cost, 35¢ 20 squares.

Cream ½ cup shortening. Add ½ cup sugar, and cream until light and fluffy. Add 1 well-beaten egg and ½ teaspoon lemon extract. Mix well. Sift together 1½ cups flour, 1½ teaspoons baking powder, ½ teaspoon salt, ½ teaspoon cinnamon and ¼ teaspoon cloves. Stir 2 tablespoons milk into the creamed mixture and add sifted dry ingredients. Spread half the dough in a greased 9-inch-square shallow pan. Spread ¾ cup apricot jam over the batter. Cover jam with remaining batter. Bake in hot oven, 400° F., 25 minutes. Cut into squares.

Bill is very fond of coffeecakes and sweet rolls, but Eleanor usually buys them at the bakery. She likes raisins and he doesn't.

Cost, 19¢ Makes 2 dozen.

Dissolve 2 cakes fresh yeast in ¼ cup lukewarm water. Scald 1 cup milk. Add ¼ cup shortening, 2 teaspoons salt and ¼ cup sugar. When lukewarm, add the dissolved yeast and 2 beaten eggs. Add 4¼ cups flour, a part at a time. Work in well until smooth. Place dough in a greased bowl. Cover and let rise in a warm place until triple in bulk. Punch down and let rise again to the same point. Punch down and divide dough in half. Both portions may be made into cinnamon buns, or you may make up 1 portion plain to save sugar. dough out to ¼-inch thickness. Spread with 2 tablespoons melted margarine and sprinkle with ½ cup sugar mixed with 2 tablespoons molasses. Sprinkle with cinnamon and raisins. Roll up as you would a jelly roll, pinching the edges together to keep the filling in. Cut dough into 1-inch-thick slices and place them on well-greased shallow pans. Repeat with other half dough, using same amount of sugar, and so on. Let rise until doubled in bulk. Bake in hot oven, 400° F., about 20 minutes or until bubbly and golden brown. BEAUTY . . . AND YOUR BABY TOO hospital from the fifth to the seventh day after childbirth. These are to help you strengthen and flatten your slack abdominal wall which has (quite naturally!) been distended. These exercises, plus any others you do in the first four weeks, should be done lying down. In every case, exercises should be done only with your doctor's permission. The exercises illustrated are beautifiers as well as health-builders. Here are some others: 1. Lie flat on your back, arms overhead. Rise to a sitting position and touch your toes with your fingers. Repeat only three or four times daily. 2. Lie flat on your back and slowly raise both legs with knees held straight, until your legs form right angles with your body. Lower slowly to within six inches of floor. Raise again. You will feel your stomach muscles tightening. Repeat only three or four times daily. 3. Lie flat on your back and cross your arms on your chest. Raise upper part of body, gradually coming to a sitting position. Then cross your hands behind your head and return slowly to lying position. Repeat three or four times daily.

Overexercise, like overeating, will get the wrong results. Do your exercises slowly and carefully. Don't make the mistake of giving yourself some other young mother's time limit for regaining your prematernal proportions. Depending on the mother, it takes anywhere from six weeks to six months to do this.

Food for Figures. It is normal for most mothers to lose between sixteen and eighteen pounds in the eight weeks following childbirth. But the more weight gained during pregnancy, the more to be lost later on. The fashion for overindulgence in eating during pregnancy has had its day. Consult with your doctor concerning your prenatal diet. He will work one out for you to eliminate unnecessary weight-building foods. Don't, after your baby is born, endanger your health by embarking on an extreme reducing diet. But do cut down on fatty foods and eat more proteins. Your basic daily foods should include at least: two glasses of milk; one egg; fresh fruit; green vegetables; one portion of meat, fish or fowl. (When Eleanor Conrad finds the day slipping by with no time for a regular lunch, she will raid her icebox for raw carrots, fruit and other vegetables, and a glass of milk. But she always makes up for a sketchy lunch at dinnertime. She avoids bread and pastry in the same day, and sticks to grapefruit, oranges and bananas instead of sweets or starches for between-meal snacks or desserts.)

Posture Perfect. During pregnancy you were advised to wear medium- or low-heeled shoes. This advice concerns your posture more than the possibility that you might fall. It is natural, with your added weight all in front, to curve your back inward to balance yourself. This can develop into postnatal sway-back, or the wrong kind of curves! Your low heels lessen this possibility during pregnancy. Give your body time to strengthen and your back time to straighten before you resume wearing spikes. Four weeks should be enough. Try this posture improver: Clasp your hands behind your neck and walk slowly across a room. Now, bending from side to side, slowly return

Notes for Nursing Mothers. Strenuous exercises and reducing diets are not for you if you want your baby to be the healthiest, pinkest-cheeked one around town. But on the other hand, don't overeat in the belief that you are producing more milk for your baby. You're not! Cut down on sweets, and check with your doctor on the amount of fresh fruits you can eat—too many sometimes disagree with your baby. A fluid nourishment such as a cup of cocoa or broth is advisable after each feeding. If you can arrive at a comfortable feeding position, it will ease your aching bones! Don't be alarmed if your weight goes up during nursing. That added weight goes down naturally when this period is over. In the meantime, your careful attention to yourself will help insure good health and good looks for both you and your baby!

Ask Any Woman

BY MARCELENE COX

THE Japanese put one picture on the wall, that all visitors may turn toward that one object of interest and not be disturbed by others.

The guests were just beginning to arrive, at my first tea party after the war, when into their well-polished midst drove the long-awaited and long-overdue plumber.

The average budget builder doesn't use seasoned timber.

A mother-in-law may try to be affectionate and a daughter-in-law endeavor to return the emotion, but, if one thinks in terms of a meticulous house and the other doesn't, there will probably be a universe between them.

The modern woman has shed grandmother's petticoats but collected her bric-a-brac.

Marriage makes the money go faster, not farther.

Sometimes it isn't the economy of dollars that pinches so much as the sacrifice of feelings.

There are two kinds of mothers: those who share the beauty of "milkweed babies" and those who say, "Take those horrid pods outside before the fuzz gets all over everything."

Keeping things up may accomplish everything except lifting the spirits of the family.

A teacher asked the question, "What is a banquet?" The room was quiet a moment, then a thin child at the rear stood up and said with a shining face, "It's a swell meal!"

Little girl: "Why do I have to get my face so clean! The wind will blow my hair across it."

The worst thing that can happen to me is to have some paint left over I think has to be used up.

Of course I did—and I got it! You can see for yourself. It's one of the very newest patterns in Armstrong's Embossed Linoleum. Sam wouldn't let me buy anything but Armstrong's. He said, "You and Ralph are too good friends of mine to sell you anything else."

Doctors Prove 2 out of 3 Women can have Lovelier Skin in 14 days!

"My spring cleaning included my complexion!" says Beatrice Molinari of San Francisco, "I was dying to find something to help my skin, but my mirror told me my complexion was as oily and coarse-looking as ever. Actually dingy!

"Then I heard about the Palmolive Plan over the radio. It told how 36 doctors – leading skin specialists – tested this Plan on 1285 women and proved it can bring lovelier complexions to 2 out of 3 . . . in only 14 days. I decided to try the Plan!

"Here's all you do: Wash your face with Palmolive Soap.

Then, for 60 seconds, massage with Palmolive's soft, lovely lather. Rinse!

Do this 3 times a day for 14 days. This cleansing massage brings your skin Palmolive's full beautifying effect. Just 14 days after I started the Palmolive Plan, my complexion was fresher, brighter—noticeably finer looking, too!"

YOU, TOO, may look for these skin improvements in only 14 days!

- Less Oily
- Smoother, Younger looking
- Less Coarse-looking
- Fewer Tiny Blemishes—
- Less Incipient Blackheads
- Fresher
- Brighter, Clearer Color

IF you want a complexion the envy of every woman—the admiration of every man—start the 14-Day Palmolive Plan tonight!

Remember, the Palmolive Plan was tested on 1285 women of all ages—from fifteen to fifty—with all types of skin. Dry! Oily! Normal! Young! Older! And 2 out of 3 of these women got noticeable complexion improvement in just 14 days! No matter what beauty care they had used before.

Reason enough for every woman who longs for a lovelier complexion to start this new Beauty Plan with Palmolive Soap!

DOCTORS PROVE

PALMOLIVE'S BEAUTY RESULTS!

JANE McDILL ANDERSON

"In 1908, after being prematurely delivered during a typhoon in Baguio by my father, I was wrapped in old cotton clothes by my aunt and called Jane by my mother," says the author of A Score for Love. "Eventually we moved back to the States, where I learned to speak more than Spanish, overcame my dislike of telephones, ice cream and snow, and settled down to marriage, magazine work and children. Since my second marriage two years ago I've been housekeeping on the fringes of New York and continuing to write despite moving men, migratory maids, measles, mumps, marriage."

WILTON STUDIO

DOROTHY STALEY

"I wasn't born in Peru. I don't have any violent likes or dislikes, and I'm not even a temperamental, 'do-or-die' writer," says the author of Wrong Number Please. "Instead I'm an unglamorous businesswoman who, through a nice quirk of fate, became a writer. I took a night-school writing course, sold my first story two years later, and have been going strong ever since. I'd like to try a novel, but I'm still afraid I'll find someday this writing business is nothing more than a big dream."

COBY WHITMORE

"Most people don't understand me," says Coby Whitmore, illustrator of A Score for Love, "because eventually the fact slips out that I prefer the scream of a racing engine to the music of Tchaikovsky—and what's worse, that I'd rather work than play. My wife and three children concur in this opinion. My art career began in New York after an apprenticeship in Chicago, and will last, I hope, as long as I last."

UM-M-M...MORE SUGAR THIS YEAR FOR HOMEMADE STRAWBERRY JAM!

Make yours this easy, certain way—with CERTO

1. So easy! Thoroughly crush about 2 quarts fully ripe berries. (Yes, flavorful ripe fruits set with Certo!) Measure 4 cups crushed fruit and 7 cups sugar into large kettle. Mix well and bring to a full, rolling boil over hottest fire.

2. Short boil keeps fresh-fruit flavor! Stir mixture constantly before and while boiling. Boil hard JUST ONE MINUTE. (See—no long cooking to destroy fresh taste!) Remove from fire. Stir in ½ bottle of Certo, then stir and skim for five minutes to cool slightly and prevent floating fruit.

3. Short boil gives more glasses! Oh, joy—10 glasses! That's a CERTO BONUS of 4 more glasses than Grandmother, working without Certo, could get from 2 quarts of fruit. Certo helps all fruits jell just right, without the long boil that boils juice away.

4. Smart gal! Thrifty, too! In less time than it takes to make a simple dessert, you've stocked your jam cupboard with beautiful, wholesome treats for next winter—ten whole glasses of this strawberry favorite to serve with breakfast biscuits, in lunchbox sandwiches, on dressy desserts!

NO GUESSWORK WHEN YOU MAKE JAMS AND JELLIES WITH CERTO!

A booklet of 90 recipes comes under the label of each bottle of Certo. Fruits vary, you know. Certo safeguards your success by giving you a separate, tested recipe for each kind of fruit.

Most of the refugees are literally in rags. There are children that have never yet owned a pair of shoes, children with 40 degrees Centigrade fever that have no bedding and hardly any clothes, children that have never had a toy, no decent room, no heating, insufficient food. Women that have not a lap of old material, wherewith to mend their rags, men that cannot work for lack of clothes. I have sent her everything that I could miss and more, but the means of one private person are soon exhausted. (My own sons ran barefoot the whole summer with sores on their feet caused by impetigo.) Now they have shoes through the generous help of friends. Therefore I appeal to you.

I know that many women would like to help if they knew how to, and if they know that their help is turned into the right channel. And every little bit will help. Old clothes, however patched and mended, are wealth to a mother that does not know how to keep her children warm. Another great help would be mending material, any old color; all that matters is that the women have something wherewith to mend the clothes. If you have an old dress that you cannot wear any more, don't throw it away; send it with sewing or mending material for the relief of a child or mother. Yours sincerely,

HORTENSE G. ZELLER.

Mrs. Zeller's letter was accompanied by the following report from the American Friends Service Committee, a report which tells its own story of the obstacles confronting relief work today. ED.

Dear Mr. and Mrs. Gould: We feel sure that you and your readers will want to know about the situation described in this letter from Hamburg.

Relief situation has never been so bleak. The spring months, which should be months of hope and joy, were hunger months in Europe. Recoveries optimistically anticipated last year have not materialized. Famine is now acute in many parts of Europe. Stock piles have long since been exhausted. Human endurance has worn incredibly low.

Now UNRRA, the intergovernmental relief agency, is closing out. Before new official machinery can be set up and put into function in order, many children will die of hunger.

The American Friends Service Committee feels that the voluntary relief agencies can best fill the gap between increasing human need and the temporarily discontinued governmental aid. If the agencies are supported spiritually as well as materially, they can do something to meet the appalling physical need and overwhelming depression.

The warehouses of American Friends are literally empty! All available supplies of food and warm clothing have long ago been shipped to those in need. Since the shipping lanes were freed, and boats made available, most agencies have exhausted their backlog of supplies. New supplies of food and clothing must follow, or life will be starved out for thousands of men, women and children. Sincerely, American Friends Service Committee.

Food for Thought

Muskegon, Michigan.

Dear Editors: I've been buying the JOURNAL since 'way back; at first Mr. B. wouldn't look at it, thought it was just for the "females," but one night he was hungry and the icebox was bare so, sulking, he leafed through the magazines, and lo and behold, his interest was snagged by the pictures of the food. Since then I have been leading a dog's life in the kitchen trying to make my stuff look like your pictures. Sincerely, SYLVIA G. BARCLAY.

Every Wednesday Mother's Day

Cincinnati, Ohio.

Dear Editor: Before I came to keep house for my old mother, I used to run in now and then, as did the others. I actually thought I was doing my share. I realize now "now and then" is far from enough, so I've decided to make each week "Mother's Week." I started about a month ago, called up all the family and friends of mother, setting aside Wednesdays, when I prepare a simple luncheon.

Orange and Tomato Juices

Snappy Scrambled Eggs	Bacon
Corned Beef Hash Patties	Bologna Cups
Hot Corn Bread Squares	Coffee

And to get a man in just the right frame of appetite, be sure you treat him first to the most bracing, taste-tingling juices ever pressed. Whether it's from sun-drenched oranges . . . tart, zesty grapefruit . . . or plump, ripe, red tomatoes, the finest juice is fresh-packed right away to capture every drop of hearty flavor. Then it's tested carefully for purest quality, to bring you nothing but the finest in every sparkling glass of Stokely's Finest fruit juice.

Finest RECIPE FOR SNAPPY SCRAMBLED EGGS

6 eggs
¼ teasp. salt
Few grains pepper
⅓ cup milk
2 tablesp. butter or margarine
¼ cup Stokely's Finest Catsup

Beat eggs slightly; add salt, pepper, milk. Mix well. Melt butter or margarine; add egg mixture. Cook slowly, stirring frequently. Just before eggs are set, stir in catsup. Serves 4. Your family'll start the day with a song! For that exciting, appetite-rousing catsup puts pep and personality into an old stand-by. To be the finest, catsup and chili sauce must have that stick-to-the-ribs, country kitchen heartiness. That's why they're cooked in small batches . . . from the reddest, ripest, prize-winning tomatoes . . . when they're nothing but the finest, Stokely's Finest.

So far, everything has worked out fine and I have even had relatives whom mother hasn't seen for years. She not only has a lot of fun, but she catches up on all the news, which keeps her mind busy all week. Even I am getting a big kick out of these Wednesdays. Sometimes we play cards, sew or just talk. The cost is small, but the dividends are worth while.

Why not make every Wednesday "Mother's Day"?

Very truly yours,

CORNELL, CALIFORNIA.
DEAR GOULDS: I MET YOU IN PERSON A NUMBER OF YEARS AGO, AT HIGH NOON ON THE STAR-SPRINKLED SANDS OF MALIBU. AT THAT MEETING I FOUND YOU KINDLY, MATURE-MINDED PEOPLE, AND SO IN MY HOUR OF WOE I TURN TO YOU.

YESTERDAY MRS. OBOLER, KNOWING THAT I WAS GOING DOWN THE MOUNTAINS TO THE CITY, ASKED ME IF, ON THE WAY, I WOULD GET IT FOR HER. HAVING FAILED TO KEEP UP MY DUES TO THE SANTA MONICA MOUNTAIN ASTROLOGY CORPORATION, I HAD NO PRECONCEPTION OF WHAT WAS GOING TO HAPPEN, AND SO I AGREED.

I JOUNCED HAPPILY IN MY JEEP FOR MANY MILES TO OUR BOOK SELLER; THERE I BLITHELY PARKED UNDER THE TRAFFIC POLICEMAN AND WENT IN AND ASKED FOR MY COPY OF IT IMMEDIATELY A DEEP FREEZE SETTLED OVER WHAT HERETOFORE HAD BEEN A GAY PRIVATE ENTERPRISE.

I REPEATED MY REQUEST.

THE PROPRIETOR PRESSED AN ALARM BUTTON AND A BELL BEGAN CLANGING AND IMMEDIATELY TWO GENTLEMEN, BOTH OF WHOM WORE A FAINT RESEMBLANCE TO PRIMO CARNERA, GRUNTED FORTH WITH A HEAVY HAND TRUCK WHOSE STEEL FRAME SAGGED UNDER ITS BURDEN.

IN THE SHORT SPACE OF TWO OR THREE HOURS, WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF THE LOCAL FIRE DEPARTMENT, IT HAD BEEN TRANSFERRED FROM HAND TRUCK, TO SKY HOOK, TO JEEP.

TWO DAYS LATER, USING THE COMBINED EFFORTS OF MY AMPHIBIOUS DUCK, SCOOTER, BOTH OF OUR BURROS, AND MY SMALL SON'S TRICYCLE, NOT TO MENTION AN ELECTRICAL WINCH, A CADILLAC WHICH I HAD LEFT OVER FROM A HOLLYWOOD PREMIERE, AND A WAR-SURPLUS DONKEY ENGINE REMOVED FROM THE S.S. MISSOURI, WE FINALLY MANAGED TO GET IT UP THE SLOPE AND INTO OUR HOUSE.

IT IS NOW GETTING VERY LATE AND I MUST FEED THE QUAIL, SO I WILL NOT MENTION WHAT HAPPENED WHEN IT ENTERED OUR FRANK LLOYD WRIGHT CREATION—THE CRACKED JOISTS, CRUMBLING FOUNDATION FOOTINGS AND SAGGING CANTILEVERS. ALL I WILL SAY IS THIS: IF YOUR NEXT ISSUE OF THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL IS TO BE ANY LARGER, PLEASE WIRE ME COLLECT SO THAT WHEN, AGAIN, I AM A GOOD HUSBAND AND GO DOWN AND GET IT, I WILL BE THOROUGHLY PREPARED FOR THE PROPER TONNAGE.

THE FACT OF THE MATTER IS THAT I HAVE ALREADY SENT IN A SEALED BID TO WAR ASSETS ADMINISTRATION FOR A 16-WHEEL LOW-BED CRANE-TRAILER COMBINATION FORMERLY USED BY GENERAL PATTON'S PANZER DIVISION TO REMOVE FROM THE COMBAT ZONES DISABLED TANKS UP TO AND INCLUDING 110 TONS.

ON SECOND THOUGHT, IN THE EVENT THAT THE NEXT ISSUE OF IT WILL EXCEED THAT TONNAGE, PLEASE DO NOT WIRE; WE WILL COME TO NEW YORK AND READ THE MAGAZINE IN YOUR OWN OFFICES.

WITH GREAT FATIGUE,
ARCH OBOLER.

In deference to the heat of July and August, issues for those months will be lighter. ED.

HOW MANY GERMS ON YOUR SCALP RIGHT NOW?

As a precaution against infectious dandruff make Listerine Antiseptic part of regular hair care.

It's getting to be a delightful "must" with countless fastidious women. And for a very good reason. Anyone can catch infectious dandruff. Thousands do, often without being aware of it. Those little telltale flakes on hair or dress may be a warning!

Why not be on your guard against an infected scalp and its ugly flakes and scales that can mar the shining beauty of your hair? Try the delightful Listerine Antiseptic "bath" along with every shampoo. It kills millions of the dreaded "bottle bacillus" germs (Pityrosporum ovale) that many dermatologists point to as a causative agent of this distressing condition.

Easy and delightful

You'll love this simple, easy "must" as part of your program for good looks and good grooming. See how marvelously clean, how wonderfully cool, refreshed and gloriously alive Listerine Antiseptic makes your scalp feel! See how it helps guard against those distressing flakes and scales, leaving your hair in all its natural, shining glory.

Remember, Listerine Antiseptic is the same safe, reliable, many-purpose antiseptic that has been a household stand-by for 3 generations. Made by pioneers in Oral Hygiene and proved effective in more than 60 years of day-in-day-out use!

P. S. While you're about it, as a precaution against infection, wash combs and brushes . . . then douse thoroughly with Listerine Antiseptic to kill lurking "bottle bacillus."

PRODUCTS OF AMERICAN HOME FOODS

Chef Boyardee "NO-WORK" FOODS

"correct" lead a few days later did they hail him as a leader in foreign policy. They had to be given the "right" attitude; they could not get it from Mr. Wallace's speech. It is, in fact, impossible to have an attitude toward something which is not coherent or comprehensible, and contains obvious contradictions. So, except for the pro and anti Russians, more and more of the American people are, and have been, I think, worried, anxious, but floundering. It is not their fault.

Yet they do have an opinion, and a fairly coherent idea of what our policy should be. At least I think I discern one.

The great majority of Americans believe in the rule of law. They awaited, and await, a United Nations capable of, and devoted to, the creation of a law of nations governing the behavior of nations toward one another. The vast public interest in all the plans for various degrees or systems of federation aimed at subjecting all states to enforceable law is indicative of this belief and this expectancy.

Most Americans are willing, I believe, to put the full strength of American power behind a system of international morality. But they want morality to be far more clearly defined than it is. They are very tired of being "antis"—anti-Fascist, anti-Nazi, anticommunist. They want a positive, coherent international moral philosophy, universally applicable regardless of considerations of power politics.

They want the abolition of war, not by "enforcing peace"—whatever that may mean—but by enforcing clearly defined laws. If I can judge from the many opinions that I read from members of the public, most of us would rather stand with those nations that will abide by law—if any such exist—than abandon the hope of a law-governed world in favor of a more or less Utopian dream of mystical world ness.

The most idealistic people on this e Americans do not, nor will anyone be to make them, think in terms of p politics. They will enthusiastically cru for liberty and law, but not for pc whether in terms of bases or of oil. will they any longer crusade for "de racy," because that is another idea wl robbed of its organic moral content, lost much of its meaning. Democrac Americans, means the Bill of Hu Rights; it means that far more tha means any particular form of governr or economy. And it means a rule of based upon and implementing these ri with attendant obligations.

I may be wrong, but I think this is only internationalism in which most Ai icans believe at all. The American t tion is not internationalist, but isolatio And although isolationism has not present a single powerful political spo man and has been abandoned by i great parties, I think it is growing, thc inarticulately, among the people, sin because of their bitter disillusionment the kind of internationalism they are b offered.

At present the government, because parties are largely united, thinks, perh that it has the people with it. But if people are not opposing, neither are t agreeing to a large extent. For lack of more positive program, they are allov their present leaders to make the decisi But this half-distrustful, half-apath and genuinely anxious attitude augur for those leaders, if their decisions inv this nation in continuing crises—or, w of all, in war. For I do not believe American people will fight another "ar war, nor another war for "peace."

Facts About Infantile Paralysis

With warmer weather comes renewed fear of infantile paralysis. Fear is infectious, and feeds on the unknown. You can best allay panic in your own home and your neighborhood with the facts about the disease. Here are some major points to remember:

Who are the victims of paralysis? Infantile is a highly selective disease. Twenty cases in a town of 100,000 population usually constitute an "epidemic." Half those stricken with paralysis recover without visible permanent effects; another fourth recover with only minor permanent injuries.

How can you prevent polio? As yet there is no one certain answer to this question, but you can help ward off germs. Doctors are agreed that Fatigue aids disease. Watch out for late hours, irregular schedules, too much exertion.

Do not swim in polluted waters. If you are in doubt, consult your local board of health.

Take extra sanitary precautions against flies and insects, against germs carried on the hands.

During warm weather—particularly when there is a suspicion of infantile paralysis in the neighborhood—avoid theaters, beaches, busses and other public gathering places.

If paralysis should strike your home: Prompt informed medical care will increase the chances of recovery. If symptoms appear—the danger signals resemble symptoms of many other childhood diseases: nausea, upset stomach, headache, unexplained fever—CALL YOUR DOCTOR!

Let your doctor be your guide. There is still no sure cure for infantile paralysis. But doctors agree that patients can be most successfully cared for in hospitals. Do as your physician advises.

Do not borrow money to meet the financial strain. Few families, even those of substantial income, can afford the extraordinary expenses of this disease. Get in touch with your local chapter of the National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis. It is part of their job to help you with funds derived from the yearly March of Dimes campaign.

Keep calm. You can contribute much to the long-range health and happiness of a paralysis patient by keeping your household as near to normal as possible.

You'll say we made it just for you—

Announces

a new service to the women of America

A monthly column of helpful suggestions from one neighbor to another

$1500.00

IN CASH PRIZES EACH MONTH

FIRST PRIZE $700.00

SECOND PRIZE $250.00

THIRD PRIZE $125.00

FOURTH PRIZE $75.00

FIFTH PRIZE $50.00

PLUS 30 PRIZES of $10.00 each

READ THESE SIMPLE RULES...

1. These contests are being offered every month to the women of America . . . as a public service of the Pepsi-Cola Company . . . to be of help to women in their day-to-day living. Hence, your entries will be judged on their practicability and every-day usefulness to your neighbors.

2. Here's all you do: Write out on any sheet of paper, in 50 words or less, the best idea you have which you think will help your neighbor. Then underneath, write briefly your reasons for selecting the idea you did. Ideas can deal with any subject of interest to women, such as short cuts in housekeeping, parties, entertaining, homemaking and decoration, etc. . . . Food Recipes are not eligible.

3. Submit your entries in your own words . . . literary style will not count. The originality and aptness of the subject matter . . . and your reasons for selecting it . . . are the things for which prizes will be awarded.

4. You may enter these contests as many times as you wish. There is nothing to buy, no box tops to send in. Write each entry on a separate sheet of paper and be sure to print your name and address on each sheet.

5. Mail your entries to Pepsi-Cola Company, Dept. L, Good Neighbors Club, P.O. Box 230, Long Island City 1, N. Y. All entries postmarked not later than June 30, 1947, will be judged in the June contest. Entries received during July will be judged in the July contest . . . and so on each month.

6. Every month, 35 cash prizes will be given totaling $1500.00, in order of excellence of entries, as follows: 1st Prize: $700.00; 2nd Prize: $250.00; 3rd Prize: $125.00; 4th Prize: $75.00; 5th Prize: $50.00; plus 30 prizes of $10.00 each.

7. Checks will be mailed to prize winners in this June contest not later than July 31, 1947 . . . and so on each month. Top prize winners of the month of June, with their pictures, will appear in the November issue of this magazine. Do not send pictures with entries.

8. Pepsi-Cola Company shall have the right to publish all prize-winning entries in any form desired, with or without editing, and including names and addresses of winners.

9. The judges of each monthly contest will be a nationally-known contest-judging organization, under the personal supervision of a well-known consultant in home economics. All decisions of the judges will be final. Duplicate prizes will be awarded in the case of ties. No entries will be returned.

10. Anyone may enter these contests except employees of Pepsi-Cola Company, or of any Pepsi-Cola bottling company, or of their advertising agencies. Members of the families of such employees are likewise not eligible.

Prize winners among entries received during the month of June will receive checks by July 31st . . . and the winning ideas will appear in the November issue of this magazine.

YOU can't tell where you may pick up a choice bit of information, but to learn about a baby book at a high-class, top-notch, sophisticated, literary tea-and-cocktail party is incongruous. This one was a party on the Waldorf Starlight Roof with its soaring star-sprinkled ceiling, its long windows open to a view of the western sky line, with literary "lights" in every group. What we learned about, both from the publisher and the reprint man, was THE COMMON SENSE BOOK OF BABY AND CHILD CARE, by Dr. Benjamin Spock. It had just received the Parents' Institute 1946 medal—an annual award for the outstanding book of that year for parents. Later we heard from three young mothers that in their opinion and practice it was the No. 1 baby book . . . . The only other conversation we remember on that really brilliant occasion was about birds: the editor in chief of one of the large publishing houses told us about a flock of thousands of purple finches which he had seen patterning the snow.

Henry James—to our way of thi ing the greatest American nove and short-story writer of them al is going to be popular in spite himself. A Hollywood producer p $200,000, we hear, for an adaptati of one of his stories, changing Jam uncompromising title, The Aspe Papers, to The Lost Love. Collectio of his writings continue to come o which is a good thing, because many of the earlier editions are n out of print. The latest to date THE AMERICAN NOVELS AND STORI OF HENRY JAMES, edited by F. "I can't promise that I can go to the movies, Teddy—but I have pretty swell parents."

Some women, when they have an extr half hour, play solitaire and some kni and some telephone their friends. Mir iam Chapin, author of HOW PEOPL TALK, used up her spare moment when her children were little by study ing grammars. Any grammars that sh could get hold of. Once when som other housewives caught her studying Fiji, she realized that she must keep this vice of hers secret. They thought her queer. Perhaps, they seemed to think, she'd been touched by the sun. But this language dabbling of hers has now matured into one of the most satisfactory books on the subject that the layman can get. How People Talk is not for scholars. But it does present a remarkably clear explanation of how different languages got their start, how they differ from one another, how, in fact, there came to be language at all.

Only man, of all creatures, can talk. Only man, of all creatures, carries baggage. Chimpanzees in captivity, it's said, have learned to use some of our baggage, but once they're allowed to escape they at once abandon such objects without hesitation.

"Morals and deportments"—that phase of education now neglected and almost forgotten—was once of prime importance in this country, if one can [illegible] described in Arthur Schlesinger's LEARNING HOW TO BEHAVE. According to Mr. Schlesinger, there was a drastic change in manners after the Civil War, along with the growth of great fortunes, the activities of the "Four Hundred" and their emulation as far as possible by the middle class. "The Cult of Elegance," he calls it. When a lady crossed the street she should "gracefully raise her dress a little above her ankle," counseled the book. In conversation one was advised: "always think before you speak," and "never emphasize a remark by a touch of the foot." Appropriate topics for discussion were "articles of virtu, photographs of foreign subjects, paintings or statuary. . . . The conversation may gradually center on the Egyptian obelisk or the Tower of London." Before one went out socially one outlined one's subjects and fortified oneself by study.

It was in those days that Edward Bok secured "Ruth Ashmore" "Isabel A.

Handle with care that Tender Skin

—IT'S REALLY THINNER THAN YOURS

YOUR tiny baby's skin . . . soft as down . . . delicate as a flower . . . needs always your very gentlest care. Because it actually is thinner than a grown-up's, you know.

That's why you do your best to keep him dry, and make sure that every trace of irritating soap is rinsed from his diapers. But have you thought how important the right bathroom tissue is to your baby's comfort and safety?

Baby's tissue should provide 3 things

There are three qualities you should always look for in selecting your baby's bathroom tissue, to spare him daily discomfort. Real softness, so the tissue cannot chafe, or irritate . . . high absorbency . . . and sufficient strength to prevent tearing and shredding.

Every day more mothers are finding this ideal combination of qualities in ScotTissue than in any other brand of tissue.

ScotTissue is "old linen" soft for comfort, wonderfully absorbent, yet strong enough for thorough cleansing. These qualities will be a great help now—and you'll find they will aid you in training your baby to proper toilet habits later on.

How to reduce the diaper-laundering problem

For babies up to 6 months, try crumpling up 20 or more sheets of soft, absorbent ScotTissue and inserting in the diapers. You will have more dry diapers . . . less staining. Simply flush away the soiled tissue. Keeps baby "comfy" and saves on laundry, too.

New ScotTissue is softer than ever

• The minute you feel a CHIX Gauze Diaper you just know they're soft and absorbent—better for baby's tender skin.

Enlarged view shows why CHIX Gauze Diapers are so soft! The special CHIX weave and finest surgical-type gauze make them light and airy, comfortable for baby.

PROVED . . . Independent laboratory tests show CHIX Gauze Diapers to be super-absorbent — extra soft. They're easy to wash—quick to dry. The difference is in the weave.

Your baby will love these softer — more absorbent diapers.

Perfumers say that musk is the most fascinating of all scents to man. The Empress Josephine used it as her personal perfume, and for years afterward the walls of her apartments were still fragrant. Mohammed wrote about it in the Koran. It is the most important perfume in the whole enormous modern business, yet the entire supply of musk from time immemorial until very very recently came solely from the little musk deer of the Himalayas. (In Natural History, February, 1947, Jennie Harris tells the whole story.)

The musk deer is only about twenty inches tall, he wanders over the shoulders of the great peaks at an altitude of 8000 feet, through forests of rhododendrons—vermilion, scarlet and white—through ferns and bamboo and birch and juniper. He feeds daintily on gentians and primroses, and consistently enough is sensitive to the sound of flute music.

The perfume in tiny musk grains—is held in a pouch about the size of a walnut, near the base of his abdomen. When the deer rests on a rock the musk is exposed, and the sun, heating the rock, diffuses the scent and thus signals the hunters. One grain is said to perfume millions of cubic feet of air, which is a doubtful blessing to the deer: 100,000 are slain yearly.

Now apparently a synthetic musk has been developed. At the perfume-bottle stage, we won't know the difference, but what a cause for joy in those rhododendron forests!

Community Action in the Housing Crisis

THE discouraged homeseeker, particularly the homeless veteran, has pondered thoughtfully all the advice, testimony and alibis of officialdom. And now he asks, "What can the home town do?"

For the real push to housing results, people are counting more and more on the homemade, home-town efforts. Veterans, through their organizations, are putting the problem squarely before local business and municipal government.

You can help your community develop a course of action. The inquiring citizen is a great energizer.

Are you acquainted with the housing-crisis facts in your community?

Do you have a Mayor's Emergency Housing Committee? Does it meet or is it just a committee on paper? Have you attended any of its meetings? Even if you are not on the committee, you can ask permission to attend a session or two and bring in a few neighbors. Nothing like a gallery of interested citizens to spur lagging efforts!

Do you have a "local housing authority" to use state and Federal funds available for slum or substandard clearance or renovation?

Do the civic groups to which you belong concern themselves about housing? About Federal legislation and appropriations or state subsidies and loans? A genuine educational program on this greatest of all domestic postwar problems is needed.

During the war the co-operative efforts of community leaders representing business, labor, agriculture, government, religious, women's and civic groups licked many wartime problems. Let's use the wartime formula of co-operation and clean up the housing mess in which most American communities find themselves.

★ Write the JOURNAL's Public Affairs Department Editor about your community plans. If they are successful, we can share them with others. ★

On This I Stand

As a Citizen of the United States,

I WILL DO MY PART:

To realize that hope for world peace lies in justice and equality for all;

To assure to every individual personal dignity and freedom in all things, at all times;

To promote the solid foundations for peace and security in my own community;

To free the world from the threat of future wars.

AND FOR THESE ENDS:

I will be a good neighbor;

I will perform some personal service for my community;

I will unite my strength with others working for the improvement of community living;

I will insist that my Government's representatives adopt these standards for national and international relations.

MERIDEN, CONNECTICUT'S ANSWER ON HOUSING

By Joan Younger

Six million, five hundred thousand Americans have no homes of their own, live with relatives in crowded conditions.

"I CAN'T take it much longer," said the man. "We've been living with the wife's mother ever since I got back a year and a half ago. I never dreamed then that I'd see New Year's, 1947, there—and now—well, what are we going to do with the baby when he comes? So we've learned to live at a whisper—can a baby? The wife says I've got to find a place for us. What am I going to do?"

Carl Remy shuffled the white filing cards in his hands and looked hard at his desk, which stood in the middle of Meriden, Connecticut's, Veterans' Center. He acted like a man who didn't know quite what to say; and he didn't.

"I don't know what you're going to do," he said. "From surveys on housing here we figure there are about 450 men in the same boat with you—and that's just veterans. Sure, the baby puts you in the list of hardship cases, but your hardship comes along a little late—like a second wave. You'll have to wait until one of the earlier hardship cases moves out of some of the emergency housing. This town's done okay on emergency housing so far—the trouble is the emergency just doesn't stop."

He didn't add that he, too, veterans' guide to housing though he was, was also living at his wife's mother's home. Nor did he add that there were others who were now beginning to realize that the "emergency period" in housing was here to stay for at least several years, and were attempting to make long-term plans. After all, you can't live in a blueprint.

The veteran left, dejected. There was nothing in the way his shoulders dragged to remind you that just about two years ago he had been acclaimed among the heroes, kissed by sobbing Frenchwomen—one of the men whose courage and selflessness made life a lot happier for many—a very great many—people. (Continued on Page 255)

COMMENDS THE NEW STYLING OF KAISER AND FRAZER CARS

FAMED designer of glamorous play clothes for American women, Tina Leser not only knows, but establishes, styles. "In the lines and colors of my beachwear," she says "I try to capture the spirit of leisure and play in which it is worn. Successful design always reflects purpose. To me, the design, styling and colors of the new KAISER and FRAZER cars appeal as a most successful effort to make distinguished beauty reflect luxurious transportation."

Beachwear by Tina Leser

KAISER

FRAZER

THE STYLING of the new KAISER and FRAZER is 100% postwar. Designers, given a free hand—unhampered by tradition or prewar tools—have created a masterpiece of functional beauty. These cars establish a new style trend which other manufacturers are sure to follow. And they are totally new in performance and ride, as well. For their engineering is as ultra-modern as their lines, colors and appointments. In them you truly ride in luxury, framed in beauty.

If You Ask Me

By Eleanor Roosevelt

My husband and I decided some years ago that our small contributions to peace would be never to tell or repeat "Eleanor stories," racial-prejudice stories or jokes, but we differ on our reactions to others' telling such stories. My husband says that if other persons make racial jokes, it is like beating your head against a stone wall to argue with them. He just changes the subject. I "light into" them, and tell them if they can't say anything good, not to say anything. Which of us is correct?

I doubt if "lighting into" people ever does much good, but I think the time has come when we ourselves must stand up and be counted for our beliefs. If we can say quietly that we think the attitude that someone is taking is harmful to the co-operation between people of different races and religions and will not help to promote peace in the world, and explain very calmly why we think so, we may plant a seed in even a prejudiced mind, which may of itself bear fruit someday.

I have read that it is difficult for Russia to understand us fully because of differences in our languages which are lost in translation. This is doubtless true of other nations too. Don't you think it would be an excellent idea for the United Nations to push the idea of a common language which every child should be required to master in addition to his own? English has become somewhat of a world language, although it is considered one of the difficult languages to master. Could we not have a simplified English such as Theodore Roosevelt advocated?

I think there is a growing feeling that a common language, learned by all children, would be tremendously advantageous and a help toward peace. The difficulty is that whatever language is chosen, other nations will feel that it gives that nation an added political prestige. You are right; English is becoming more widely known and may, little by little, be accepted as a common language. I doubt very much if simplified English would make a great deal of difference, but a certain amount of simplification is going on all the time.

I am a girl of 13 of the Jewish faith. My mother and I have been discussing the problem of eventual dates with boys. My mother says I should confine my dates to Jewish boys. I say it does not matter with whom I go out, Jewish boys or boys of other religions. What should I do?

I do not like to answer questions on subjects which really have to be decided within a family. Racial and religious questions fall into that category, but I would point out to your mother that we have to live in a world in which all races and religions have to learn somehow to live together.

In a recently published eulogy of Marian Anderson this statement was made: "It was the religious voice of a whole religious people—probably the most God-obsessed (and man-despised) people since the ancient Hebrews." Please tell me why are the Negroes probably the most man-despised people?

I do not know who wrote that quotation, but I imagine the author was thinking of the fact that in parts of our country, and perhaps in some other countries, the Negro has not been treated with the respect which one should accord to every human being.

Is there any provision in the work of the National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis for the rehabilitation of victims of infantile paralysis before the time the organization was formed? My husband had infantile paralysis as a child. He was affected in both legs, but regained much of the use of one. On the other he wore a brace and was able to lead a happy, normal life. Six years ago he fell and broke his hip. At 43 he found himself confined to bed for life. We don't want charity, yet the kind of specialized attention which he needs is almost impossible for us to get. The orthopedic specialists I know don't make house calls. He can't go to a doctor's office except in an ambulance. When you have difficulty keeping your bank balance at $50, you just don't go around making too many demands. I feel his morale is getting so low that I must do something.

I think Warm Springs takes in such patients and does have some funds to assist those who cannot afford to pay. There is, however, a long waiting list. In any case, it would do no harm to write to Mr. Fred Botts, Georgia Warm Springs Foundation, Warm Springs, Georgia, and ask him about the chances for your husband.

I am a houseworker now. How may we organize? I'm receiving substantial pay for these days, but some employers want blood, not sweat alone. Would you please help me with suggestions?

There are a few houseworkers already organized, but it is a difficult group to organize, since there are rarely more than one or two employed in a household and each household has different requirements, so the standards are very difficult to set except for wages and hours, and even those have to vary now and then. I do think there are certain conditions, however, which could be covered, and I am quite sure if you go to the Y.W.C.A. wherever you live, they will give you the information you desire and help you in every possible way.

I am eleven and a half and like to listen to mystery stories on the radio. My mother and father object because they are too exciting and limit me to one a day. I would like your opinion, please.

I think your mother and father are very wise. What do you really get out of mystery stories? They give you a certain amount of excitement, but they do not give you anything that you want to keep in your mind.

Would you please clear up the confusion which exists about your name? Newspapers sometimes refer to you as Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, and sometimes as Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt. Which is your preference?

I much prefer to be called Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt. There are a number of Eleanor Roosevelts in our family, but only one Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt.

I have a daughter, 17, who will finish her freshman year in college this spring. She wants to quit school and marry a boy of 20, also a freshman in college, in June. He goes to school under the G. I. Bill of Rights. I feel that she is too young to take on the responsibilities of married life. Am I right in asking her to put off marriage now? If so, will you please help to convince her of the advantages of this?

I am afraid I cannot help you to convince your daughter that she is too young for the responsibilities of marriage. She probably knows that her great-grandmother married at sixteen. The person who really should be convinced is the boy, who today has a more difficult time to support a wife and family than did his grandfather, who probably lived on a farm, or worked in some small, developing business. He will have to find an opening and establish himself, and he is the one who should convince your daughter that both of them will need the equipment which college can give them to face the problems of a more complicated world than the one in which their grandparents lived.

Letters should be addressed to Mrs. Roosevelt, c/o the Ladies Home Journal. It should be understood that Mrs. Roosevelt's answers reflect only her own opinions, and are not necessarily the opinions of the Editors of the Journal.

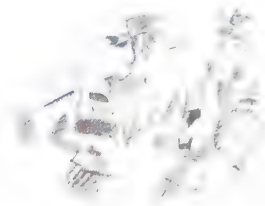
Wedding Bell Salads—Soften Cloverbloom Cream Cheese with a little mayonnaise. Press together canned pear halves filled with the cheese. Using pastry tube (you can fashion one out of stiff paper) flute ribbon of cheese down each side of bell. Top with ring of cherry.



How to tell ready-cooked ham from uncooked ham? Just keep an eye on the labels. Armour Star Ready-To-Eat Ham comes in the striped package, Armour Star Smoked Ham (not cooked) in the solid color wrapper. Both of them are America's Luxury Hams! Hand-picked—sugar-cured by Armour's exclusive process—tender-smoked over fragrant hickory and hardwood!

Why is ham such a "good buy?" Because it's substantial, satisfying meat — and it goes so far! You use up the tiniest scraps — even the bone for soup. 4 people can get 5 nutritious meat-meals from a 6 lb. half-ham!

Ham for two—Happy thought for two-some families: Ask at your market for half-inch slices of Armour Star Smoked Ham! Pan fry them eight minutes. And try a Deep-South recipe for delicious cream gravy: 2 tbsps. ham fat, stir in 2 tbsps. flour, add 1 cup milk slowly, stirring. Simmer 2 min. Salt. Mmm—brings the moonlight and magnolias right up to your kitchen door!

Short on time—and an idea supper? The answer: Armour Chopped Ham—with canned sweet toes or sizzling fried Cloverbloom It's all ham — whole ham, cho sugar-cured, and vacuum-cooked own full-flavored juices! Simple satisfying!

It's a Da
For a Dan

NEXT to graduation, your seventeenth birthday and the day you bought that new Vaughn Monroe album, probably the brightest date on your current calendar is the spring prom. Whether it's a first dance for you, or the last big party of your high-school career, it's got to go down in your diary as one of the most exciting evenings of your life. Everything has to be right—in every small detail—from the beau boy who comes to pick you up at eight o'clock right down to the hamburgers and malteds you gulp down together just before the clock ticks round to the zero hour. And you're the girl responsible for the best "bright-eyed and beautiful" performance of her dating career. So set the backdrop, get yourself the right props and work out your own program for an evening that will go off as smoothly as a Peter Lawford movie!

LITTLE GIRLS ARE MADE OF . . .

First, what are you going to wear? It doesn't have to be new, it doesn't have to add up to big numbers in folding money, but it should be an evening dress that makes you "feel like dancing." Don't try to find this dream-girl number in half an hour, after school and just two days before the dance. Give yourself shopping time, fitting time and strutting time to pick yourself a dress that has everything: light, bright colors; a full skirt that billows when you dance; a nipped-in waist, a puffed-out sleeve or no sleeves at all—everything to give you that Rita Hayworth dancing look. Skip the black satin, slit skirt and sequins, the fancy earrings and extra bracelets, and concentrate on simplicity. You want to look pretty as a picture, but you should feel "comfortable" in your clothes too!

And how about the added attractions such as evening wrap, bag and slippers? You can't play Cinderella in moccasins or saddle shoes, so sandals for dancing are a must on your list, and a pair in gold or bright silver won't overbalance the budget—but no need to shop around for sables, sequins or quilted satin for a dance wrap! Most high-school girls manage to look young and smart in their school coat or date coat, brushed, pressed and with all handkerchiefs, gloves and old candy-bar wrappers removed from the bulging pockets. If the night is warm, just wear the coat draped around your shoulders, with your corsage pinned on the lapel for an added festive look. If you have an evening bag, small and in good color contrast to your dress—well, you're a lucky gal. But if you don't, a small black handbag would do—or simply wrap a lipstick, small comb and powder puff in a clean hanky and tuck it into your coat pocket for midevening perking up. If you want to wear evening gloves, you may—otherwise, just slip on a pair of white cotton shorties, the same pair you wore with your best spring suit, to wear to and from the dance. The big bright idea for the whole evening, however, is to be absolutely well groomed and to "like" the way you look yourself!

SUGAR AND SPICE . . .

Don't change hair-do's at the last minute! If you usually wear a short feather cut to school, don't switch to bangs as your escort waits downstairs in the living room. Or if you have long, sleek hair, don't try to create a glamorous upsweep just the night before the dance! How can you have fun if you're worrying about hairpins and whether or not the whole mess is going to slip down into your eyes? And no last-minute rinses, sun-glow tints or curler treatments that leave you hot, harried and looking like the wrong end of a bath brush. Shampoo your hair two or three days before the dance, wash well, rinse with special thoroughness—and then brush and brush and brush.

And none of this Johnny-come-lately treatment for your complexion either! Give your face a two weeks notice that you're planning a big evening—and get it into pink-and-white perfection by gentle daily treatment. If you haven't been completely faithful with the soap-and-water schedule, revise your routine to include a nightly lathering, thorough rinsing and then tuck yourself in for the night with an application of cold cream to leave your skin soft. And be even more careful of the foods you eat; add some extra fruit to your diet, several glasses of water, and omit the sweets and greasy food you know will give complexion troubles. But remember, these preparations must start weeks before the big dance to get just the right results—don't risk irritating your skin with panicky last-minute cures of special lotions, mud packs and egg-and-honey massages!

Do treat yourself to some last-minute good grooming: a long, lazy bath with time to relax and scrub; a careful manicure; a thorough workout with your toothbrush, and a good deodorant. (It's funny how those "small things" become even more necessary in the excitement of a big evening.) Wear just enough make-up to look fresh and colorful at the same tim

In beautiful new Elgins

AT NO EXTRA COST!

The most important watchmaking development in over 200 years!

The amazing DuraPower Mainspring* that eliminates 99% of watch repairs due to carbon steel mainspring failures

Of all the Elgin Watches that have thrilled graduates for generation after generation these are the most exciting.

For in each one is an exclusive new mainspring that gives a permanency of timekeeping performance and freedom from trouble never before possible in any watch.

Elgin's new DuraPower Mainspring is made of a wholly new alloy of metals. It eliminates 99% of watch repairs due to carbon steel mainspring failures because . . . it will not rust! . . . it cannot be broken by overwinding! . . . it retains its original strength indefinitely! Also, it is non-magnetic!

Since fully half of all watch movement repairs are due to mainspring failures, you can see what a fundamental improvement the Elgin DuraPower Mainspring is. Actually, it is the most important watchmaking development since jewel bearings were introduced in 1704!

Can you imagine the alert young graduates of '47 wanting anything less new . . . anything less fine . . . than an Elgin?

There are Elgin Watches in a wide range of prices from $29.75 with Federal tax included.

LETTERS TO JOAN

This is the fourth in a series of letters from a mother to her daughter, in which standards of today are discussed, frankly and understandingly—to insure the success of tomorrow.

BY GLADYS DENNY SHULTZ

JOAN DARLING:

Thanks for relaying the further discussion of the girls on the subject of virginity. It has been most helpful to me as well as interesting. Especially that incident where Amy was told by an amorous escort, "It just isn't smart to be a virgin," and she felt completely at a loss to answer him.

Nothing could be more indicative of the change in attitude since I was your age. Then, if a girl transgressed the traditional standards of right and wrong, she tried to find arguments to justify her in doing so. Now, I take it, it's the girl who wishes to follow traditional standards who feels she must justify herself—and doesn't quite know how!

Just as a side light, let me say that I don't think you need meet an escort's arguments in such matters. In fact, the less you argue with a wolf, which this young man obviously is, the better. You girls have every right to think and discuss and get all the information you can about sex. But in nine cases out of ten, the man who tries to get you into an argument about it is concerned less with arriving at ultimate truths than with making an immediate conquest. It's a line that has been found effective by seducers since the dawn of social history—and you would soon learn that there is nothing smart about falling for a line. I should say that Amy's reply, "Just the same, I intend to go right on being one," was the best she could have made.

However, I think the young man has given us an excellent point of departure for appraising the value of virginity to a girl in the world as it is today, with traditional moral values toppling all about us. Is it an asset or a handicap in finding happiness and establishing satisfying relationships with the male sex?

I'll start by agreeing that sex fulfillment is a desirable, though not absolutely necessary part of a well-rounded life. I should be sorry not to have had it myself, and I should be the last to throw stones at the woman who, not having married, nevertheless does not die a virgin. Nor does society throw stones any more. To be sure, the discreet woman usually doesn't let her moral slips show if she can help it. But I think it would distress few intelligent people to learn that a dignified, lovely person like Miss ——, for instance, had had a purple interlude or two in her life. I know a very respectable family which openly rejoiced when an elderly and blameless spinster member of the clan elected to live openly with a fine man whose wife was hopelessly insane. They felt that she deserved happiness, and held her quite capable of deciding whether she would find it in such an arrangement.

However, sex in human beings is involved so deeply with the emotions, that sex on a mistaken basis can, in my own opinion, cause as much—if not more—frustration and heartache as living without sex entirely. This is especially true with women. There are some, of course, who seem to know how to make a very good thing of it, but these women have never been admired, and sensi-

It's the way we seem to be made. And when the feeling is not reciprocated, we suffer.

So the man's viewpoint becomes an important consideration. And why they call women the inconsistent sex is beyond me. For if it were the right thing for a woman to be generous with her body, you would think men would be reverent and grateful toward these benefactresses of the male sex. But are they? Not at all. Men scorn and despise and talk about the easy woman, however much they may avail themselves of the opportunities she offers.

My experience as a wife gives me one advantage. I have learned at first hand how men regard such things—and how undependable the average gallant is. A girl in such a case can never be sure that the episode will not be broadcast, with due damage to her good name.

You may argue that that is a hang-over from conventional attitudes, and that men no longer demand virtue in their women. I have delved into that—ah, the things I have done for you girls! I have taken advantage of my gray hair to drive male relatives and old family friends into corners and cross-examine them mercilessly to find out what goes in the world today, and the way the male sex feels about it. And following are points on which all of them have agreed:

1. When a man really loves a woman, he wants her for his wife. That, they tell me, is as true now as it ever was.

2. Even though a man may try his best to "make" other women who attract him, he doesn't want to "make" the woman he loves. It is his impulse to keep her in a different category.

3. Knowledge that the girl he loves has had previous sex experience will not count against her seriously with many men today. But if he finds she is a virgin, her value is usually enhanced in his eyes.

4. Men in general are inclined to think of a virgin in terms of marriage, because they realize she has been keeping herself for marriage and respect that in her. Even today, a man of any character will observe the age-old masculine code that a decent man will not take advantage of a virgin whom he has no intention of marrying. There are plenty who transgress it, but they are not the worthier specimens. Thus a young Navy man told me that while he had heard occasional reckless young men say it was their ambition to "make" as many virgins as possible, in the main his own friends in the service felt a high sense of responsibility in this matter. To them, virginity is an asset to a girl in getting the best deal from life, and they don't want to cheat her of her chance. These were top men in their training school. They are back in college now preparing for careers that should be more than ordinarily successful. A far better group for a girl to cast her lot with, I should say, than the thoughtless young and old blades who are merely hunting for virgin scalps to hang from their belts.

I think myself that this homage which the better men pay to virginity will not

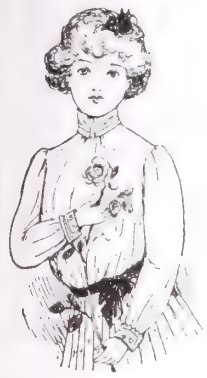
THE JOURNAL



N June, 1897, Chauncey Depew covered Queen Victoria's Diaond Jubilee (sixty years on the rone) in London; snow fell on ong Island; and a strawberry in outh Orange, New Jersey, reached foot in circumference. Two dozen oldiers, fully armed, started bicying from Montana to Missouri to est these vehicles for war; and reland's most unpopular landlord, aptain Boycott, died.

he June, 1897, JOURNAL featured n article called What Victoria Has een and pointed out, among other appy events, that "Great Britain as had thirty-eight wars in the ast sixty years, and in every one he has been victorious."

A useful accessory is the veil," remarks Emma Hooper, "to keep the face clean and to hide defects as well."

Writes Editor Bok: "Brilliant cravats, fancy waistcoats, loud and large checks in clothes, and extreme colors in shirts, are not for the young man of taste, refinement, and of future standing."

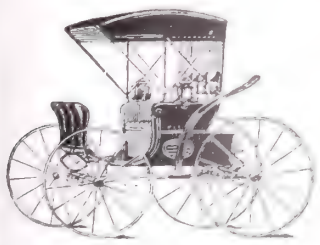
"B. E. J.: It is never in good taste to introduce people on the street, or in public conveyances."

Tipping: "It is not at all necessary for a woman who is traveling alone to tip waiters in hotel dining rooms: if the waiters are not attentive because they are not given fees, she should report them to the office."

Ruth Ashmore advises a reader: "I agree with you that the wearing of lace caps is decidedly more sensible than the assuming of false front pieces."

"Boys of sixteen are properly attired for Sunday in black coats and waistcoats, light trousers, high collars, gloves of gray suède, and derby hats."

Baby's dresses: "Shorten the skirts to the instep to prevent the child from falling when trying to walk."



In this issue, the JOURNAL offers prizes for the Be Piazza Room, Remedies for Plant Poisoning, the Best House Boat, and a Christmas Entertainment for Churches.

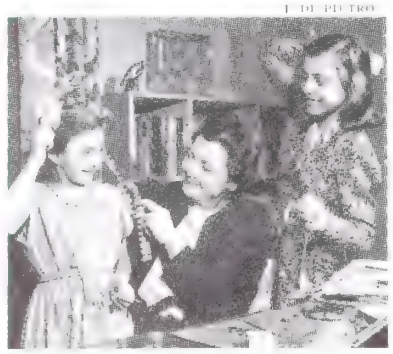
"When compelled to spend the night in a sleeping car, wear a loose wrapper of striped flannel in the Mother Hubbard style," advises the fashion editor.

Journal About Town

Big ones that didn't get away: everything from 700-pounders to three-inchers lures the gourmet's appetite at Fulton Fish Market.

AS we go to press, they're debating in the building next door what kind of more or less amphibious creatures to install this summer in the big Rockefeller Plaza fountain down below the Workshop. And out of those conferences come rumors too good to be true: that they're considering beavers! . . . People ask us how long it takes to print and distribute almost five million copies of the JOURNAL each month. Well, unfortunately, it takes just long enough for men to change their minds. So by the time you read this, it probably won't be beavers at all, down in the pool, daily displaying their industry before thousands of idle onlookers. More likely it will be something on the order of baby sea lions, wasting their time, and ours, just having fun.

A bachelor friend of Henrietta Murdock's, recently retired and ready to settle down on his plantation in Costa Rica, has just with great difficulty been able to adopt two Viennese orphans, Edith and Ingeborge—not related until now. Arriving here luggageless by plane, a little the worse for war, they were whisked at once to dress shops and hairdressers, then came to call on Miss M., who gave them each the first brush and comb they'd ever owned. But what really moved them most (and us as well) was when they were shown the Workshop kitchen, and helped prepare their own luncheon—anything they wanted!



Edith and Ingeborge learn hairdressing technique from Miss M.

If you like to know how things happen, in this case the cover this month, it seems that with all the fabulous bridal headdresses of the John Frederics designing rooms at her disposal, Dawn Crowell was at the point of despair because her model didn't quite get the "bride look" she wanted. Until all of a sudden Dawn noticed that in passing an unassuming half-hidden bolt of embroidered organdy, someone had tossed some sweetheart roses on the organdy. The suggestion was irresistible, and in no time the John Frederics magic touch had shaped a new creation. Raven McBride tried it on, and Dawn finally saw the "breathless" look she was after. Don't you?

In Switzerland, when a bride has trouble with the housework, all she has to do is dial the number of the Government Information Service, which is prepared to answer all kinds of questions, from homemaking and baby care to elaborate recipes. . . . According to the Labor Department, the number of women Federal workers has dropped more than 50 per cent since June, 1945. . . . Virginia is farther west than West Virginia. . . . Expenditures for jewelry in the U.S. reached a record $1,300,000,000 for 1946. . . . Say it isn't so: the Census Bureau has laid down a rule that a woman is never classified as the head of a family if her husband is living in the same household. . . . According to a Hollywood expert, the best hours for sun bathing are dawn to 9 A.M. and 4 P.M. to sundown. . . . The greatest number of fatal auto accidents occur in clear-weather conditions on Sunday, involving male drivers between 18 and 24 years of age.

A friend in show business reports a possible forthcoming event, which should make theatrical history of a sort, if it ever occurs. Concerns Beatrice Lillie and Helen Hayes, who have apartments in the same house, and an afternoon when the English comedienne dropped in on the star of HAPPY BIRTHDAY for tea, just as Jamie, Miss Hayes' nine-year-old son, came in from school, a cheek and a pocket bulging with bubble gum. It was a chance both women had long wanted—to take their first crack at this fantastic confection; and in little more than an hour the American leading lady and England's Lady Peel had developed such prowess that they'd promised each other at the first opportunity to display their new talent on the stage. In case you care to keep it in mind.

If you're here this summer and want something different to do in the morning, Judy Barry recommends very highly the Fulton Fish Market, down below the Brooklyn Bridge. Best time to go, she says, is as soon after seven as you can make it, when everything from 700-pound tunas to tiny whitebait, three inches long, is glistening, and the range of colors quite staggering. Also, early, there is so much of everything. That's because it is, of course, the biggest fish market in the world, selling well over a million pounds a day. And while the people down there couldn't be busier, Judy says they make you feel as though you were on a personally conducted tour. Much more exciting than visits in the old days to the Aquarium.

When Bruce Gould found in his mail photographs of fifty-four young ladies of the Class of 1947 at the State University of Iowa (his alma mater), together with a letter from Bettye Neal, editor of the Hawkeye, the college annual, asking him to pick the five most beautiful, he took the request in his editorial stride; and now, having received this picture of his winners, he has no regrets regarding his selections.

Mr. Ely and the Unicorn

HE WAS GUILTY OF TWO SINS. EACH HAD TO DO WITH LOVE, AND LOVE WAS THE THING OF WHICH HE WAS MOST AFRAID.

The Journal's Complete-in-One-Issue Novel by NELIA GARDNER WHITE

THERE is a point in the history of a great weariness when the mind loses touch with reality. Ofttimes a fantastic humor takes possession like a daemon and everything becomes larger or smaller than life. One can look on mankind as a race of Lilliputians or one can be a leprechaun laughing at a race of giants. John Thackeray Ely had reached this latter point as he sat in the cocktail lounge at the Sheraton, staring first at his drink and then with an exhaustive attention to minutiae at the murals on the walls. He didn't know whether this was his first drink or his tenth. It was his first. He was so weary that he imagined he was drunk.

He saw the Emersons coming through the doors that became bewildering mirrors when closed, and he knew them and looked straight at them, willing at the same time that they should not see him or speak to him. A fine, upstanding country wench, he said to himself, putting her on one side of a room and Cass, fair and fragile, on the other and saying, I choose you, to Cass. Nevertheless, choosing fragility, he saw that Aggie Emerson was a grand, big girl with an invigorating bloom of health. She ought to be ashamed to come into a place like this with a weather-beaten look like that, Mr. Ely thought truculently. He had only two years ago published a book concocted out of Sid Emerson's dramatic criticisms. He had always wished Aggie had written the book instead of Sid. She was coming straight at him, grinning widely, her arms full of packages, her hat crooked.

"Hi, Johnny! Where's Cass?" she said. Her voice was as big as the room and told everyone that Cass didn't live with him any more.

"I wouldn't know," he said coldly.

Her unplucked brows went up. She slid into the red leather seat beside him and Emerson flanked him on the other side. Hemmed in, a leprechaun between two enormous, unweary people who had the stamina to live up on a dirt road in the Connecticut hills the year around, Mr. Ely had an impulse to slide down under the table and take his small self out through the sea of giants' legs and vanish. Then he felt a panic from not seeing any door where a door was supposed to be, only the bewildering mirrors, and a claustrophobia seized him.

"No fooling?" Aggie Emerson said, sympathetic, curious and cheerful all at once.

Don't answer, Mr. Ely's subconscious said. If you are as silent as the tomb they'll think you're not here. I am not going to tell them about Cass. I'm not going to tell them about anything.

Then what was he doing here? Mr. Ely asked himself, floating out the Merritt Parkway. He must have talked, because here he was the next afternoon, floating out through a dark, dank autumnal world to Aggie's place for a week end.

I spent the night somewhere, Mr. Ely said to himself. I couldn't have gone home, because home is where the heart is. That sentence seemed to him extraordinarily profound, but when his mind groped after its profundity, it found nothing, nothing at all. No sense, even.

HE couldn't remember getting his car either. He couldn't remember getting to this point. He turned off the parkway, however. He had a notion that the car was in control of him, that he was doing nothing whatever about control of gas or wheel. The world looked wet and dead and that was all right with Mr. Ely. He was in complete harmony with the wet brown oak leaves and the stripped maples and beeches. (Continued on Page 120)

He thought of all the time he had let slip by. The unfilled hours that would never come again. "Take it easy," said the Unicorn. "We're all masters at some time in our lives."

Peace AND ANOTHER

"I believe the Second World War need not have happened, and therefore I believe that a Third World War need not, and may not, happen."

IT is often said that, in the nineteenth century, Great Britain regulated the peace of the world and managed the conditions of its prosperity, and that it is now the mission of America to play the part which Britain is no longer able to play. I have no doubt that this is true, provided we do not make the mistake of supposing that we are like a son who inherits from his father the assets, the good will and the going concern of a well-established business. For the international order which Britain regulated no longer exists.

During the century between the fall of Napoleon and the outbreak of the First World War, Britain, though the leading power, was only first in a community of fairly equal states. The powers were Britain, France, the Austro-Hungarian Empire, Germany and Russia. All of them, with the exception of France, were not only in form but in fact monarchies and empires. Their dynasties were related across the national frontiers by intermarriage. Their governing classes were bound together by many family and social connections. In the period of the Pax Britannica the masses of the people came awake and acquired more and more democratic power. But as late as 1914, international affairs, the conduct of diplomacy and the making of war and peace remained the special business of men who by inheritance or adoption were recognized members of the governing classes of Europe.

They were, moreover, all of them Europeans. The continent of Europe was in effect the center of government for the world. Though the powers of Europe were rivals and frequently at war, their rulers recognized one another as permanent members of one international society. Their wars—even their great wars—were limited and localized. There was no such thing as total war, no such thing as the extermination or deportation of masses of people, no idea that the object of diplomacy could be the destruction of a great power. Though there were national boundaries, national animosities and national ambitions, there remained, still strong from earlier days, a feeling that Europe, the center of the world, was itself a cosmopolitan community within the bonds of Christendom.

This was the world order which Britain, though never in fact an enormously powerful military state, was able to preside over and to regulate. It may well be the verdict of history that the Pax Britannica marks the last phase of the international system which ended with the rise of the masses of the people to political power. It was, perhaps, the Indian summer of the ancient aristocratic European regime. And we, I imagine, are living in the winter that has followed the decline and fall of that regime. The old order is dead. But the new, which is to come, is still only the seed in the ground.

Only in some such perspective can we begin to measure how severe is the challenge which destiny has put to the American people. I hope no one will misunderstand me when I say that the challenge is unique, or think that I mean to disparage the greatness of Britain's mission, or—worse still—to become vainglorious about our own. The nineteenth century, though it ended in the catastrophe of the wars and revolutions of our generation, was a time of dazzling discovery, of the invention and the dispersion of the means by which a good life has become a practical possibility—eventually—for all men. To have been the leader of mankind when this occurred is the glory of the British Empire. It is an imperishable glory. On the other hand, no American can be vainglorious about the mission of this country, since anyone who could conceivably contribute to it must know that it will be easier to fail than it will be to succeed.

Nonetheless, it is true that the American challenge is greater than that which the British met on the whole so brilliantly. For they had only to conserve, and liberalize, an established order. America must be able to conceive, and to promote and to form and to defend, and in large measure to support, an order which does not yet exist.

THIS IS EASIER SAID THAN DONE. Today, in the year 1947, we are in the earliest preliminary stages. We are unable as yet to see how the great mission of a new world order is to be accomplished. We are just beginning to see what are some of the first problems that have to be solved. We are not yet equipped to solve them. For we have played a leading role in world affairs for only a few years. The conference at Teheran in the autumn of 1943 might be said to have been the first occasion in history when the United States began to take a direct and leading part, as distinct from a regional and a subordinate part, in attempting to shape the order of the world.

American statesmen have not been trained to conduct a global policy. All of them were born and have spent most of their lives in a world where the great global decisions were made in Europe—in London, Paris, Berlin, Rome, Vienna, and in St. Petersburg or Moscow. Washington was not at the center of, nor closely in touch, nor much concerned with the conduct of, world affairs. Even Wilson and Roosevelt, though they were not isolationists when they were in the White House, had grown to maturity in the long epoch of American isolation. Today, though no one can doubt that the United States is a leading world power with global interests and responsibilities, there are as yet no Americans who have had more than a brief experience in world politics.

Thus we are acting as a world power before we are ready to act. Britain rose gradually to world leadership over a period of at least two centuries—say between the defeat of the Spanish Armada in the time of Queen Elizabeth and the defeat of Napoleon at the Battle of Waterloo. Her power was acquired slowly. Her public men became accustomed slowly to the exercise of great power. Our rise to power is more like an explosion than an evolution. America has risen to a position of world leadership in about twenty-five years. But Americans have accepted that position for less than five years.

War!

BY WALTER LIPPMANN

So we are having to learn while we are acting. And we have to act fast, lest the greater part of the world sink into chaos and barbarism from which it might not be able to recover for many generations.

In measuring the challenge to Americans, nothing is gained by minimizing it. Some, I know, will be discouraged when they realize that the world cannot be pacified and a new international order created by endorsing the Atlantic Charter, by joining the United Nations, and by extending economic and other assistance in doles and driblets around the world. But others—and they are the ones upon whom the future depends—will be nerved to the effort as they realize how hard but how great it must be. For Americans—I think it can be said especially of Americans—do big things better than they do small ones. They have never liked much tidying up their back yard. But they liked opening up a continent. In any event, what lies before us is a very big thing indeed. And whatever the outcome, we shall achieve one of the great triumphs of all history or one of the greatest failures. That is the American rendezvous with destiny.

If we are to shape the future, we must not forget the past. How has it come about, then, that as we enter upon the work of making peace, we find ourselves confronting the Soviet Union in all parts of the world, and engaged in a conflict of power and influence which many believe must, and all believe may, end in the most destructive war in the annals of mankind?

To say that the Soviet Union is an aggressive expanding power with an alien ideology is no answer to the real question—which is why we find ourselves the principal opponents of the Soviet Union. I do not believe that anyone can come near the right answer to that question if he fixes his attention too much upon the Russian-American conflict. For then he will overlook the main point, which is that Russia and America appear to be engaged in a duel for the world only because all the other countries are for the time being so weak. It is true, of course, that the Soviet Union is a stronger power than Czarist Russia ever was. It is true that the United States has developed huge industrial and military power. But neither is remotely strong enough to rule the world. The notion that Russia and America together—or one of them, after having defeated the other—could organize and rule mankind is at least an optical illusion, and might become a most dangerous form of lunacy.

The events are worth recalling which have brought Russia and America to their present position, which have made Moscow and Washington the two present centers of the world. They are the events which mark the destruction of the international order which existed for many centuries until the two World Wars of our age. We may list the principal events.

IN THE PERIOD OF THE FIRST WORLD WAR:

1. The Austro-Hungarian Empire was dissolved, and on its ruins there arose a collection of small successor states.
2. The Ottoman Empire was dissolved, and a collection of small Arab states rose out of the ruins.
3. The Manchus were overthrown in China, and were succeeded by war lords whose civil strife has kept China in a state of civil war, and opened China to Japanese aggression.
4. France, though it won the war, suffered such huge losses that it ceased to be one of the chief world powers.
5. The Czarist Empire was dissolved, and, after years of revolution and civil war, a new autocratic state rose to be the successor.
6. The British Empire, though victorious in the end, would have been defeated if America had not intervened.
7. Germany, though defeated, had so nearly won the war and had suffered, relative to its neighbors, such small losses that she was able and willing to try again twenty years later.

When the Second World War was developing, many of the pillars of the old international order had already been destroyed and nothing had been put in their place. The Austrian empire, the Turkish, the Chinese were gone. The British and the French had been gravely weakened.

IN THE SECOND WORLD WAR the destruction of the old international order was carried farther:

1. Japan, though it was in the end defeated and reduced to helplessness, inflicted such crushing blows upon China, upon the Netherlands empire, upon the French empire, upon the British empire, that there is no likelihood that the Asiatic empires of the European states can ever be re-established. The Japanese lost the war. But "Asia for the Asiatics" has triumphed.
2. Germany, too, lost the war. But before Germany was defeated, she had won great victories. The undoing of these victories required an effort and sacrifices which have had enormous consequences. The heroic resistance of Britain has cost her the greater part of her empire, her whole predominance over the region from Egypt to India, and has used up the greater part of her accumulated wealth. Not only the preservation of the British imperial positions around the world, but the defense of the British Commonwealth—of Canada, Australia, New Zealand and of the United Kingdom itself—have become dependent upon the United States.
3. The defeat of the Nazi empire over Poland, the Danubian states and the Balkans was achieved only because of the victorious counteroffensive of the Red Army, which engaged and destroyed two thirds of the German Army. This counteroffensive has brought the Red Army into the center of Europe. If the Red Army had not advanced into Europe, then France, Belgium, the Netherlands, Norway, Denmark, Italy would have remained under Nazi rule, and Britain under devastating bombardment. But the liberation of all of Europe from Nazi domination has left half of Europe under Soviet domination.

The present situation of the world is intelligible only if we remember that Germany and Japan were defeated decisively only by Russia and America. The Japanese have had to (Continued on Page 189)

The day had started just like any other day. No one could have guessed it would end like this.

SHE USED SAM'S HEART FOR A MIRROR UNTIL THE NIGHT SHE SAW ANOTHER WOMAN'S FACE THERE.

A score for love

BY JANE MCDILL ANDERSON

SOME people say that since the war New York has turned into a shabby old jade of a city. They say it's too feverish, too greedy, too full of people who care only for themselves and how much money they can make and how much they can eat and drink. I don't know. I never lived there before the war. I only know it as a place where I learned how to love a man. For that reason, it will always be a good city for me, the city they say it used to be, a city of great promise and wisdom and enchantment.

Falling in love is easy enough. Any woman can do that without thinking. And usually does. But how to keep on loving is a different matter. A lot of women never know there is a difference and go around in a peevish way the rest of their lives, wondering what happened to that first excitement. The lucky ones learn the difference, and often through the most trivial things. His favorite old jacket that needs mending. The sound of his feet coming home every night. A certain chair that has to be by a certain light. A clear soup that he likes when his stomach is upset. His tools in the cellar, that always have to be put back.

It was a chicken that started me off on the right track. An ordinary two-and-a-half-pound fryer.

We had been walking up Madison Avenue that late November afternoon and I'd been watching the two of us reflected in the shop-windows, my head just an inch or so below Sam's, both of us tall and thin and close together. I waved my hand at everything: the buildings in cold half-lights; the gray, streaky sky; the crowded busses and taxis and cars.

"You know, darling," I said, "before I knew you all this would have been like an etching to me, black, gray and white. Now it's like an oil painting, full of color, lots of contrasts, moving with stuff I'd never noticed before. That's because I love you. Love does that, makes everything jump out, full of itself and exciting."

"Is it really that way for you?" Sam said, smiling at me. "I'm very glad, Susie." He took hold of my arm and looked ahead, searching with his own eyes.

"Oh, yes," I said happily. "And I'm sure it will stay that way for me for all my life with you."

It's wonderful how confident you can feel, how sure of things. But I'd always felt like that. Being an only child with doting parents makes you feel pretty solid. You get quite a lot in a setup like that. Good dresses, the right schools, plenty of friends, plenty of beaus. Ever since I can remember I'd lived in our big house in Hartford, red-bricked, solid, set back from the street, with gardens and a tennis court. I'd played under the old trees with my dolls and been kissed for the first time under them. I'd thumped down the wide, polished stairs on pillows with my pigtails floating out behind and clicked down them in high heels, very proud, half smiling at someone or other waiting below with gardenias in his hand for me. If you have all this, and if, in addition, you're not bad-looking and know your way around, it's pretty easy to think you can get almost anything you like.

When I decided I'd done a good war job with the Red Cross and the canteens and would enjoy a winter or two in New York, it wasn't hard for me to get plenty of letters and a job that didn't hold me down too much. I'd had it now for almost a year. Doing research for an art magazine called View. Even getting a place to live in town had been simple with all the people I knew. First I'd been with Midge Barstow and Pussy Newbold, and then taken over Francie Carstair's apartment when she married and moved to Detroit. And to make everything the way I liked it, View had sent me to a Mr. Samuel Andrews to find out how a soldier-artist reconverts himself to painting peacefully. What I found out was just what I'd been looking for. Someone big enough for me, with a quiet voice, an easy smile, light-brown hair and dark-brown eyes that looked as if I pleased them.

But if I'd been confident before, it wasn't anything compared with the way I'd been feeling since the day of Sam's show and the success he had had with his paintings and how he had said afterward, "Well, Susie, we've done it. You've been my good-luck piece ever since you tried to do a case history of me for View. How about making it a team, you and I, until Kingdom Come?"

When I'd finished kissing him, I'd said, "This is the most delicious and exciting thing that has ever happened to me. And it's going to stay that way. I'll make a spell."

"Make it a good one, Susie," he'd said, with a funny look on his face, gripping my shoulders so that they ached. "Make it a very good one."

I'd wondered a little what was putting the trouble in his face, but I was so happy about the way my heart was pounding and the way my mouth felt that I couldn't think of anything else. "The spells I make are purely perfect, sir," I told him. "I've never been known to fail."

WHAT CHANCE HAS A MAN WHEN A GIRL'S GOT HIS NUMBER?

BY DOROTHY STALEY

SUSAN NORMAN dropped to her knees beside the day bed and said, "You beautiful, precious thing," to a very ordinary telephone—which, of course, did not make sense at all.

If you had asked her, Susan would have told you that she was not at all emotional. But then three months ago she would also have told you that she was not easily frightened and never, never lonely.

Or if you had asked Mr. Dipple, her employer, he would have said in his usual short, crisp sentences, "Susan? You mean Susan. Old head on young shoulders. Extremely capable for twenty-two." Then he would have explained that the Webster Improved Automatic Valve Company had brought her from the small manufacturing town in Ohio to their new sales office in Philadelphia for that reason.

And if you had found some particular young man to ask, he would have said, "Pretty nice," meaning Susan's hair and wide-spaced, steady eyes, the oval face with its firm chin and its wide, generous mouth, and the trim, lithe figure that went with them—but there wasn't any particular young man to ask.

And because there was no particular young man, and because Susan was never frightened, or lonely, or emotional, there was no reason for her to drop to her knees as soon as the workman left and croon to a very ordinary telephone; for after all, it would never ring with that special ring that sets a girl's heart to racing. In fact, it would probably never ring at all unless Mr. Dipple called some night about business.

For Susan had been in Philadelphia only two months, and aside from Mr. and Mrs. Dipple, who had taken her to dinner twice—at a monthly interval, like a duty to be discharged—and a washroom acquaintance with the girl in the next office, with whom she had gone twice to an early movie, she had only the briefest speaking acquaintance with the newsboy, the grocer at the corner, and the cashier in the cafeteria where she ate her lunch. And of course, Mrs. Bishop, who had the first-floor-rear apartment; and she wished often that she hadn't in small-town fashion spoken to Mrs. Bishop.

For as soon as Mrs. Bishop was past the "Good morning, lovely-day-isn't-it" place, she had said, "Look, Miss Norman, I don't want to frighten you, but a big city isn't like a small town. You never know what's going to happen. Now when you live alone as you do, it really isn't safe to put 'Susan Norman' on your letter box. Change it to 'S. Norman,' and then no one knows whether a man or a woman lives here—see? Now a woman two houses down came home one evening ——" So Susan changed the name on her letter box.

She purchased a night chain for her door when Mrs. Bishop said, "A first-floor apartment's all right, but you just never know who's stepping in the hall. Now one night ——"

But when Mrs. Bishop had suggested a telephone, Susan had said, "Good heavens, what will I do with a telephone? There is no one for me to call and no one to call me."

"Well," Mrs. Bishop said, "it's best. If you should get sick in the night, or if something should happen. And I'm telling you. You never know what is going to happen." Then Mrs. Bishop had added in a brighter tone, happy because she had found a thought she hadn't worried before, "Or if something should happen at home, they could reach you."

So Susan asked for a telephone, and didn't tell Mrs. Bishop that there was no one at home who would want to reach her. Until her speaking acquaintance with Mrs. Bishop, she had regarded her first-floor apartment in one of the old Spruce Street mansions as a minor miracle in a chain of miracles. A telephone after only a six-week wait was certainly one, but the first and best of the miracles had been the request of the

SELF-CONFIDENCE

Know yourself and respect yourself, if you would know and respect others

BY JOSHUA LOTH LIEBMAN
Rabbi, Temple Israel, Boston; Author of "Peace of Mind"

SOLARI
Doctor Liebman

IT is one of the great discoveries of modern psychology that our attitudes toward ourselves are just as complicated as our attitudes toward others—sometimes more so. When we go astray in our attitudes toward ourselves we become enslaved to false notions of what we are and what we ought to be. We persist in trying to be someone we think we are (or have been told we ought to be) instead of learning to become what we are—ourselves.

The key to the problem is to look within—to gaze steadily, unflinchingly at our inward selves—weighing our flaws and infirmities, and rooting out the causes of our failures and fears. Self-understanding, which brings with it proper self-regard, or love of self, is thus the way to inner peace and outer confidence in self. The great commandment of religion, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," might now be better interpreted to mean, "Thou shalt love thyself properly, and then thou wilt love thy neighbor."

By "love thyself properly" I do not mean coddling oneself, indulging in vanity, in conceit or self-glorification; I mean primarily that warm, friendly, life-respecting, tender attitude that we should (but seldom do) take toward our own personalities as well as toward the careers and destinies of other human beings, whether our children, our mates, our friends or our human brothers.

Many times we think we have proper regard for ourselves when, as a matter of fact, we are most cruel to ourselves. Indeed, of all the human frailties that I encounter in the course of a long day, the commonest is not man's wrongdoing to others, but rather the injury that he inflicts upon himself. The famed barbarians who gashed their bodies with clamshells, then rubbed corrosive dyes into their wounds, were self-indulgent fellows in comparison with some of the self-tormenting people who enter my study for counsel and advice. Invariably they are practicing upon themselves a curious kind of cruelty: they minimize their own virtues and exaggerate their own faults until the weight of their shortcomings becomes an intolerable burden.

I think now of a fine, gifted woman of my acquaintance. Although she is a lovely and sensitive person, she seems to have a tragic gift for being mean to herself. She is a specialist in her own shortcomings and has found every weak spot in her own armor. She has set up unattainable standards of perfection for herself, and then flogs herself with whips of her own making because she cannot reach these humanly impossible goals. She is a slave driver, a Simon Legree to herself, and she makes her own life and that of her family miserable. If we could but realize that all men and women bear within themselves the scars of lost battles, we would judge our own lacerated skins less harshly.

Anatole France said a very wise thing when he proclaimed that only those who expect modest things from human nature will learn to be kind and tolerant. Those who expect too much and receive too little will end up by turning into misanthropes, fanatics or tyrants. This applies to ourselves as well as others.

In the battle for self-confidence in which we are all engaged, we must realize that we need not emerge either geniuses or saints. Justice Holmes, in one of his brilliant letters, describes the feeling of inner release that came to him when it dawned upon him that he was not placed here on earth to play the role of God. No, he was created as a frail, fallible man, finite and limited in many ways.

Several thousand years ago, in the great Jewish ethical treatise Sayings of the Fathers, an ancient rabbi counseled man: "Be not wicked in thine own sight," which the famous Jewish philosopher of the Middle Ages, Maimonides, interpreted to mean: "Regard thyself as partly good and partly evil; be not therefore either conceited or despairing." We are relative and not absolute creatures, and everything we do is tinged with imperfection as a result. Let us accept the fact that there is a little tyrant and a touch of the critic and martyr in all of us. There are moments when we want to dominate, to tear down, to make others suffer. But we must learn to take the depressed mood, the cruel mood, the uncooperative mood for what it is: fleeting and impermanent. We must learn to take ourselves for worse as well as for better, to cease demanding of ourselves a brittle perfection, which can lead only to inner despair because it is impossible of fulfillment.

The lack of self-confidence which torments so many men and women today originates in a number of different ways. One of the commonest causes of a sense of insecurity and inferiority is the "emotional hang-over" from that chapter in our lives when we really were inadequate. The world of the child is certainly a world of actual insecurity. There is nothing imaginary about his sense of helplessness—the lack of support as he stumbles across an uncertain floor or falls out of an unguarded bed or seeks in vain to communicate, without the tools of language, his feelings of pain and hunger and loneliness.

As children we were really inferior in comparison with the adult figures protecting us by their love, but also frightening us at times with their power. On one occasion or another we may have been laughed at for some childish failure, some house of blocks that came tumbling down. We were made to (Continued on Page 190)

THOMAS EAKINS was the most intellectual artist America has produced, yet Sailboats Racing on the Delaware, which he painted in 1874, looks at first gla as fortuitous and casual as a colored snapshot. Where does the intellectual elem in Eakins' painting show itself? What is the difference between a realistic paint of this kind and a well-taken Kodachrome? Though Eakins himself was a pion photographer, he used the camera only as a mechanical means of gathering d about appearance, not as a basis for his pictures. Actually this scene of a sailb race was put together in the studio from sketches and from memory, perhaps l after the event. The picture seems photographic because painter and camera h the same goal: to show, as Eakins said, "what o'clock it is, afternoon or morni winter or summer, and what kind of people are there, and what they are doing why they are doing it."

But these facts the painter can convey more convincingly than the camera photograph taken on a sunny day gives the general semblance of sunshine; Eakins, through his careful analysis of reflected light, seems in his seascapes to cre a sunshine of his own, sparkling from countless angles of the choppy water. A pho graph indicates depth; but Eakins, by strongly emphasizing perspective, draws spectator's vision into this depth, makes him part of the scene, in this case throu the receding line of boats with their intervals so arranged as to pull the eye acr the bay as irresistibly as watching the ricochet of a skipping stone. And a photogra sometimes fixes in the kaleidoscope of appearance a satisfactory design; but it alm never achieves, as in Sailboats Racing, an integrated composition in which no obj can be altered or removed without destroying the whole effect.

THE UNWED MOTHER

ONE out of every twelve babies born in the United States is born out of wedlock. Of these, almost all are born to mothers beaten and bewildered, poor in purse and spirit, and with none but strangers near when the great miracle of life occurs once more—under the most unhappy of circumstances. Statistics show roughly half these mothers are from 10 to 19 years old, about half have only a grade-school education, more than half come from small towns or rural areas, about six out of ten are Negresses, a vast number are from broken homes, and scarcely one in a hundred reveals a happy childhood and a satisfying mother-daughter relationship.

This is the story of one of them. She cannot be said, of course, to be typical; only statistics can reveal the typical, human beings cannot. Each of us responds differently, reacts differently to similar experiences. Yet, just as all of us are but a part of the whole of mankind, so each of our reactions and responses has something in common. In one individual's story, it is possible to catch a portion of all stories. The unwed mother in this story—we shall call her Katie Herrick—has weathered several rounds in the personal battle she started unwittingly against society. Her baby is two years old now, healthy and well fed. But in the almost three years of her baby's growth, she has known many of the trials of all unwed mothers—and she has still more to face. For neither food nor money can change her basic malfortune, nor her child's: both will be forevermore objects of curiosity and suspicion, and victims of fear and deceit, for such are the penalties for breaking the laws of our society. This, then, is Katie's story—and her baby, Johnny's—as she told it to me. . . .

"It's very strange trying to figure out where some event in your life begins exactly. Even something as big as having a baby. Does anybody ever know where anything begins? Sometimes I lie awake at night and start wondering how this thing happened to me. I remember something bad that I did when I was a little girl and think to myself, That's where it began; I must have been just naturally a rebel and therefore it's only natural I'm a 'bad girl' now. Then I rebel against that and think, I'm not really bad; that I didn't deliberately plan out this thing to hurt Johnny and defy everybody, that I just didn't know, and I wish that somehow, somewhere along the line, I'd learned more about things, like why marriage is, and what love means, and how you can protect yourself against being carried away by your emotions.

"Anyhow, I didn't, and now I've done the worst badness of all—I've hurt someone else. That's the kind of badness nobody wants in their life, and if they have it they want to forget it, but a mother can't forget it ever. I can say that I'm happy now because I've learned to face this and know that, having been bad this way, what I must do now is to make up for it as best I can: to see that Johnny gets the best possible sort of life; that he becomes the best kind of person I can help him to be, and the strongest, and the most beloved. And I know that I can't do anything for him at all unless I make myself strong and good and secure first.

"Maybe other people can be bad, but I know I can't afford to be any more. I've got to be disciplined and cautious; a lot of people expect the worst of me no matter what I do, but I can do my darnedest not to give them anything to work on.

"Anyhow, I was saying that I don't know where this story begins. There was the day when my sister—she was just sixteen and I thought she was wonderful then—ran away from home and got married. I'm pretty sure that that was mostly mother's fault, really. Mother was always railing at all of us. She didn't like anything we did and she wouldn't let us have dates or go out much, even to harmless old birthday parties. When I hear a woman yelling at someone someplace I always hurry very fast to get away from the sound of it, because it reminds me of how my mother used to scream rather than talk. She lost her temper over just about everything. Everything we kids—there were five of us—did could always have been so much better if we'd just done it her way. I don't think there was a one of us who didn't start when we were about ten to plan to run away from home as soon as we could. I was going to be wonderful and famous; Janie—that was the sister who ran away to get married—was going to marry a rich man and have lots of kids and a beautiful home.

"Well, we both did get away. But it wasn't to get away from home that made me have a baby. I didn't get to college the way I wanted to, but I did get through business school and I got a job and was very much away from home when I met John—I named the baby after him even if he didn't marry me. I was already free of my mother then; I even had a pity for her because, after Janie ran away and I left, father divorced her. They'd been married twenty-five years, and she was acting worse than ever; but even so, I felt sorry for her. Janie's marriage turned out terribly, and I suppose that maybe that influenced me too. It made me wonder if mother was right, and both of them gave me a worry about getting married. I decided I was going to be so sure, so very, very sure of the man I married before I married him. I was going to marry just the right man and live happily ever after with him. I wasn't going to be taken in by charm—I knew too much about charm. My mother had a charm about her on a good day. She could wheedle you into believing something you didn't want to before you knew it. My brother—the young one—has that kind of charm too. And no staying power. I'll bet he's had fifteen jobs in the past two years and now, instead of moving on to better jobs, he's moving on to worse ones.

"My ideas of what I did want in this ideal man were really vague, though. I didn't know any men until I started to work when I was nineteen. Mother had warned us all not to get 'mixed up' with men; she said they were always 'wanting something' out of women, but she never came right out and said what. When Janie fell for Roger, mother was pretty mad. She told Janie that she'd hadn't brought her up to go out with any Tom, Dick and Harry, and that she'd find a good husband for her when she was older. So Janie said that if the only way she could see Roger was to run off with him, she'd run off with him and she did. Of course, it didn't work out; they didn't have any money, and they were too young, and then Janie had a baby born dead, and she started to drink too much. It was just awful, but anyhow, the first dates I had were with an older man. I thought he was wonderful, but I found out he was married and I had an awful fight with him. He told me I was a ninny and I didn't know anything about life. I thought I was through with men for sure then.

"Then I met Johnny. Somehow he didn't scare me a bit. He was so gentle and so sweet and he seemed to need me so much. He was always asking me what he should do about things; we worked in the same office, and while I know now that what I thought was niceness was an awful lot of weakness, still, he was sweet and that's all there was to it. We talked and talked about things, about what he wanted to do and be, and we seemed to agree on everything, and when he first kissed me it didn't seem as if anything could possibly be wrong or awful about it.

"Sometimes I go over and over our love affair. I had my own apartment then, and he used to come over in the evenings. We were in love, we thought, and we were going to be married. I knew he'd have to go away; he was in the Army—I was working in the depot. But it never occurred to me that we ought to get married before we made love—maybe I was scared I'd lose him if I insisted, maybe I was just caught up in a daydream, I don't know; anyhow, even when I discovered I was going to have a baby, I wasn't scared he'd leave me.

"I didn't even catch on to the fact that he was mad about my getting pregnant. He was scared, and told some of his buddies, and you know how men are, or women either, when they get together. It seemed funny to them, and they razzed him a lot and called it all sorts of names and said I was trying to trap him into something, and what did he want to marry a girl who'd play a trick on him like that for anyway.

"You know how looking back on something one small incident stands out as a sort of turning point—only you didn't know that's what it was at the time. Anyhow, Johnny had been telling me what they were saying and I guess I didn't understand very well how it had gotten under his skin and I got impatient and I said that there was only one thing to do about it, and that was to stop just planning on getting married (Continued on Page 102)

Even without Russell, it was strictly a hooray day. But could it stay that way without Bill?

Angela was Eighteen

BY LEE WARREN

BIRTHDAYS had always been exciting, but none had ever been so thrilling as this, her eighteenth, because Bill was coming. The family had never met Bill. And she would be so proud. Even Harold would be crazy about him. Not that it mattered too much about a kid brother's opinion, but it was nice to have someone the whole family would like. Harold had been so scornful of Russell. It had been very unpleasant. Impossible to recall Russell today, without thinking of her seventeenth birthday. No question he had made it a breathlessly exciting day. Russell was a poet. Not one box of flowers, but three, had come, spaced at intervals during the day, each different, each with a poem likening them to her. It had certainly been a day of mounting excitement, with the family flatteringly impressed, all except Harold, who had made such disgusting noises when she had read the first poem aloud that she wouldn't let him hear the others.

Of course Bill wouldn't do anything like that. She laughed aloud at the idea. Men like Bill never went in for little details. Bill was so masculine—and after all, that's what a girl wanted most in a man. Someone who could walk right up to any man and knock him down, if need be. It gave one such a blissful feeling of security. Bill was older than Russell, and he'd had two years in the Navy, and no doubt that helped.

It was luxury, now that she was home for spring vacation, to get up any old time, but today was different.

She was just about to spring out of bed when the door opened and Harold stuck his head in, and before she could remonstrate at his barging in in this way, when she'd warned him so many times, he called, "Happy birthday, sis. Say, did you say that guy was on the football team at college?"

"Practically. He will be in the fall, and I do say he'll be captain by another year."

"Gee! Are you engaged to him?"

"Don't be so nosy, Harold. Good-by."

Harold closed the door.

Impossible to explain to a kid brother the delicious state leading up to an engagement. Exciting enough at the moment to be known as Bill's girl. Ever since she had been his guest at last winter's Sports Carnival, where he had made a ski record and won the silver cup, her friends had been dying to meet him. So just yesterday her mother had agreed to let her have the buffet supper before the dance at the country club. She was having twelve at the house first. That meant a busy day, and she should be up helping.

Angela slid her feet into cerise satin mules and made off for the shower. She took cold ones each morning now, to harden herself; a step toward making herself the outdoor type, to match Bill better.

Perhaps it was the shock of the cold water and its sobering effect, but suddenly a nasty little fear clutched at her, most unwelcome after the rosy glow of her waking reflections. There hadn't been time to let Bill know about the supper, and although she had stressed to him the importance of getting there in the morning, so they could have the whole day together, he didn't know of any actual plans until the dance at night; and suppose he didn't come until late evening! (Continued on Page 245)

Parents ask pointless questions. They never seem to understand. There were times when Angela wished she could be completely grown up Zion National Park Southwestern Utah's desert blooms into spectacular canyon country where the Virgin River has etched sandstone cliffs 2000 feet high and Nature's colors range from dawn's haunting gray to the power of brilliant red at noon. The 135 square miles of Zion National Park—once a haven for prehistoric cliff dwellers, later part of Mormons' sanctuary—now offer the grandeur of lonely rock fortresses like West Temple (2500 feet high) and the symbolism of Sinawava's Temple, where stone-pillared altar and pulpit survey a natural amphitheater. There is year-round camping, with housekeeping cabins as low as $2.75 a day for two persons. Trails (26 miles) include route up Lady Mountain, where 2000 feet of cable steady the climber over 1400 steps carved in solid stone. Sight-seeing by horseback ($5 a day) provides a view of the West Rim, where rocks 200,000,000 years old blaze against an ageless sky.

YOUR AMERICA

merica's national parks and monuments offer the country's most flexible vacations among the greatest spectacles of Nature. In them you will find the vast shock of mountain beauty and the tiny excitement of a daffodil in the sun. You can spend two days or twenty; follow the challenge of an alpine trail, or , peaceful, before the blue calm of lakes at sunset. These lands invite equally a family of six or the white-collar girl on a solo vacation. ıpervised by the Government, they are as democratic as a town meeting in New England, as unsophisticated as a barbecue on the range. In the surge of their rivers, in steep-walled glacier valleys, the parks hold our tradition of westering. Theirs are the stories our fathers fashioned of ioneers. Of women in bonnets and men in buckskins, whose vision took them westward with the mallard's flight, deep into forests where light never shone. Masters of voyaging, pursuers of horizon, to them America was wilderness—a creed in itself—waiting for belief. And for us, as for them, this wilderness, this grandeur still await discovery in the national parks system. Free to all, preserved for all, these 20,000,000 acres are the past's living heritage, a bridge from all ime to our time. They are a magic haven from the traffic and tension of everyday routine. Without them, we would be the less.

For all of us hunger for our origins, "to see a vorld in a grain of sand, heaven in a wild flower."

Rainbow Bridge —Greatest of all natural bridges (309 feet high, 278 across), this stone arch in Utah is nearly double Niagara's height. Indians named it because of rainbow symmetry; Bridge Creek carved it to take short cut around a canyon's bend.

FEDOR

Carlsbad Caverns —Ceilings reach the floor in New Mexico's Carlsbad Caverns, where dripping water deposits sedimentation to form spires and columns. From a subsurface cave, millions of bats fly out every summer night in a cloud—3 hours long.

WESTERN WAYS

Old Faithful —Welcomed the first explorer to Yellowstone Park in Northwestern Wyoming, now plays its water show for tourists. The trouper geyser performs every hour—on the hour (more or less).

This America is yours for the price of gas, oil and a little of the leather from your low-heeled shoes. If you want the low-down on costs, and so on, just turn to page 185 after you've finished looking at the scenery.

Monument Valley

Cloudbursts, sandstorms and Indians rule the thousand square miles of Navajo reservation enclosing Monument Valley. And whoever follows the hazards of an uncertain road to Goulding's Trading Post in Utah will have found one of the most removed spots in the United States. Here the Indians come for flour, coffee and candy—bringing their blankets, rugs and jewelry to sell or pawn. And hereabouts for the hardy is a unique experience in discovery. Putting up at the Post ($2 a night), they can venture forth in special cars (low gears, oversize tires) to areas, perhaps unexplored since the gold rush, where masses of strangely carved rock prod the sky in shapes that change with shifting desert light. Cave drawings hold for the recorders of today a message of man's ancient lonely origins.

Painted Desert A boundary of rainbows holds Arizona's Painted Desert. Fifty thousand acres of restless sand and rock shift colors endlessly in a pageant for travelers on transcontinental U. S. Highway 66. Much of this area is in the Petrified Forest National Monument, where trees that lived 160,000,000 years ago lie turned to stone. Exposed by wind and rain, some have crumbled into fragments of onyx, opal, jasper and agate that reflect the sun in a dazzling spectrum. Primitive Indians chipped the agate into arrowheads and hammers; now their forest is a convenient base for trips to near-by camps of present-day Navajos and Apaches. It became a national monument when Arizonans, alarmed at looting of the semiprecious gems, asked the United States to take over and preserve their past's glory for generations to come.

CRANDALL

Yellowstone Water and wind, architects of the ages, chiseled beauty so fabulous in Yellowstone Park that audiences branded 19th-century lecturers as impostors for attempting to describe it. The oldest (since 1872) and biggest (2,213,000 acres) of our national parks, this area in Northwestern Wyoming was Mecca for 814,000 visitors last year. One of our largest wildlife sanctuaries (the quiet trail watcher can see deer, bear, antelope and mountain sheep), it shelters 200 bird species—including crag-nesting eagles and rare trumpeter swans. Fishermen, who need no license here, can catch a trout in Yellowstone Lake and then use one of 10,000 hot-water springs as a ready-made cooking pot.

Glacier Sixty small glaciers—residue of the monsters that once pressed down from the north in three waves of ice—still grip the earth in the Montana fastness of Glacier National Park. Nestling on the Canadian border, the 1583-square-mile reservation has sky-tall mountains, giant glacier-carved valleys, and at least 200 lakes. The one road traversing the park is Going-to-the-Sun Highway, 53 miles long, and crossing the Continental Divide through the 6654-foot-high Logan Pass. But a thousand miles of trails lace the peaks and valleys, and vacationing climbers can put up at a chalet or trail camp for around $5.00, American plan. Open only in the summer, Glacier has 800 species of flowers—150 of them brilliant showpieces that spread their tapestry of blooms across its slopes in July.

Rocky Mountain "Nature's gift to Everyman"; thus the rangers who guard it proudly describe Colorado's Rocky Mountain National Park. For the solitary (and agile), there's the challenge of climbing in the Snowy Range (Long's Peak will take them 14,255 feet above worldly care). For the group-minded, free naturalist-conducted hikes can add new friends to new knowledge (kids have their own field trips with a microphone truck tagging along to broadcast the fun). Even the motorist need have no conscience about being a tenderfoot on wheels. Old Fall River Road, a one-way holdover from early tourist days, offers thumps and thrills for the experienced driver, while Trail Ridge, the state's highest highway, takes sitting mountaineers well over 11,000 feet. And for those who sight-see on the night shift, there's the special beaver floor show—dam construction—in America's largest roof garden.

Bryce Canyon "Red-rocks-standing-like-men-in a-bowl-shaped-canyon" is the Indian name for this vast amphitheater in Southern Utah. Grotesque pinnacles, domes and temples rise from what an early settler once described as "one hell of a place to lose a cow." Good roads, trails make it tourist-tyros' paradise.

Mesa Verde Juniper and piñon trees cast green shade all year on the world's greatest archaeological preserve. There, Colorado canyons shelter remains of the Basket-Maker and Pueblo Indian cultures—ruined villages, proud cliff dwellings. The most spectacular is Cliff Palace, which provided 200 living rooms for the 400 tenants.

White Sands Uncle Sam's biggest sand pile is 13 billion tons of sugarlike gypsum in Southern New Mexico. Its 79,000 yearly visitors go barefooted, build castles and lay out highway and railroad systems that the wind erases overnight. Some of the more adventurous fasten sleds behind their cars and go dune-bogganing; others ski down the soft white slopes. Scientists report that sands form the greatest known surface deposit of gypsum in the world, while biologists note that only seven species of plants can live in the area and that local desert mice are white to match their surroundings. Memo for the future: in several thousand years, the sands' drift northward will bury the town of Alamogordo, 12 miles distant.

ERIC H. BOND

Boulder Dam A man-made wonder, the $125,000,000 dam harnesses the surging Colorado to provide the West's power and water. Behind it stretches Lake Mead, an inland ocean big enough to float all the world's navies and be a public playground for 1,171,736 yearly visitors who swim, boat, sun themselves and indulge their taste for bass.

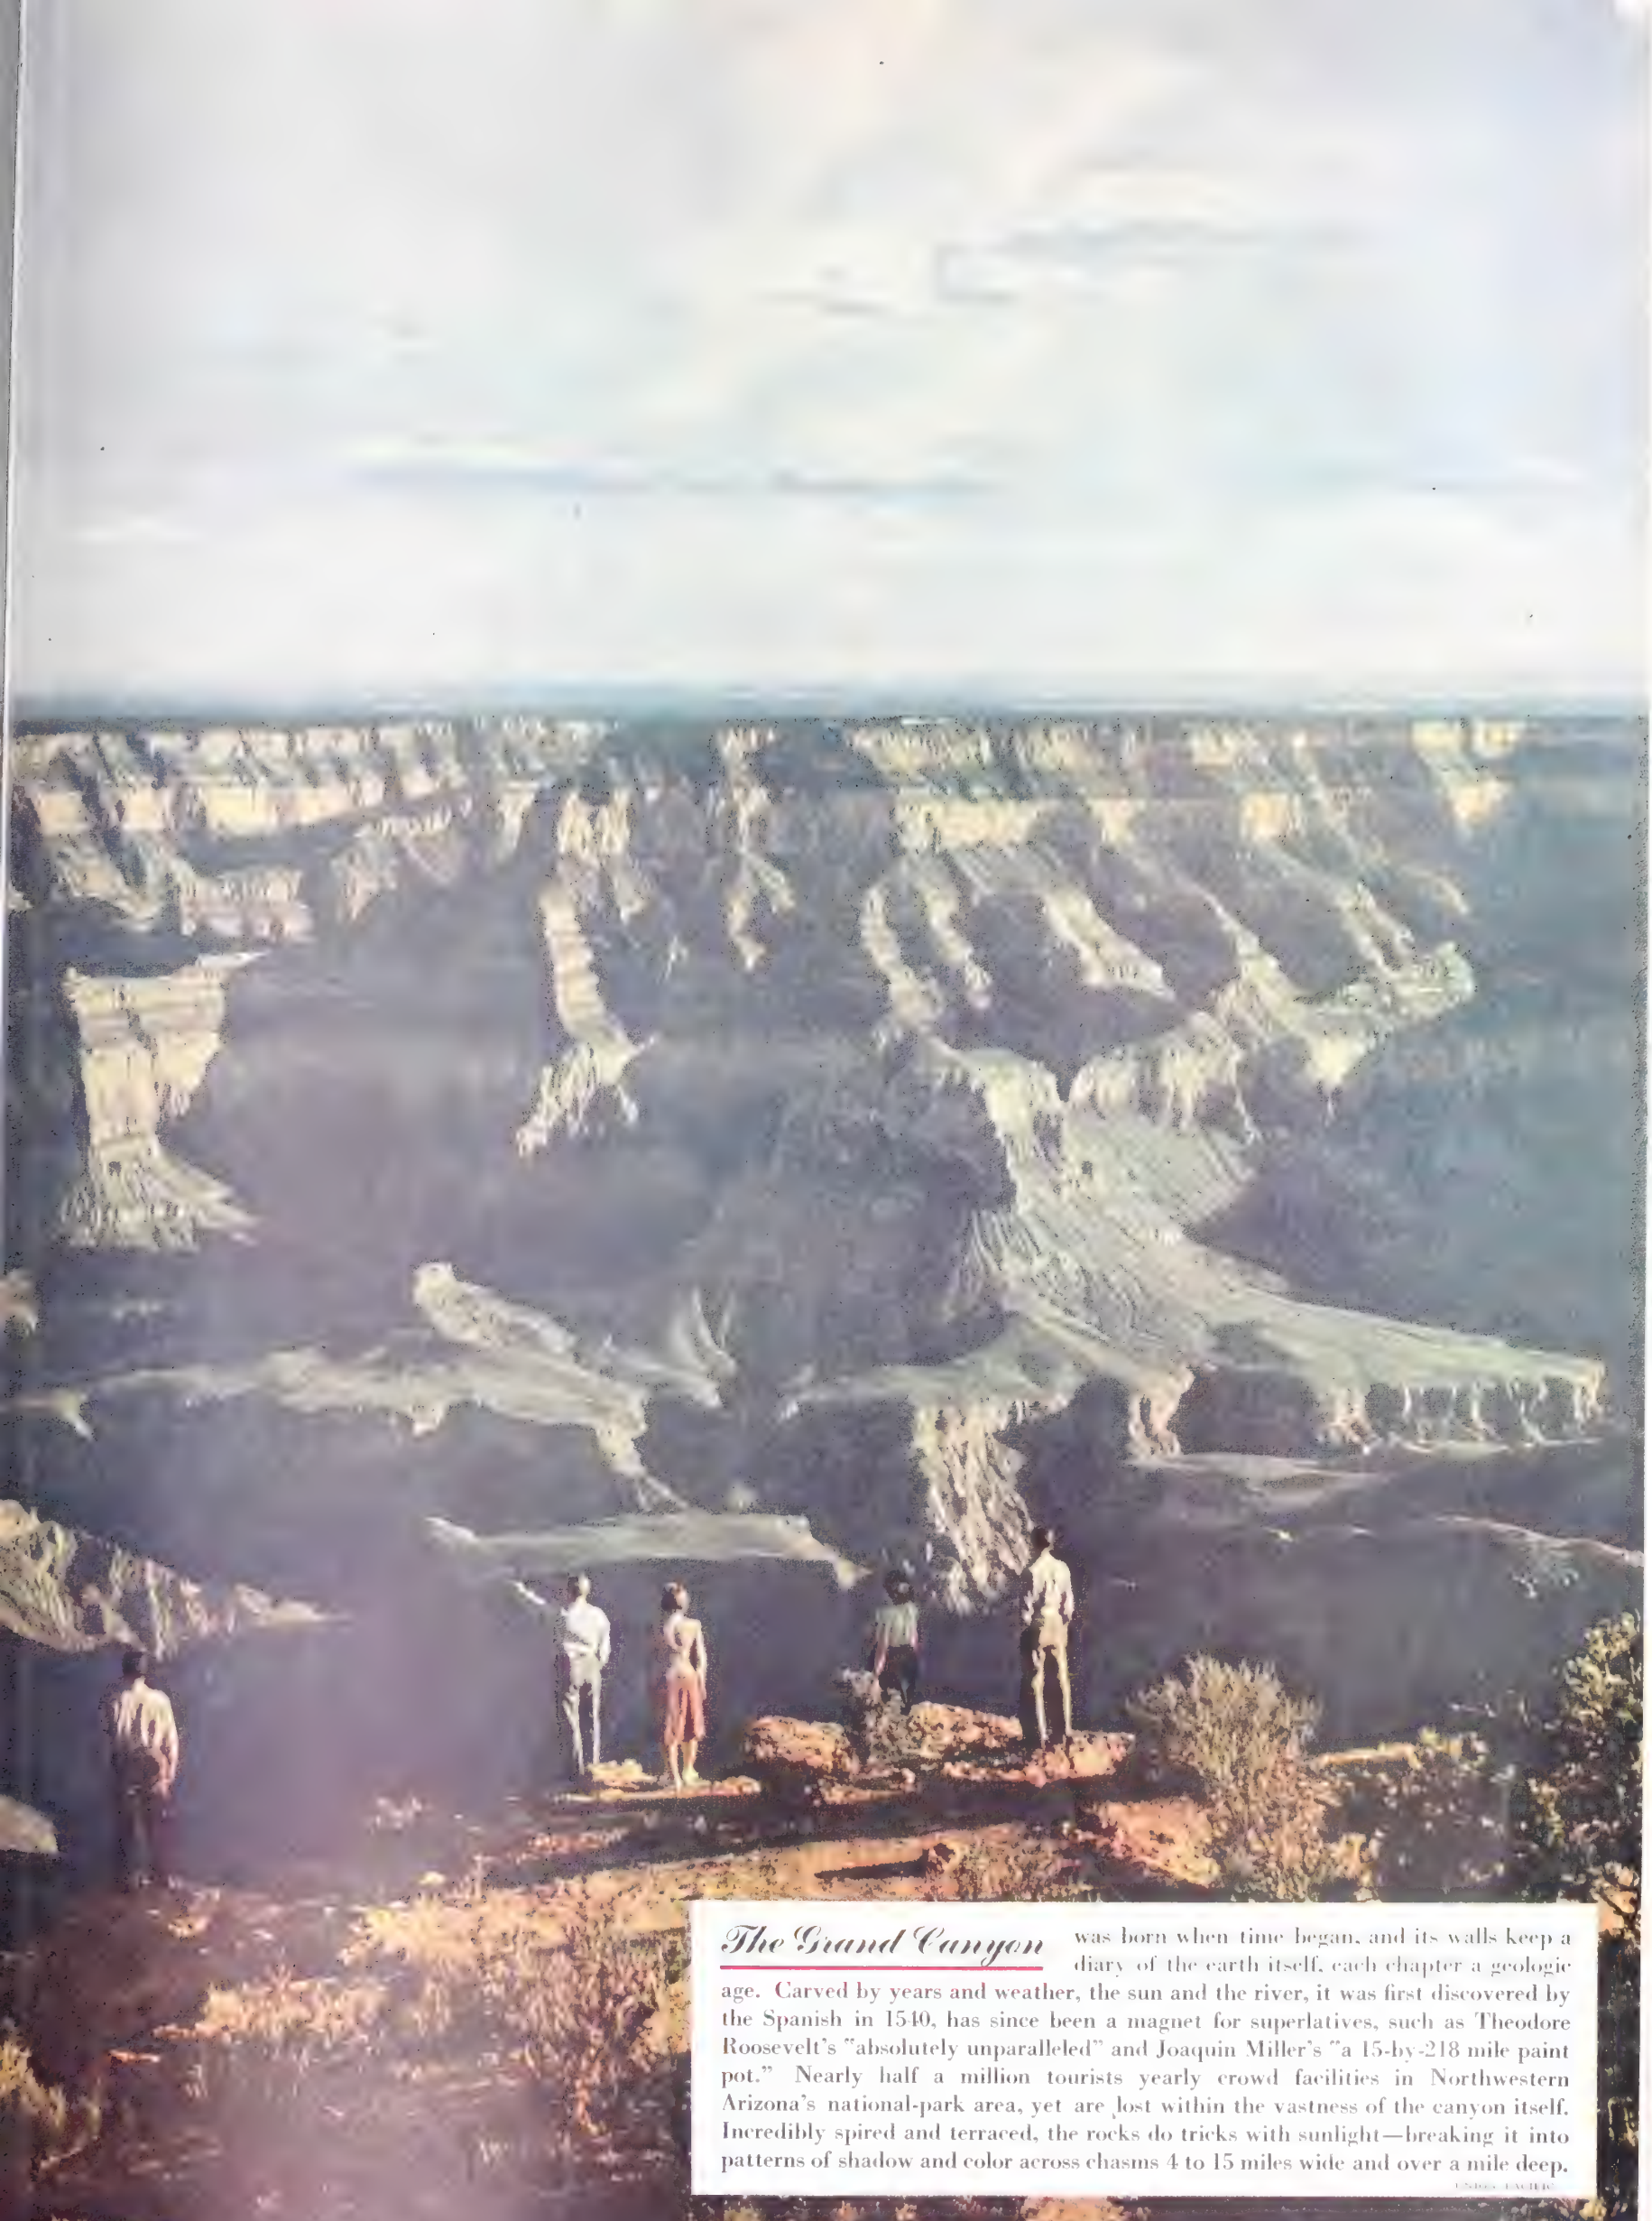
Delicate Arch rises, a shock of copper light, among its 81 sisters in Southeastern Utah's Arches National Monument. Its massive "slickrock" and precipitous cliffs are reward for a two-mile hike from road's end; but Landscape Arch, believed to be the world's longest, is near by for tourists who prefer to take their scenics from a car.



The Grand Canyon was born when time began, and its walls keep a diary of the earth itself, each chapter a geologic age. Carved by years and weather, the sun and the river, it was first discovered by the Spanish in 1540, has since been a magnet for superlatives, such as Theodore Roosevelt's "absolutely unparalleled" and Joaquin Miller's "a 15-by-218 mile paint pot." Nearly half a million tourists yearly crowd facilities in Northwestern Arizona's national-park area, yet are lost within the vastness of the canyon itself. Incredibly spired and terraced, the rocks do tricks with sunlight—breaking it into patterns of shadow and color across chasms 4 to 15 miles wide and over a mile deep.

The Innocent Farewell

By Jane Albrecht

IT WAS THE HAPPIEST TIME OF HIS LIFE. BORROWED HAPPINESS THAT HE WAS NEVER MEANT TO KEEP.

WE came to that town in the spring and rented a big house on the hill; the house was quite shabby and ordinary, but mother said it would do for a while and the rent was not high. The first thing we did was to take down the pictures of Roman ruins and the portrait of the fat little girl holding a rose which hung in the dining room. We put down our Oriental rugs, which mother always refused to store away with the rest of our belongings—which were very few—because she said you could do anything with a house if you had decent rugs, and we carefully packed up all the little lace doilies which had been laid upon the worn plush arms of the chairs. After that it was really a very pleasant place to live in. There were windows everywhere in that house, and the staircase was unexpectedly graceful. The kitchen was nice too. It had a wide porch which overlooked a small, bare yard, and in the exact center of the yard was a wonderful flowering crab which was just beginning to bloom when we came.

It was because of the house that we first met Pill. His father owned it. His name was really Joseph; it was my little brother who first called him Pill, and before long everybody called him that, even his mother and father. He was a shy, stammering child with a face in which poetry and irony might be mingled in time, but when we knew him it was merely pale and round and singularly without substance, because his brown eyes were as limpid as a puppy's and all his features were still soft and vague. His smile was the wide, fleeting smile of honesty and integrity, but it was a little crooked because two of his baby teeth were missing and the new ones had not grown in yet.

On the day that we moved into the house he had come hesitantly across the front lawn and stopped to watch our rugs being unloaded on the walk. After a while he went up to my mother, who was standing in an old sweater and skirt, supervising the men, and said:

"My name is Joseph. You have a little boy, don't you?"

"Yes," said my mother, smiling at him. "He's in the house, looking at his room."

"Is he older than me?"

"A little bit, I think," she said kindly.

"What grade is he in?"

"The fifth."

"Oh," said Pill. He added despondently, "I'm in the third."

Just then my little brother came running out. "I've got two windows!" he shouted. Then he stopped and looked at Pill.

"My father owns this house," said Pill. "I live next door. My name is Joseph."

For a moment my little brother did not say anything. Then he inquired cautiously, "Have you got a bicycle?"

"No," said Joseph.

"I don't either," said my brother, looking disappointed.

"B-but I've got a w-wagon," said Pill, beginning to stutter in the extremity of his desire to avoid the disaster which my brother's immediate indifference threatened.

"You do?" exclaimed my brother, his expression changing to one of incredulous delight.

Pill blushed; he seemed overwhelmed with pleasure. He nodded happily. "W-want me to s-show it to you?"

"Sure thing."

My brother forgot all about his room in the new house and my mother standing in the sun with her sleeves pushed up. His eyes were fixed intently upon Pill, who had a wagon. He had never had a bicycle or a wagon or a scooter or anything like that. "Well, let's go and look at it," he said, and he and Pill went across the lawn to where Pill lived.

An hour later our telephone rang for the first time, while mother and I were in the living room, and mother was saying, "Have you ever seen such ugly furniture in your life?" She answered the phone, and it was my brother calling importantly to say that he was staying at Pill's for lunch.

"Where?" asked my mother. "At whose?"

"At Pill's" repeated my brother. Then he explained casually, "That's what I've decided to call him. Joseph is too long."

"Pill," said my mother as she hung up the receiver. "That's what his name is now." She sighed and said, "I feel rather sorry for Pill."

"I feel sorry for Pill's wagon," I said. Then we both laughed and started taking down the pictures.

WELL, we lived in that house for a whole year, because we were waiting for my father to come back from Germany, and when he came we were going very far away. All during the spring and summer my little brother used to tell Pill about all the places we were going to as soon as my father came home, and Pill would listen as if my brother were telling him a fairy story. Afterward he would pick up a stone from the ground and see how far he could throw it and then he would inquire:

"But aren't you ever coming back here?"

"Heck, no," my brother would reply scornfully. "And I bet I could throw a stone farther than that."

The traveling hat wardrobe is based on the fashion of the crownless hat: 1—the burnt-straw wreath with flowers worn on top or next the face; 2—flower-and-ribbon-trimmed veiling for afternoon or evening.

3—The crownless navy straw circlet worn stark and simple, or with a glamorously tied veil; 4—the small green felt sailor with or without a veil, or slipped inside the navy straw brim.

GOOD TRAVELERS

Certain clothes, like certain people, look well in the process of travel. Others look as though they never should have left home. Especially in summer, the battle of wits is concerned with the conspiracy of wrinkling, wilting, soiling and falling into general disorder.

This summer fashion plays into the hands of the traveler. There hasn't been so much silk shantung for years, and it travels superbly well. A shantung suit in carbon blue, coffee brown, gray or green is perhaps the best of all starting points for a wardrobe—cool, pretty and reasonably uncrushable: spruced up easily with a boutonniere or a fresh, tissue-packed blouse. And if one shantung is good, two are even better—the second a casual or an afternoon dress, depending on where and how you are going.

Cottons and linens are to hot-weather travel what air conditioning is to a train. Add to your two shantungs at least two or three cottons chosen for travel . . . not transferred from the back yard! Shirtwaist dresses are good travelers in gray or brown chambray or shirting; suits in nonerush linen, seersucker or crisp striped twill—with cool straw skullcaps or bandeaux, straw or leather belts and bags. The bare-top dress with a jacket can ride out a journey or go to a party after arrival, with your best jewelry and afternoon sandals.

The fashion of the crownless hat, cool and packable, is the happy inspiration for a wardrobe of traveling hats—an idea with endless possibilities. The one sketched is designed by Lilly Dache, consists of four separate parts to be worn a dozen ways—upside down or inside out, singly or in pairs—all easily contained in one small box.

The SILVER LINING

BY WILLIAM ZUKERMAN

William Zukerman is a member of the editorial staff of the Jewish Morning Journal, of New York. As chief European correspondent for this newspaper from 1920 to 1941, he has lived and worked in England, France and Germany, and has traveled widely throughout Europe.

OBSERVERS of the contemporary scene have noticed for some time that disillusionment after World War II has come much sooner than after World War I. It took several years for the high hopes and idealistic expectations of the first world cataclysm to evaporate, but in the present conflict, disillusionment and depression seem to have come even before the "cease fire" order. There seems to be remarkably little enthusiasm and hope among men and women everywhere for the emergence of a new and better world as a result of humanity's greatest sacrifice, although the military victory of World War II is as complete as ever known.

This is true of most people, but more so of the Jews. Jewish people have come out of the war with a feeling of profound pessimism and loss of faith in humanity bordering on despair. The prevailing opinion is that Hitler has won his war against the Jews, even if he lost it against everyone else. He succeeded in poisoning the minds and souls of non-Jewish people with anti-Semitism for centuries to come. A conviction is spreading that there is no future for the Jews in Europe, or in fact anywhere else among Gentiles, and that the only solution for the Jews is in escape from the Christian world and in slamming the door on it.

While this mood is understandable psychologically, it is not entirely justified by facts which have come to light since the end of the war. The truth is that the incredible Nazi atrocities which resulted in the deliberate destruction of more than five million Jews in the death factories and gas chambers were not the only manifestation of the non-Jewish world toward the Jews in Europe during the war. The bulk of the Christian population outside Germany not only did not collaborate with the Nazis in their mad campaign against the Jews, but looked upon it with the greatest abhorrence and often fought against it with greater zeal than against any other Nazi crime. There was more opposition to and sabotage of the Nazi anti-Jewish laws than of any other decrees. Everywhere in Europe Jews were helped to escape Nazi persecution and deportation: they were hidden for months and years in non-Jewish homes. Jewish children by the thousands were adopted into Christian families. Christian churches, monasteries and other institutions were thrown open to them for refuge: special societies and organizations were formed to help them escape from the Nazis, and thousands did escape. The remarkable fact is that in the midst of the greatest upsurge of anti-Jewish persecution in history, a strong pro-Jewish, even philo-Semitic, movement sprang up and countered the anti-Semitic horrors. The darkest cloud in modern history was not without its silver lining.

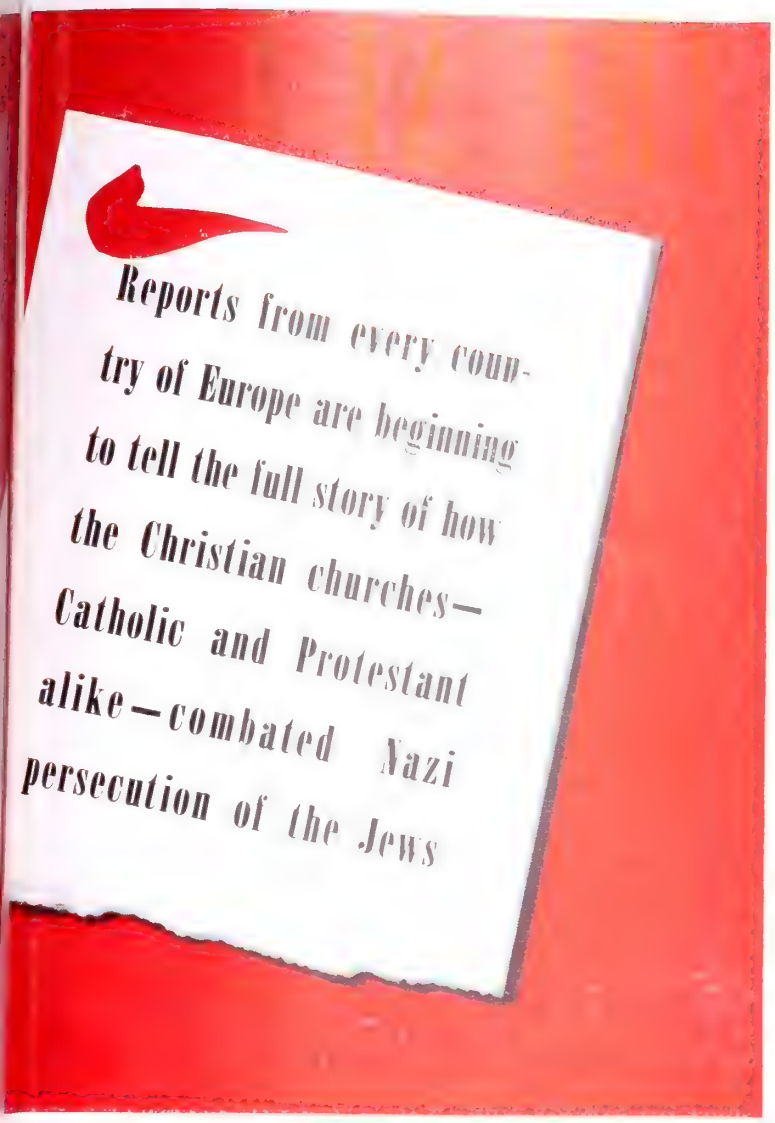
ONE fact stands out above all others. This is the decidedly moral and religious character of the manifestation. That is not to imply that the movement had no political aspects, motives and results. Quite the contrary: it was, in many countries, an integral part of the Underground. The Nazis had so closely connected their general ideology with intense anti-Semitism that, to many people, fighting Nazi persecution of the Jews became a way of fighting Nazism as a whole. Yet the rescue work of the Jews had a tinge of religiosity about it, making it different from the political anti-Nazi movement. This was expressed in many ways. The most outstanding were: the leadership assumed by the Christian clergy of all denominations; the prominent part played by women; and the nonpartisan, nonclass character of the men and women drawn into this work.

Of the entire, amazing story, doubtless the most striking feature is the leadership of the churches. No sooner did the Nazis invade a country and introduce anti-Jewish laws than the Christian churches immediately raised protests. In Holland, when the Nazis set up the first racial laws in 1940, Protestant ministers countered with sermons urging the people not to obey. This, together with the courageous stand of Leyden University, closing its doors in preference to providing separate benches for Jewish students, was the opening shot in the revolt of the Dutch against Nazism. Immediately all churches were thrown open to the Jews. Clandestine societies to help them were formed, and the movement which later grew to epic proportions was thus begun.

The Belgians followed suit in their own manner. When Jews of this country were ordered by the Nazis to wear yellow badges in the form of "Shields of David," sermons were preached to treat the yellow shield as a badge of honor. The result was that when a Jew appeared in the streets wearing the yellow insigne, Christians would take off their hats to show respect. Soon so many Belgians began to wear yellow badges that the law became useless.

In Norway the first anti-Jewish laws of the Nazis brought forth a pastoral letter by Bishop Eivand Bergrav, head of all the Protestant churches of that country. This famous pastoral letter had far-reaching results—not only nullifying the effects of the anti-Jewish laws, but serving as a signal fire for the formation of an unlawful committee to aid the Jews. Otto Nansen, son of the famous explorer, headed this committee.

OF all the clergies in Europe, that of France played the most illustrious role in this movement. The Catholic Church of France had at its head during the occupation several men of truly heroic stature. Among them were Cardinal Gerlier, of Lyons, and Archevêque Jules Saliege, bishop of Toulouse, together with a host of others of smaller rank but not smaller courage. It was due to the efforts of these men that mon-



Reports from every country of Europe are beginning to tell the full story of how the Christian churches—Catholic and Protestant alike—combated Nazi persecution of the Jews steries, abbeys, churches and Catholic children's homes were thrown pen to Jews, especially to Jewish children. They became sanctuaries ot only in France, but all over Europe, and the means of saving housands of Jewish lives.

Thus in Lyons, where several hundred boys and girls had taken efuge in such a church, the Laval government in July, 1942, demanded heir eviction. Cardinal Gerlier gave the order to barricade the church, nd sent word to the police that they would have to break into the uilding by force in order to take out the children. This the devout atholic police hesitated to do. Instead they sent inquiries to Paris for nstructions. Five days passed before a reply came to use force. By his time the Underground had removed all the children to safety.

It was also Cardinal Gerlier who, in August, 1944, defied the Gestapo when the Germans were retreating from France. The German orders were to leave no political prisoners or refugees alive. Several hundred men, mostly Jews, were incarcerated in the prison in the cardinal's district, doomed to be burned alive in their prison. The cardinal, dressed in the garb of his office and carrying a crucifix, walked to Gestapo headquarters and warned the chief officer that he would be held responsible, personally, for the death of the prisoners. The threat was effective and the men were saved.

Similar stories, confirmed by hundreds of eyewitnesses, have been reported of other churchmen of all nationalities. Père Banno, head of the Capuchin Order of Belgium, won fame for a task unique among churchmen. He conducted an office where false passports and documents were prepared to enable refugees, mostly Jewish, to escape to neutral countries and to Italy. It has been estimated that this man, alone, saved the lives of 1800 Jews.

In Namur another Catholic priest, l'Abbé Joseph André, organized the Refuge de Notre Dame, protecting the lives of hundreds of Jewish children of the neighborhood. In Louvain, Père Bruno, another priest, conducted a similar society. In Brussels the Abbé Corneille Depaissance was personally responsible for the saving of 563 Jewish children. Someday the names of these noble people will be more widely known, and their acts of heroism will shed a lustrous light on a very dark period of human history.

During the crucial months before the Allied occupation of Rome, the grounds of the Vatican, which by international law are neutral territory, were thrown open to Jews, and as many as 25,000 are known to have found refuge there. Scores of thousands of others were saved in Italy and in other countries by a device originated in the Vatican and known as "protective passports." These passports were issued freely by the Vatican and by papal nuncios in many countries to Jews, who were thus put under the protection of the Vatican and saved from deportation and destruction. The part of the Vatican in saving Jewish lives during the war has been officially recognized by the Jewish community of Rome in a special thanksgiving service there immediately after the liberation of that city, and later by the World Jewish Congress.

The role which the women of Europe played in rescuing the Jews was no less remarkable than that of the clergy. Their chief contribution was the adopting of children whose parents were deported, and caring for them as members of their own families. More than 100,000 boys and girls were thus adopted throughout Europe. These women were real heroines, for it requires more than a momentary impulse of generosity and courage to bring up a strange child as one's own for two, three and even four years at the constant risk of loss of freedom, even of life itself. Yet literally thousands of women did this.

One of these was Jeanne Daman, a Belgian girl now in her middle twenties. Her father was a school inspector in Brussels. Jeanne, fair-haired and pretty, was learning to be a teacher, helping out in a kindergarten in the early days of the war. In 1942 the Nazis began to deport Jews from Belgium. One day Gestapo agents arrived at Mlle. Daman's school and told her that three of her Jewish pupils were wanted by their mothers. The unsuspecting young teacher turned the children over to the Germans. None of the three was ever again seen alive. This experience changed Jeanne Daman's life. She became one of the most daring rescue workers in Belgium. It was her job to find out in advance whom the Gestapo had scheduled to be deported, and then to hide the victims. She continued this dangerous and difficult work for three years.

Jacob Pat, general secretary of the Jewish Labor Committee, a New York organization doing relief work in Europe, visited Brussels after the war's end and talked to Jeanne Daman about her difficult assignments. "Why did you do it?" he asked, and she told him:

"Because I could not do otherwise. When I realized that I had had a part in sending three small children to their death I could never rest. To save other Jewish children from what had happened to those three became the aim of my life. These children were the unhappiest among the unhappy. They needed my help and I had to give it."

Dr. Charles Odic, a distinguished French physician who spent several years in medical care of abandoned Jewish children in France during the occupation, says, "The Jewish child found as many mothers as there were French women to witness its distress. . . . Face to face with the Nazi crime against childhood, there arose a conspiracy of motherhood against it." It is Doctor Odic's conclusion that this was not a matter of reason or even of moral principle: it was simply an instinctive act called forth by the sight of the tragedy of the mothers and the helplessness of the children.

While the clergy and the women were the spearheads of this great rescue movement, the vast number engaged in it were from every class of society. The Queen Mother Elizabeth of Belgium and the royal families of Norway and Sweden took

FUN IN THE SUN . .

• THE SUN FURNISHES YOUR MAKE-UP BASE and gives you a choice of colors. But before you're ready to turn yourself skyward, experiment with several shades of foundation make-up to find your most becoming color. Is satiny beige better for you than a warm, honey brown? Does a deep, dark color bring out the blue of your eyes—or just give you a heavy, thick-skinned look? A critical eye and a brightly daylighted mirror will help you decide. • MAKE THE SUN YOUR CASUAL ACQUAINTANCE, not your closest friend! Sun-bathing is like oven-roasting: the more you turn, the more evenly browned. Choose your favorite sun-tan lotion, oil or cream, and apply it generously over all uncovered areas. Remember a double dose for your nose, eyelids, and the tender skin around the very edges of your bathing suit. You might try a combination insect-repellent and sun-tan lotion that offers an attractive fragrance for you—but one that scares away the bug population. Vinegar, and tea leaves diluted with warm water, are two more tanning aids. • Midmorning and midafternoon provide softer, more flattering sunrays than high noon. Intense, high-noon sun should definitely be viewed from the shade, at least for the first few days. Good sunglasses will ward off squint lines from eyestrain. Don't let the shortness of your holiday trick you into rushing into a tomato-red burn. First, it will hurt. Second, it may result in the uncute kind of freckles that take years to fade away! Doctors warn that (Continued on Page 187)

• TOWN-WISE HAIR-DO'S brush casual manes into trim, sleek ones. Flying feather cuts can convert to groomed coiffures with short, neat bangs. Shoulder-length hair can change into a cool up-do, neat chignon or a clever side bun. Try this: Brush all your hair to the back, side or top of your head. Catch the mane with a tight elastic band at the scalp. Secure the ends of your hair with a ribbon and roll over or under to the elastic band. Then tie a crisp bow. • PRETTY POLISHED HANDS are worn with immaculate cotton gloves. Wrist-length, hand-stitched ones are becoming to most any summer clothes. Two pairs, washed after each wearing, should last all summer long. • CITY LEGS wear real or synthetic "stockings"—but never go unadorned. An opaque leg make-up can be applied deftly in two minutes, using quick, long, upward strokes, beginning at your toes. After it dries, a little cornstarch or talcum rubbed briskly between the palms and over the surface of your legs will give them a silken sheen. • WELL-HEELED SHOES, highly polished and usually dark, take the place of saddle shoes and moccasins, which are as familiar to your home town as the corner drugstore, but unappreciated by sophisticated city streets. Open-toe shoes, worn without stockings, must show polished toes. • SUMMER BACKS, arms and shoulders sprinkled with a talcum-deodorant will help avoid the damp, hot meeting of clothes and skin. A WOMAN IS NEVER TOO OLD TO LOVE

—OR A MAN TOO OLD TO KNOW IT

Town will Talk

THEY lived in a small town in Ohio, not far from Columbus, where every road leads eventually into fields and brooks—a town with a quiet dignity all its own, proud of its college which it persisted in calling a "university." Lucinda Howarth, now in her seventies, was one of the early graduates, her diploma framed in the hall, an inveterate writer of letters to the papers, an opinionated old woman who sat, massive in black silk, on the platform at commencement and intimidated visiting speakers with her acid questions. But in 1942 she fell on an icy sidewalk on her way to a meeting of the NAACP in Columbus and had been confined to the lower rooms of her house ever since.

Nathanael Sumter was the retired president of the local bank, now in his eighties. His wife had been dead thirty years and most people in the town thought of him as a bachelor. He and Lucinda saw each other every day: he took Cracker, her old spaniel, for a walk and then came back for a cup of tea before the fire. He and Lucinda quarreled about everything from national politics to the diet of dogs and were quite sure that each could not live without the other.

"Of course without me," Lucinda said. "Nat Sumter would have ossified long ago. I prod his mind a little every afternoon. He's about reached the point now where he'll admit that Andrew Jackson was right in the bank crisis. By the time he's a hundred I may have got him up to the New Deal," and she laughed her loud, deep laugh.

[illegible] pendent on me, poor dear; she'd die of boredom without me.

On the coldest winter day when Nathanael shivered even at the draft from a closed window, he forced himself to go out, because Lucinda would be worried to death if I didn't stop in.

And Lucinda, for whom dressing her massive body became increasingly difficult, managed with the help of Mary, her colored maid, to get into a dressing gown and limp to the armchair. "I've got to bait Nat Sumter with this speech of Henry Wallace's," she said. "Must keep him alive somehow—[illegible] anger is good for the blood, you know, Mary."

"Yassum," Mary would say, "a good cry for a woman and a spell of anger for a man, them's the cure for some ailments."

She herself had found work to be the best cure for everything, and sometimes wondered what Miss Lucy would have been like if she had had to work for a living. Privately Mary thought it might have been a good thing. There was too much power in that frame for what life had given it to do. She should have had half a dozen boys to bring up—but of course she had scared all her suitors away with her strong will and her fire and her contempt for any weakness. More than one old man in the town held bitter memories of her "Don't be a fool!" when he had finally brought himself to the point of proposing. They had found comfort elsewhere, but Lucinda had gone her lonely, passionate way, pouring her energies and her love into such things as the NAACP (for Mary's sake) or the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals (for Cracker's).

But Lucinda never did get around to Wallace's speech on that cold February day.

"Nat Sumter, you look like the very devil," she said crossly when he was sitting by the fire. "What's wrong with you?" Just like Nat to look ill when she was spoiling for a good argument and had the ammunition safely tucked into the pocket of her dressing gown. For really he was pale. His hands trembled slightly on his cane; Lucinda hated all signs of old age.

"Well," he said, "I've had bad news, Lucy."

"Pour yourself tea, and tell me what it is."

SHE wondered if he had lost all his money, or what. He really did look shaken, and she noticed that he had dressed with less than his usual care. The handkerchief in his left breast pocket was crumpled, and there was actually a spot on his tie that looked very much like egg. Nat Sumter had always been a dandy, so these two small things showed that he must have been in a state of extreme agitation when he dressed.

He took an unconscionable time to pour a cup of tea and drank it down straight in one gulp.

Nat felt his courage go before Lucy's piercing stare. But it was now or never.

Friends and Lovers

DAVID BOSWORTH didn't guess the important thing that would happen to him when he accompanied his friend, George Fenton-Stevens, to Scotland on a tutoring holiday: a thing that would make him forget he had said women were a snare and a delusion. Here, on the island of Inchnamurren, he met the kindly Doctor MacIntyre. Here, too, he met Doctor MacIntyre's granddaughter, Penelope, and something happened immediately to both of them, something unnoticed by Penny Lorrimer's sisters, Betty and Moira, but not by her mother, who wasn't sure, then, that she liked Mr. Bosworth. And the something was so strong that later in the summer, when the holiday had ended, David had to work up a lame excuse for calling on Penny at her Edinburgh home.

Back in the dismal little house in London with his invalid father and his querulous sister Margaret, to await the opening of the fall term at Oxford, David despairs of succeeding at the Foreign Office without the all-important money and family. The dull weeks of waiting for Penny to come to the city as an art student at Slade School are brightened only by her endearing letters.

Then one day Penny is there before him on the station platform, saying, "Oh, David!" and the drabness and uncertainty of his life disappear. At Waterloo Place, David kisses her. Their cup is full, and Penny, in her joy, gives her sympathy generously to all the women they pass, who cannot have David walking beside them.

Art school now for Penny, and a looking ahead to each Sunday, the day she and David spend together, sometimes at Oxford, sometimes in the open country. By February she knows she is not growing as an artist, possibly because she can think of nothing but David. This despite the attempts of Lilian Marston, a fellow student, to interest Penny in some of the men students.

At Mrs. Fane's party, which she must attend to please her mother, and which she has had no chance to tell David about, Penny is rescued from strangers and boredom by George Fenton-Stevens, who had not noticed last summer at Inchnamurren how beautiful she is. And when Penny returns to Baker House, Residence for Women, that evening, David has been there for her and has been told she is at a party. Penny, trying to keep her voice even, asks, "Where did he go?" Then she walks slowly up the stairs.

III

Penny walked slowly up the stairs to her room, closed the door wearily, sat on the edge of her bed without turning on the light. She wondered where David had gone this evening. And she wouldn't see him tomorrow. He would not phone, either; she knew her David. Probably, at this very moment, he was trying not to think that she went to parties all the time and never told him. He wouldn't phone. That mention of the dance tonight would prevent him.

"Oh, David!" she said aloud. And blast Marston. Her way isn't my way, or David's.

She crossed to the window, trying to calm herself. After all, things could be explained in letters. And things could also be misunderstood. It suddenly appeared to her that a very small, very trivial incident could cause a lot of damage.

Gower Street was quiet now. London's Sunday sleep always seemed to begin here on Saturday evening. A few people hurried to keep a dinner engagement. Occasional taxis, some cars, but no more trucks or vans; an empty, lifeless street, a desolate street. And then a man came out of the darkness and halted under the lamppost at the corner almost opposite Baker House. It was David. Penny rapped on the glass sharply, but she was too high up for anyone in the street to hear. She had even forgotten to turn on the light, so that he could not have seen her. But she remembered these things only as she reached the hall, and scrawled her name in the out-until-eleven-thirty register. He will be gone, she told herself, and ran toward the door.

The sedate maid on hall duty stared at the slamming door. Well, reely, she thought, and opened the door curiously. She saw Miss Lorrimer running—running, mind you—across Gower Street, and heard the tearing screech of a taxi as it braked suddenly. The cabbie was kicking up no end of a fuss too. But by the time the taxi had begun to move again, Miss Lorrimer was nowhere to be seen. The maid shook her head disapprovingly and closed the door. A fine way to behave, giving people a turn like that. And for what? Just what in the whole wide world was worth that?

At first David thought Penny had been hit by the taxi. But in the next moment she was on the pavement (Continued on Page 80)

's voice trembled a little. "I'll explain to you some time why I was born and why I should live at all."

BIRTHDAYS. WEDDINGS. REUNIONS—

HERE YOU ARE.

Line a Day

By Ann Batchelder

1 Anything Bellamy Partridge writes is definitely—but definitely—up my alley. Now he, with his pal, Otto Bettmann, holds the mirror up to some bygone days and ways you shouldn't miss. As WE WERE—that's the book. And a treasure store is waiting for you.

2 From a beauty page of long, long ago: "An old lady without a wrinkle in her face is like a crystallized baby. She never grew up." Well, she grew old, and that's something.

3 Herb note: Baked tomatoes, stuffed, and the space between the tomatoes filled with bread crumbs, can take the merest whiff of garlic, along with the salt, sugar, pepper and sweet basil. A few crusts of bread rubbed with a cut clove of garlic will do the whole works.

4 Don't overdo the garlic treatment—ever. Folks who do give it a bad name. It belongs in a green salad rubbing the bowl is better than none). It goes with a lot of meat dishes (leg of lamb or broiled steak, for instance); it's wonderful between slices of French bread made hot in the oven. It has no business in an apple pandowdy.

5 Know what we did? Fried a lot of finger-size potato croquettes and strung them along on French-fried-onion rings. Sort of hot-dog style. Smash hit with all.

6 When you can't think of a single thing to serve for dessert, crush up a can of fine figs. Beat them into a pint of cream whipped very stiff and flavored with almond. Chill, serve in a bowl that has been lined with ladyfingers. Sweet—but more than delicious.

7 News items: Italy comes through, at long last, with those marvelous baked figs, stuffed with almonds and rolled in caraway seeds. Packed in baskets. And sunny Italy also sends along her unique fruitcake, flat, but flat, and dusted with sugar and clove. And just to get away from sweets, there are the little hot pep[pers] vinegar. Food shops are beginning to be interesting again.

8 More news: Not for a long time have you found crayfish bisque, pâté of shrimp, shrimp bisque—all out of old New Orleans. You'll find them [here]. And you'll love them.

9 Broiled lobster may not be on your menu every day; but if and when it is, stuff it with fresh crab meat (frozen, you know, if the crab is elusive), baptize with seasoned cream and broil. Now it's the crab meat that does it. It's the cream that perfects it. The eating is a dream.

10 Will anyone who likes tripe raise her right hand? My, I wouldn't have thought it. Wash a pound of the honeycomb, put it on in cold water and simmer away until tender. Takes quite a while, and worth it to those who really like tripe.

11 Second lesson: Make a thin batter of milk, eggs, flour, a little baking powder and a speck of red pepper. A speck. Drain the tripe, cut into finger strips or larger, dip in the batter and fry in deep fat. Serve with some very tart sauce, pickles, a big salad. (Boiled potatoes are classic.)

12 For a broiled fish (and trout and pompano are on my mind), try little rosy-cheeked tomatoes stuffed with a julienne of cucumbers in sour-cream dressing, all on crisp lettuce hearts. (Was there ever a fish like pompano? The answer is, "One, that's trout.")

13 A vision and a dream: Prepare a set of sweetbreads; when trimmed, demembraned and chilled, chop them fine. Make a rich cream sauce. Add the sweetbreads. Season well with salt, pepper and paprika. Add a few chopped ripe olives, a finely cut cooked chicken liver or two, a cup of sautéed mushrooms and two or three sliced truffles. Cook in the double boiler. Beat and serve on breaded breasts of chicken done in deep fat.

14 That is a superb sauce. It's as original as a Lilly Dache hat. It requires the utmost finesse. It may repay better than stock in a gold mine. Because it is a tour de force. A gold mine may be one of Nature's old horselaughs.

15 Know about a fine coverall for hamburger and allied hot sandwiches? Take some mayonnaise, add a good spicing of chutney (ground very fine), a little curry, and salt and paprika to taste. That will keep them guessing. Also eating.

16 The iced tea and coffee season is right around the corner. So make very thin toast, spread liberally with butter or margarine, sprinkle with cinnamon, cover with thin slices of Swiss cheese, put together à la sandwich. To be very chi-chi, spread the cheese with honey butter. Toast again in the oven. Serve very hot.

INHERITANCE JUDITH SMITH, AGED ONE YEAR

Forget-me-nots shall blossom here
Where ends the life span of a year.
No flaming flowers of arrogance
Shall be for you, Inheritance.

Only the butterflies will come
To hover over your last home.
No thing of pomp and circumstance
Belongs to you, Inheritance:

Save when dusk falls, a tiny star
Will rise to tell us where you are.

17 I tell you that smoked cheese with prepared mustard and a little pat on the head of chutney, spread on pumpernickel, is far from being despised. In fact, it rates special mention.

18 So much for the sandwich plate. I mustn't spoil you. Now then: three things men like—and women too. Clam chowder made with salt pork and lots of clams. Little rock lobsters with water cress and chives. Chicken pie with enough gravy and hot biscuits. (Add Jiggs' favorite: corned beef and cabbage.) A girl who can perfect these is ripe for the altar and won't be alone long.

19 Strive for perfection. Rembrandt did, and see where he got. A dish of macaroni and meat balls can be a poem. A rasher of bacon and a fried egg can make the mouth water. See that it does. Accomplishment is all.

20 Little new potatoes are boiled or steamed in their jackets. When tender, peel them. Put in the frying pan with sweet butter, season with salt, pepper and a little thyme. Toss and roll them until light brown. Wonderful with chicken.

21 Rice pudding has received more sneers than an old maid in a dolman. But—wait a minute. As it cooks (use brown rice if gettable), add a cup of seedless raisins, mixed with a quarter of a cup of brown sugar, a teaspoon of vanilla and a little heavy cream. Stir well to mix.

22 Now another chapter: When it's done, spread the top with vanilla-flavored whipped cream, cover with brown sugar and run under the broiler. Serve hot or cold. Wonders will never cease!

23 From an old cookbook: "It cannot be denied, I think, that in our cuisine we could dispense with the lowly codfish. Only one way is it destined to receive popular acclaim—in fish balls. Even these are not often seen save on the more common tables." Let the cod go back where it came from.

24 More and more I am becoming sold on fried parsley. To garnish fish and chicken it is fine. And this from me—who has had plenty to say about parsley!

25 Broiled eggplant is next to fried eggplant so far as I am concerned. And the finishing touch to the broiled variety is a nice smearing with lemon butter just before it goes to the table. Just discovered this, so pass it along.

26 A melon cup that rises to spectacular heights is this: Mix small melon balls with cubes of preserved watermelon in the sirup of the watermelon cooked with a little mint. Garnish with candied mint leaves and minted cherries. Can't you just see it? Wait till you eat it. Have it chilled.

27 Celery and cucumbers may seem like odd bedfellows, but try them just the same. Peel a fine cucumber, remove seeds and dice; add two cups of inside celery, chopped reasonably fine. Cook them in salted water, adding a teaspoon of sugar. When tender, drain. Put in a saucepan, sprinkle with a little flour, add a good piece of butter or margarine and, gradually, a cup of heavy cream. Stir every minute. Season with salt and pepper. Serve with sippets of toast. Lovely for luncheon with fish or chicken.

28 Fried green peppers garnish the lamb-chop platter, or do an act all by themselves. Take out the seeds (ever chew a pepper seed?), cut into six or eight pieces and fry in a little hot salad oil until tender. Season with salt and pepper and oh, so little garlic. But garlic. Drain them on paper. Very worthy of your attention, if I may say so.

29 Keep your eye out for tangerine juice. Comes in cans. Delicious. As good for you as it is good to taste. And besides, it's a lovely color.

30 June, the month of roses and brides—and what are your plans for the summer? Mine include a certain paint job, and it isn't a landscape or a portrait either. Well, you guessed it, didn't you? Shows how good you are at guessing!

beside him, laughing as if she had not even noticed.

"Penny," he said roughly, and caught her arm. Then he kissed her.

The taxi driver leaned forward to add his comment. David turned to the man with an ugly look on his face, but Penny said, "Please, David," and her hand on his arm pulled him gently toward her. For a moment he hesitated, then he took her arm firmly through his and they walked away.

"It was my fault," she was saying in a very subdued way for Penny. "But I didn't see him. I didn't see anything except you. And I was so afraid that you might have disappeared."

It was difficult, David thought, to be very polite, charming and just a little diffident. That was what he had intended to be. But it was no use indulging in even a minor form of sulking with Penny. Remembering, too, how he had felt in that moment when he was sure she had been hit, he halted, looked at her and then kissed her.

"Just to make sure you are really here," he said. "Sorry, darling, but you shouldn't be allowed out without a bodyguard."

Penny smiled and hugged his arm. Everything was all right again. She was with David, and there were at least three hours left to them before he had to catch that train. She would explain all about Marston and the Fanes. But not at the moment: at the moment, explanations would only seem like excuses. Later, once dinner had begun, she would tell him all about it.

They crossed over Tottenham Court Road, busy and garish with that early-Saturday-night feeling when women put on their smartest clothes and men have extra money in their pockets.

David looked at Penny with a smile: once they were inside Marinelli's, once he had ordered some food, he would tell her. All the excitement which had accompanied him to London on his train journey began to return.

Marinelli's was crowded as usual. As they climbed the narrow wooden steps, so tightly built against the yellow plaster wall with its hand-painted panels, David said, "There are three reasons why I like this place. First of all, no one stops talking even to bother looking at us. Secondly, we aren't expected to leave the minute we finish coffee. Marinelli would think something was wrong if his customers did not spend a couple of hours over dinner. And thirdly, I get you to myself." He paused, and the lightness went out of his voice. "At least, as much as I can get you to myself at present."

THEN he pretended to be very matter-of-fact in seeing that she was comfortably settled and that dinner was ordered. Chicken cacciatore tonight, he decided; tonight called for something more elaborate than spaghetti. The small table seemed a very complete island in a sea of disinterest. David stretched his hand across the white tablecloth, and gripped Penny's.

"Well, aren't you going to ask me why I came to London tonight, and could not come tomorrow?" he asked.

Penny, who had been wondering how to start her explanation about Mrs. Fane, looked startled. She should have asked that question long ago, but she had been so preoccupied with possible misunder ings, so relieved at having found hin all, that she had forgotten everythin

No one ever was logical in love. The last I want to do is to worry you, Penny, yet it seems as if I do. You see, darling, when I talked so wildly last Sunday it wasn't just of today that I was thinking. I was instinctively reaching toward tomorrow and all the other tomorrows. You've got to believe me, Penny." He looked at her anxiously.

She nodded. "Yes."

The waiter materialized from the other world, and produced a brilliant smile with the casserole of chicken. He set the salad before them with the vinegar and oil bottles, rearranged their glasses, and stood back to survey the effect. Too serious, he thought as he left them. What had young people to worry about?

"Let's not start blaming ourselves, Penny," David said. "It isn't our fault that we are faced with more problems than we bargained for. We've been led to believe all our lives that love is quite a simple formula: you are faithful, wait peacefully for marriage and the rest is a matter of living happily ever after. But it doesn't work out like that."

Penny gave a real smile this time. "Darling, just be patient with me. Just let me argue all this out for myself in my own mind. Actually, I don't see what a mind has to do with a heart, but seemingly the two sometimes work together. It can't be that I don't want you enough. It is just that a girl—oh, I don't know, but she's so influenced by her family and her surroundings and everything. Men are so much more free in their decisions."

"If you weren't afraid of hurting your family, you would do what you felt was right for yourself? Would you?" He tried to make his voice sound casual.

"Yes," Penny admitted slowly. "Yes."

David relaxed. It was the family. A man could deal with the barriers which a family had raised. He said, "I have even thought of giving up Oxford, of looking for a job, any job, anywhere. Now."

Penny shook her head. "Later, if things did not go well for you I'd always blame myself. I'd blame myself for having ruined your life."

David began to laugh. "Men don't ruin so easily. Not if their wives keep them happy. And that reminds me that I came here to celebrate a decision. You still haven't found out why I am in London tonight."

Penny studied his smiling face. "It is good news, anyway," she said. "What is it, David? It is good, isn't it?"

"I think so." He was trying to be noncommittal. "I have been deciding about this future job of mine."

Penny stared blankly. "I thought it was all decided. You were going to sit for the Foreign Office examinations after you finished with Oxford."

"I've changed my mind," he said briefly. "I had the offer of two jobs this week. I wanted to hear what you thought about them. Tomorrow I have to lunch with one of the men who are offering me a job."

"David, why did you change your mind?"

David didn't answer that. "The first job," he said, "is with an oil company. Abroad, of course, in some peculiar place with the temperature around one hundred and ten degrees. But they do give you comfortable quarters, and a princely salary. One thousand a year, flat, to start with."

"A thousand pounds?" Penny said incredulously. "David, that's terrific. But, darling, what do you know about oil?"

"Nothing. The oil firm is picking out two or three young men from the universities, and I happened to be one they thought of. That's all. What do you think of it?"

"Well, a thousand pounds is an awful lot of money," Penny said slowly. "What is the other job?"

"It is with John Fairbairn."

"The economist? The man who is interested in political things?"

"Yes." This time David smiled. "He has just bought the old Economic Outlook, and he is going to turn it into a weekly magazine dealing with politics here and abroad. He is especially interested in employment and unemployment. I'd be working on material for his report on seasonal unemployment, mostly, although I'd have a permanent job. Three hundred pounds a year. Reviewing and articles on the side would probably bring in another fifty pounds, perhaps even a hundred. How does it sound?"

"And after the report was finished?"

"I should then concentrate on political articles and reporting, perhaps with a chance to travel. That might be fun, Penny. There is also a definite rise in salary if I am any good. If not, I get chucked out on my ear. I am crowded."

"But, David, I don't quite understand." Penny was really perplexed. "In the Foreign Office, you'd get almost three hundred pounds a year to start with. The difference isn't so very much in salary, is it? And you never get chucked out there. Not unless you get all tangled up in some scandal. So why give up the F. O. idea and think of Fairbairn?"

"THERE is quite a difference in salary, actually," David said. "It costs twice or even three times as much to live as a diplomat as it does to live as a journalist. A diplomat has a semipublic kind of life; he has 'obligations.' Either he must have some small income of his own or he must wait for years before he can get married."

Penny said quickly, "Darling, I could look after you wonderfully on almost three hundred pounds a year. Honestly. All we want is a very small place, two rooms even. I can learn to cook. And this year I've discovered how to save money on clothes. We don't need much if we have each other. We could manage."

"There would be something rather hothouse about us if we couldn't manage on almost four hundred a year," David agreed. "But not attached to something like the F. O., I'm afraid. We'd be up against something there—a competition which I won't join, frankly. There's a scale of living attached to jobs like that which is really crippling."

Penny laughed suddenly. "I've got your point. A man can face money worries by himself. But with a wife—well, there are other wives. What if that wouldn't worry me? What if I'd take them all on, and say, 'I don't give a herring's leg whether you have a maid, a fur coat, a Paris hat or an Alix dress'? Really, David!" She shook her head and smiled.

But he didn't smile. "It would be much more like having stewed sausages three nights in a row to make up for one evening of decent food and wine for a dinner party. No thank you, darling. I won't play that game. Now let's forget it. I've buried the

When you buy Apex Quality, you expect the superb ease of operation, the life-long dependability, the smart styling that have been a part of the Apex tradition of leadership for 34 years. But most important is the exclusive way an Apex will gently, safely, thoroughly cleanse all your washables. And—after all—isn't this what you really want?

Apex Washers get all fabrics CLEAN

. . . THE SPIRAL DASHER DOES IT!

The unique cleansing action of the patented Apex Spiral Dasher is equally effective for full loads of the worst-soiled clothes and—at the low-water level indicated by the exclusive Apex silk line—for gently sudsing handfuls of the most delicate fabrics. Its cleansing is faster, too—less washing time, less fabric wear!

THE THOROUGH DAMP DRYING of the Apex soft-roll wringer completes cleansing, leaves clothes ready for freshening line-drying. Finger-tip pressure selector gives just the right pressure for each fabric. Feather-touch safety release acts instantaneously.

EXTRA YEARS OF SERVICE are assured by the exclusive Apex free-running gear mechanism. Its design permits independent operation of wringer and Spiral Dasher without needless running of parts not in use. All parts are precision-made, sealed in a lifetime bath of oil.

YOU CAN SEE a new Apex washer at leading appliance stores in your vicinity. Ask for a demonstration of the Spiral Dasher. You'll see why more women than ever before are buying Apex.

were all a normal kind of life, as if they could go on living this way indefinitely. All pretending to be so gay, so unworried, so intelligent or so earnest.

Perhaps the main trouble, Penny thought as she undressed, is that we try to be independent creatures, and we are not. We are dependent on others. And mostly, if we would only be honest enough to admit it, we are dependent on men. They give us the balance that we need.

Last year she had thought of her future mainly as a career of painting, with her family and friends and some rather attractive men—perhaps even one man in particular—forming an interesting background. But now she thought about David more than she thought about herself. It was his career which now worried and excited her. "Oh, David," she suddenly said aloud, and the darkness and silence magnified the emotion in her voice.

She lay thinking about David, about all the things he had told her tonight. No wonder she had forgotten to tell him about the Fanes' party. That had been a small incident, a trivial one; she probably would never see or hear from them again. She fell asleep, thinking of much more important things.

Mrs. Pillington's Lodgings, where David had found rooms for his final year, were in a row of gray stone houses, sharp-gabled, small-windowed, in one of those deceptive Oxford lanes which slip away from the street, twist over rounded cobblestones, promise a short cut to the unsuspecting stranger, and then bring him up against high stone walls.

Today was the last day of February, complete with gray sky and a feeling of dampness hanging in the raw air. Mrs. Pillington had gone out into the small back garden to see what damage the heavy rain had done that morning. She was bending over one of the narrow flower beds, quite unconscious that her Mr. Bosworth was watching her from his high window. He was waiting for Fenton-Stevens to come round.

> Few things help an individual more than to place responsibility upon him, and to let him know that you trust him.

A movement from the garden below caught David's eye, and he watched Mrs. Pillington as she suddenly straightened her back and hurried down the muddy path to the house. That must have been George arriving.

David turned away from the window and opened the door. He heard George's voice mix with Mrs. Pillington's down in the narrow hall, and then the leisurely footsteps mounting the stairs. They had not seen much of each other this year. That was the difficult thing in friendship: two people who got on well enough together, however different they were, could have very different sets of acquaintances which tended to separate them. Yet George's broad grin, his easy way of strolling into David's sitting room, his casual greeting, all proved he certainly did not feel a stranger.

"SORRY I'm late, old boy," he said cheerfully, stretching his legs over the hearthrug and reaching for the pipe in his pocket.

"That's all right. I had some odds and ends of work to clear up. You look thirsty."

George's face was still a deep red in color. "I am." He looked at David more critically. "You aren't playing enough squash this term." He frowned toward the desk: too many books and papers. There was a large photograph too. His interest quickened.

"Oh, I get a game when I need it. I've been doing a lot of walking instead. I like fresh air."

"I've seen you several times in the distance, keeping up with old Chaundler." George smiled broadly. "What do you talk about when you are tearing along beside him? About his book?"

"No, not about his book. Walter doesn't talk much about himself, ever." He paused, and then as George was still waiting he added, on impulse, "We've been talking a good deal about the possibilities after June is over, and what I should do."

"I thought you had decided that lor turned away from the desk he was being interested, in his charming way, in the room.

"You've made yourself comfortable here, haven't you?" George asked, and David agreed. The room might be shabby, but there were a decent-sized desk and an adequate bookcase, a fire which burned brightly without smoking, good light from a window which overlooked treetops and the peace of many gardens.

"When I came round here," George said, "I had the idea of asking you to lunch on Sunday." He looked toward the photograph and smiled. "Can that be managed?"

"I'm afraid not," David said definitely.

"That is what I expected. Fane said that was your day for wenching."

"What does he know about it?"

"Oh, he has seen you regularly at the George, I believe. He remembered that detail toward the end of his party. He knew he had seen Penelope somewhere, and kept trying to remember. Then suddenly, 'So that's who she was!' His mother seemed quite amazed. I think Eleanor was too."

"What on earth are you talking about?"

"This invitation to luncheon. It is a command performance, really. Eleanor telephoned today to say that she and Carol Fane were coming up here next week end. She wanted to see you particularly."

"I'm sorry," David said with no disappointment at all, "but I'm afraid I am engaged for all this week end."

They both laughed, and George said, "If you ask me, Eleanor only had her competitive instinct aroused by seeing Penelope."

"Did they meet?"

"Not actually. But they saw each other. Penelope said she was in a frightful hurry and couldn't meet Eleanor. Didn't seem to notice her at all. Very remote, I thought. But some people are like that."

"Yes," David agreed, but he was grinning widely. Some people are like that, but not Penelope. He was delighted; his vanity was ridiculously flattered. For Penny knew about Eleanor Fenton-Stevens. He had told her, and she had never brought up the subject again. And that was a sign, he had thought, that Penny really practiced the peculiar belief she had—that jealousy was stupid, unnecessary and crippling. It had often given him a sense of guilt when he was going through one of his bad spasms. It did not seem natural to be so completely unpossessive as Penny seemed to be. But then women, as he was discovering, thought about love in such a different way from men.

Now, at this moment, as George's politely surprised voice still echoed in his mind, David knew that Penny had her own way of acknowledging jealousy. He was pleased out of all proportion to the size of this crumb of comfort.

George watched his friend's face thoughtfully. He is far gone, George thought, with a mixture of amazement and worry.

"Well," he said, and he was not referring to Eleanor's party, "I see that is that."

"Yes," David said. "That's that."

"Look, old man, I'd like to meet Penny. Properly. I hardly know her. After all——" He halted in embarrassment.

"After all, what?" David asked bluntly. He was smiling, but there was a particularly keen look in his eye which was disconcerting.

"Oh, nothing. My thoughts ran away with my tongue. Even if I did think you were taking everything a little too seriously, it wouldn't have the least effect on you, would it?"

"You are absolutely right."

George laughed. "Well, at least when I do meet her again, I'll have enough sense not to ask her out to dinner."

"You are right there too."

George hid his surprise, but it remained with him after they had begun to talk about other things: odd fellow, David, and likable. But he wasn't normal: falling heavily in love, wanting to get married, giving up all idea of the F. O. Definitely not normal.

countryside had been washed by the February rains, brushed by the brisk winds as if Nature had determined to have a thorough spring cleaning. He ignored the newspaper beside him: it would be filled with further attempts to interpret and cover up the bad news which had trickled out of Germany all last week.

I refuse to be depressed today, David thought. Today's my holiday from work and worry. Today's the day I enjoy myself. In three hours' time I'll be seeing Penny.

He slipped the small volume of Religio Medici back into his pocket. He had brought the book with him as a matter of habit. Probably he had never meant to read it, anyway. How strange we are, he thought: we buy, out of habit, newspapers which we don't even open, and we cart along a book with us and then ignore it, as if it took a little time for us to persuade ourselves to be completely lazy.

It was pleasant to see the green fields go wheeling past, to watch the white clouds scattering over the cold blue sky in the March wind, to catch the color of primroses under the hawthorn hedges with their sprinkling of pale green. Each mile nearer to Penny made him feel that everything he saw was enchanting. Even a gasworks and a row of smoking chimneys would be enjoyed when he was in this mood.

He went over the calculations he had made last night. Finals were in June, and the thought of them was not unpleasant—a strange realization. Last year one had thought of Finals and had felt a mixture of worry and dislike for June of 1933. Now he wished that June came in April. For after the Finals came the job with Fairbairn. Four hundred a year, with luck and some work. Thirty-three pounds, roughly, each month. He could live on almost a third of that. He'd have to. June, July, August. Sixty pounds. Could you furnish two rooms with that? He would make a good try, anyway. A place of our own, he thought. No more lodgings, or college rooms, or a Cory's Walk where his sister Margaret appropriated his room for her awful female friends. A place of their own—that had the right sound. Four walls to enclose your own corner of happiness. No more regulations cutting short the time that Penny and he could spend together. No more interference from anyone.

He laughed suddenly. Marriage, as he was picturing it, sounded like freedom. Perhaps that was the way you should think of it: if it weren't freedom to be with each other, then you shouldn't even think of marriage. For a moment he imagined what witticism Fenton-Stevens or some of the other men he knew would think up if they heard him talk like this. He was thinking that he had found a very simple truth, and that many a very clever man had never found it; for you can't track down truth with words, or analyze it, or explain it. It is there, you feel it, and you accept it. It was as simple as that.

At Paddington, he jumped off the train before it came to a halt at the long platform. A porter shook his head resignedly. "That's wot we're 'ere for," he said to his mate, "to pick up the blooming pieces." But David was already halfway down the platform, heading toward the nearest telephone booth.

that fear that someday he would phone and then he would stand and listen to the explanation that Miss Lorrimer was out and had left no message. He couldn't know that she had been lounging beside the telephone in Baker House for the last ten minutes.

"I'll see you in another hour and a half," David said. "I'm on my way now to see father. Meet me for lunch at the usual place?"

"At the Brasserie? But that means you will have to come all the way into town again. David, why don't I meet you at Hammersmith? That would save a lot of time, wouldn't it? And you won't have to rush away from your father. Really, David, I shan't get lost. I'll wear a red carnation so you will know me." And my new spring suit: how will he like it?

There was a short pause as David considered this only sensible suggestion. Then he said, "I love you, darling." And he meant it.

"David!"

"It is all right, darling. The girl at the exchange wouldn't dream of listening in. Would you, exchange?"

A man's deep voice said, "I'm being completely ladylike."

There was a moment's silence, and then Penny's laughter.

"In that case," David went on, "I repeat I love you and send a hundred kisses. I'll add another hundred when I see you. What about Hampton Court for that? That's a good place for talking too. I've been deciding a lot of things. I hope you'll like them. Keep thinking of September."

"September?"

"Yes, a wonderful month. Best month in the year. Good-by, darling. See you in an hour and twenty-eight minutes. At Hammersmith, Piccadilly side. We'll find lunch somewhere around there. Good-by, darling."

He came out of the bright red booth, and stood for a moment watching the crowd, a mass of hurrying people in Sunday clothes struggling toward the trains that would take them out into the country for the day. He felt the movement and stir around him, but he saw and heard nothing. He was thinking, It is ridiculous that anyone could be as happy as this at this moment. But he was.

David's father was alone in the house. He was sitting in his wheel chair at the window, but he had been reading the Observer's editorial so attentively that he had not seen David coming along Cory's Walk.

David noticed the untidied room, the sandwiches wrapped in a napkin on a plate, and the vacuum of tea placed beside them on the small table. He greeted his father affectionately. "Where's Meg?" he asked.

"At communion. Then she is lunching with Miss Rawson, and they are going to some choral society's concert. She will be home by five o'clock."

"I see," David said, but he looked worriedly at his father. "Well, how have you been?" He had to admit that his father seemed stronger today. There was an alert, almost vigorous look on his face.

"Well enough." Mr. Bosworth held up the newspaper. "There's been enough happening since last Monday to excite a man. What do you think of it all, David?"

David glanced at the restrained columns, tucked away into the middle of the paper as if to lessen their importance. "Disturbing," he said lamely. He had been worried by the news of the Reichstag fire this week, but there

The conquest of CANCER is progressing.

Last year medical science saved the lives of thousands of cancer patients, and many more might have been saved if cancer had been discovered early.

Chances of cure are best when cancer is treated in the early stages. To detect early cases, there are 3 things every one should know!

1 What are the "Danger Signals" that may mean Cancer?

They are: 1. Any unusual lump or thickening, especially in the breast. 2. Any irregular or unexplained bleeding. 3. A sore that does not heal, particularly about the mouth, tongue, or lips. 4. Any changes in the color or size of a mole or wart. 5. Loss of appetite or continued unexplained indigestion. 6. Any persistent changes in elimination.

2 What should you do when warnings appear?

Get medical advice at once! The "danger signals" show that something is wrong, but they are not sure signs of cancer. At one leading clinic nearly 9 out of every 10 women who came for examination because they recognized the warnings did not have the disease!

3 Why are annual physical checkups important?

Cancer often starts without any warning signals that the patient can detect. Only examination by a skilled physician may discover these "silent" cancers in their early stages. That is why annual medical examinations are so important, especially for older people.

There is progress in cancer research, too!

Today, more and more people are living to older ages when cancer is most prevalent. Cancer still ranks second among the causes of death, but medical science is continually increasing its knowledge of the disease, and working to develop new and better techniques for its control.

While specialists say that the best means known for treating cancer is complete removal by surgery, or complete destruction by X-rays or radium rays, experiments with other methods are constantly going forward. Atomic research has provided valuable new materials for laboratory study of cancer cells. Clinical research and intensive studies in chemistry, biology, and

I do believe you've seen more of your ndon this winter than in all the other years of your life put together," his father remarked. "You weren't ever much of a sight-seer." He looked at David with open amusement.

David had flushed, and then he laughed too. Now it was a case of either walking through Sunday crowds past closed shops - and that was grim - or of "sight-seeing," as his father called it, or of visiting one restaurant after another. A limited choice.

"You had better leave soon," his father suggested.

"I'll give Penny a ring, and tell her to come over. There are plenty of days for Hampton Court." After the Finals are over, David added to himself; this would have to be his last visit to town this term. No time to travel to London, unless his work went miraculously well.

His father's face saddened.

"Now what was that?" David asked quickly.

"NOTHING," his father answered. How pleasant to be able to say you had plenty of days to go to Hampton Court or any other place. Plenty of days. . . . He half sighed. David started toward the door. "No, David," his father said sharply enough to halt him. "Not today. This is one of my grouchy days. I like your Penny and so I want her to like me. And I also want to read my newspapers, and compose a few speeches that I'd like to be able to make." He smiled. "Come away from that door, David," he said. "If you don't, I'll talk to you only about Germany."

David knew he meant that, too, so he came back to his chair. He said, "Well, let's have some family news. How is Margaret? She hasn't written very much recently."

"Margaret is concentrating on music at the moment," Mr. Bosworth said. He glanced half ruefully at the ceiling, toward the room upstairs. "Less scales, though, I must admit. And some new pieces too. She has been attending these afternoon classes quite regularly." His father considered for a moment. "Miss Rawson is coming to live here, once the Easter vacation is over. Margaret says you won't need your room after that. She says you are obviously going to marry Penelope Lorrimer as soon as you can."

David was silent. "Father," he said at last, "if you were me and mother had been Penny, wouldn't you?"

His father did not answer for some moments. He seemed almost as if he had forgotten the question. Then he said, "The conventional advice would be to say that you should wait. For two or three or even more years. Yet, honestly, I can't give that."

He glanced at his son. I am sorry for all these young men, he thought, for these young men and women. All planning the beginning of careers, some of them planning marriage. The door of life is open before them. But how long will it be before it is closed, perhaps closed violently and forever? None of them realize that, none of them know how little time they may have.

Mr. Bosworth said, "Frankly, I don't think you should wait any longer than is necessary. And it is for you and Penny to decide that. You know, when you are happily married, the years become shorter and shorter. Too short."

The newspapers slid off his lap, and David stooped to pick them up. He laid them on the small reading table beside his father's chair. He said nothing.

"Too short," his father repeated. "So have all the happiness you can before it is taken away from you. That was the chief lesson I learned in life." His voice was low, as if he were tiring. "And don't worry about Margaret. Someday, I hope, she will want to get married too. Then she will understand you and Penelope."

David pretended to be interested in the new books from the library which were on the reading table. "Has Margaret any men friends?"

"At the moment, she thinks us a bad lot." His father was smiling again.

"That sounds like an overdose of Rawson," David said.

"Better leave, David. Glad you came, but I'll see Penny another time," his father urged. He picked up the Sunday Times. "Now, let's see what we have here," he said.

David let himself be reassured, partly by the renewed vigor in his father's voice, partly by the determined look on his face. He apparently was not very worried about Margaret. But I am, David thought. Once his finals were over, he would deal with this Old-Man-of-the-Sea Rawson. Margaret would never have any chance for real happiness if she had her hanging around her neck. As he picked up his hat from the hall stand he stared at himself angrily in the mirror. Then he left the house quickly. He was angry with Margaret for worrying people like this; angry, too, that she should have left his father alone for the sake of some concert. But Meg would say, in that hurt tone which she affected so constantly nowadays, that a concert was just as important as spending a day with Penny, and why should he have all the fun anyway? By the time he reached Cory's Walk, and closed the little iron gate behind him, he was angry with himself too.

He turned to wave to his father, and then, hat in hand, strode down the Walk.

Suddenly David felt a hypocrite. Play-acting, he told himself savagely. All right, all right, he said under his breath. You were relieved that father didn't want you around, that you could have Penny to yourself today. He gave one last glance at the window. He would be late for Penny now. He set off at a steady run toward the tube station. That was one way of working off his anger.

> —DANIEL DEFOE.

The sharp March wind had driven most of the visitors to Hampton Court inside the palace. There they could wander comfortably through the halls and rooms which lay open, with all their ancient display, to the public.

But David, although he wore no coat, and Penny, in her new spring suit, did not seem to notice the wind. All they noticed, indeed, was the fact that Hampton Court was pleasantly uncrowded here. In this quiet corner of the gardens they could even feel alone. David slipped his arm around her waist as they paced slowly up and down between the hedges of yew, cleanly trimmed into patterns of neatness. Penny was thinking only about David's plans. By the telling, they were becoming their plans. There was warmth from his body and warmth from the hope in his words.

"Oh, David," Penny said suddenly, and caught his hand and pressed it to her side, so that his arm tightened around her waist. "So soon?" No more dreary months of loneliness, no more waiting and worrying, no more of this awful feeling of time slipping away, of living only for the future.

"It could not be too soon," he said. He was smiling, but his voice was strained, as if all the emotion inside him had made simple words almost too difficult to put together in a sentence.

He halted and they came to a stop. They were no longer smiling. They faced each other, gripping hands, feeling each other's emotion so intensely that happiness and pain were no longer distinguishable. The long moment passed, their hands dropped, and they began walking once more.

"I suppose most people would say we are insane," David said. But if this is insanity, then I never want to be sane. "That woman certainly would."

He looked with growing annoyance toward the stranger who had chosen to invade this small corner of the gardens and who was watching them in a frightened kind of a way. Never left alone, David thought bitterly. If it isn't relatives or friends it is a landlady or a strange female with a cold red nose pointed in our direction. Why c... she stare at the flower beds?

"Of course he does. He wouldn't mention you otherwise." Then she stared at him as her lighthearted remark led to a less pleasant idea.

David was following her train of thought. "Perhaps your mother doesn't approve," he said gently. "That would make things rather [illegible]."

Penny didn't answer.

"Impossible?" David asked.

"No," she said quickly, and tightened her hand in his. Then she seemed surprised at her own intensity. "No, David," she said with a warm smile, and the worry had left her eyes. "You see, I am in love."

David said, "I don't hear that often enough." He had kept his voice light, and his reward was a laugh from Penny. "Anyone looking at you, Penny, could tell why I love you. But why you love me is something hard to understand. So keep telling me, Penny, that you do. I need a lot of convincing about that. And why do you love me anyway? Why, Penny?" He put his arms around her and kissed her violently. He felt her body relax against his, and then heard the rush and scramble of many pairs of flat-heeled sensible shoes as a cohort of schoolgirls swept into the garden. A high-voiced, round-faced, undistinguishable little mob in navy coats, black stockings, and black hats with green-and-white bands. One of the [illegible] smirked patronizingly as she looked at Penny.

PENNY was laughing. "Their faces! Really, what funny little faces. At that moment anyway. Do them good, I think. One of them reminded me of my sister Moira."

"Then I'll never be an affectionate brother-in-law," David said. His good humor was beginning to be restored. "Which will keep you from having guilt about your feeling for Margaret."

"I wish she did find something to like in me," Penny said. "And I wish I could like her. It would make everything so much easier."

David didn't reply.

Outside the maze, a park keeper looked at them gloomily from under his peaked cap, and reminded them in the voice of doom it would soon be closed. Everyone, he pointedly, was leaving now.

"Oh, that's all right," David said c fully. "If we get lost we'll wait until come to fetch us." He grinned as the k did not seem at all cheered by such operation. "Don't worry about him," he Penny, as he took her arm and led her narrow lane of grass bordered by tall cl hedges. "All he wants is to get home t tea, or to have a pint of bitters. An couldn't leave here, in any case, until time to knock off duty. In any case, t the best time of the day. And it is wa here too. Even the wind finds it difficu reach the center of the maze."

YES, it is warmer," Penny agreed some surprise. Somehow, she hadn't ticed how cold it had been in the more gardens until she had felt the contra here. When she was with David, she r seemed to notice anything very much, ex what he said or how he looked.

"Temperature rising steadily." He h as they came to a block of hedge. "I this couldn't have been the right path all. Now, either we can start all over a or we can stay here. Or we could quite sibly walk a couple of miles and find selves back here. What do you think?

"I think we ought to save ourselves trouble," Penny said, smiling too. "Afte I suppose one path looks exactly like other."

"Or we could be very coy, and you c run away and we'd both get lost—you ning away, and I giving chase. That use be one of the chief sports here in earlier da Then David, watching her face, put all pretense of joking. His voice be serious. "Penny, darling." She said, in a low voice, intense in its esty, "Oh, David, I am so happy."

"I love you forever." He kissed her ag At this moment, holding her, knowing she loved him, he was happy too: the moment, he thought, that one is comple really, truly, safely happy. worry out of her eyes. He cursed himself for having let the disguise slip from his face, so she had seen too deeply into his real feelings. He thought: I'll not blackmail her with pity. I cannot go on like this. I cannot bear to leave you and yet not return. You, loving you and yet not daring—proof of your love." That was the easy way to win a girl: blackmail with pity, playing on her desire to have you happy as you want to be happy. And I'll not force her into anything, before she makes up her own mind. That was another easy way to win, and then, ultimately, to lose her. When she comes to me, he thought, she will come because she wants me. As I want her. And then I'll have her forever, not just for a year or two years.

"Forever," he said aloud.

Then the bell sounded the closing of the maze, breaking the moment with its harsh voice.

"A sense of humor," David said, as they retraced their steps, "is obviously a necessity in love. Otherwise, you'd become a solid chunk of frustration."

Penny nodded, busy with the technique of combing her hair, powdering her nose and looking into the small mirror of her handbag. She was thinking that the short distance to the entrance was considerably longer than they had imagined. By turning to the right, then to the right, and finally to the left, they discovered themselves in another blind alley of hedge.

"We ought to have brought a logarithm table with us," Penny said, trying not to laugh this time. "We could have worked it out by sine and cos. If one can find nonexistent lightships by sine and cos well enough to satisfy one's trigonometry teachers, one surely could find a gate which does exist."

In the end, the keeper had to come and fetch them. He was quite philosophic about it, as if he had expected any young man with good sense and a pretty girl to lose his way. And that little practical extra, slipped into his hand as the young man thanked him, would buy him an extra pint or two this evening; that was always a help to being philosophical.

They walked slowly back from the long dinner at Marinelli's to the green door in Gower Street.

"It won't be so long, now," David was saying. "Not so long before we do not need to say good-by any more." Or worry whether you will see her again, he thought, next week, or the week after, or ever.

"Do you really think I should bring mother to Oxford next Sunday? She could come some other time, when you are less busy."

"I think it would be a good idea. And quite apart from that, I want to see you. I can work like a stoat all week if I think I can see you on Sundays. I'll invite Chaundler to lunch that day too. He will assure your mother that I am perfectly respectable."

Penny smiled, and pressed his arm. She knew, as he had guessed, her mother's weakness for respectability. Someday, she thought, she was going to ask her mother what it was about people that she called "nice." As a standard, it did seem to vary. Take the Fanes, for instance. Mrs. Lorrimer called them a nice family. They had nice accents, nice clothes, a nice house and a nice income. Yet, as a family, they were a mockery, and as individuals they were selfish and cheap. Mr. Fane was the only one who had any claim to reality for himself.

"I'm sorry for Mr. Fane," Penny said suddenly.

"Because he is the only one of the family whom you don't know? Perhaps if you met him, you'd feel less sorry."

"Well, if I were a man, and did the providing and got very little in return for my trouble—well ——"

"Well, what?" David was watching her with amusement.

"I don't know." She shook her head in bewilderment. "You see, I never thought of that aspect before. Frankly, David, I don't believe many women have thought about it; it just never enters their heads, somehow.

Either they learn it instinctively, and their husbands are happy and they find themselves with thoroughly successful homes, or they don't learn and no one ever told them, and they just don't think about it, do they?"

"I think you chose a pretty good example to generalize over," David said, his grin widening. "But how did the conversation take this turn? Have we just passed the Fanes' house?"

Penny looked in surprise at the number over the fanlight of the nearest house. "Why, yes, we must have passed it. And I could swear that I never noticed it. How short it seems when I'm walking with you, David. Last night, Marston and I went to see the Rene Clair film; and coming back, we walked up this street and we both agreed it was far too long. No street should be this length and look so much the same all the way. Yet, to-[illegible]"

"Go on, Penny, I like to hear this."

"Tonight," Penny said, "it is a short street, and interesting and gay and a wonderful place to walk in."

"But too short. Just as the hours are too short when we are together." He glanced at his watch. "We've been eight solid hours together, today. They seem less than two. Look; when we get married I'll have the days arranged into thirty-six hours, so that we'll have enough time to do all the things we want to do together. That would be pleasant."

"Wonderful."

"Wonderful too."

They both smiled, and holding each other's arm more tightly, with hands clasped and fingers interlocked, they walked toward the green door. David watched her walk up the steps which bridged the basement area, waved back to her, waited until the door had closed.

He imagined her, now, turning back to look at her room so carefully shut in from the world. Did she smile as she thought of him? Would she turn to her mirror and look, with amazement and pity, at the tears in the eyes and the smile on the lips which faced her there? Once she had written him about that. He could quote that passage of her letter by heart. It seemed as if she found the courage to say in letters what she wanted to say when she was with him.

The dark street was silent and desolate. The wind was colder. It came from the east, a hard sharp wind that needed the Atlantic to soften its bite.

Always walking away from her, he thought, always leaving her. Would there ever be an end to this? Ever an end to the loneliness that was more searching than any east wind?

MRS. LORRIMER sat in Penelope's bedroom watched her daughter arranging two teacups on an improvised tea table, and felt still more unhappy.

In Edinburgh it had been simple to work up a mood of righteous indignation: her daughter was living in luxury in London, taking a frivolous life for granted; her daughter, as return for such pampering, behaving with a ridiculous lack of common sense, perhaps even ruining her whole future. But now a good deal of Mrs. Lorrimer's indignation was turned against the room. It was not worth a third of the money spent on it. Penelope, accustomed to the Crescent and its comfort, must have been miserable here.

Yet she did not look unhapp[y] Lorrimer's annoyance increased. her every opportunity, and yet she is a place like this, Mrs. Lorrimer tho[ught] terly. We might just as well have b[een] up in a three-room-and-kitchen flat. of values whatever, if Mattie Fan[e] carried any truth.

Mrs. Lorrimer, watching the smile daughter's face, had to admit in spite determination to be critical that Pe[nny] was really becoming a most attractive woman.

"Why didn't you write and tell me this?" Mrs. Lorrimer gestured with temptuous arm as she looked aroun[d the] room.

"It would only have sounded like plaining," Penny said. "Besides, you w[ere] me to stay here. It was one of the cond[itions] attached to coming to London."

Some of China's most beautiful women live in the houseboats that swarm on the famous Yellow River. When a boatman has selected the girl he wishes to marry, he sends her a needle. If it comes back threaded, her answer is "Yes"!

Ukrainian peasants actually never propose at all! But if a fellow hangs around a girl's house for four weeks without receiving from her a cap knit with her own hands, he knows she isn't interested.

In Northern Italy, a youth who wishes to marry sends a pot of flowers to his sweetheart. If the match is agreeable with her, she waters the flowers daily. But if she has her eye on another man, she lets the flowers die!

When Edwin C. Hill, the commentator, first arrived in New York, he took a sight-seeing trip on the elevated. Across the aisle was a girl who caught his fancy. He moved over and began talking. At the city hall, they got off and bought the license.

A simple way to keep floors gleaming all year long

Homemakers by the thousands use Johnson's Wax in liquid form for cleaning and polishing all wood surfaces

Floor care needn't be a tiresome chore. If you follow this simple program, your wood floors will glow with mellow wax beauty the year around . . .

Just wax your wood floors two or three times a year. That's all you need do for most of your floor surfaces. Much-walked-on areas, such as doorways, may be protected with an extra coat of wax when necessary, without rewaxing the entire room. Then an occasional dusting with a dry mop keeps all your floors gleaming bright.

And the easy way to wax floors (furniture, too) is with Johnson's Liquid Wax . . . genuine wax in fluid form. You'll find it's wonderfully convenient to apply.

It's easy also to control the amount of liquid wax you use . . . easy to spread a thin, even film over floors, furniture or woodwork. And that makes for quicker buffing. Yes, it takes only a few minutes to polish to a sparkling, protective luster.

There's another special advantage in Johnson's Liquid Wax: It contains an active cleaning ingredient that loosens surface dirt. Stubborn grime wipes off as you apply the wax.

Johnson's Liquid Wax is actually a method of protective housekeeping. Its hard, glistening finish protects surfaces from spotting and marring. Dust doesn't stick to its smooth, dry film . . . dusting time is cut in half. Order Johnson's Liquid Wax TODAY.

Here's how to "dry clean" your floors

1. SPREAD a little Johnson's Liquid Wax over a small floor area. Rub in with cloth or applicator. A powerful cleaning agent mixed with the wax loosens dirt and grime. Let wax dry for 30 minutes.

2. BUFF with dry cloth or Johnson's Wax Electric Floor Polisher. Floor shines with a rich, waxed beauty . . . spotlessly clean . . . fully protected against dirt, wear, spilled things.

FOR VERY DIRTY FLOORS and heavy traffic areas around doors, do this: First apply Johnson's Liquid Wax to loosen dirt. Remove dirt with cloth. Apply more Liquid Wax and let dry. Then buff to a bright, shining beauty.

"We shall have dinner at my hotel," Mrs. Lorrimer told her. "I have a lot to talk to you about."

Penny looked worriedly at her mother. What on earth is wrong? she wondered for the fifth time that afternoon. Mrs. Lorrimer returned the look just as worriedly. Even the expert way in which Penelope poured tea and took charge of that ridiculous tea tray annoyed her.

"Is something wrong at home?" Penny was asking. "Is father ill again?"

"Don't be silly, Penelope. You talk as if your father were an invalid. We are all well and happy, a very happy family indeed. Except where you are concerned. You are the one we have been worrying about a good deal." There, it was said. Mrs. Lorrimer took a deep breath. This was not the approach she had intended. But the opening had suddenly come, and there it was—a beginning.

But Penelope seemed to be determined neither to understand nor to be helpful. She laughed. "Why, mother, look at me! Don't I look well? And I've never been so happy. Mother, I have the most wonderful news for you!" Penny halted her enthusiasm for a moment.

At the moment, her mother looked almost on the point of tears. Never been so happy . . . perhaps that had been a tactless remark. Penny hastened to explain it. "It is about David, mother; David Bosworth."

Mrs. Lorrimer almost dropped her teacup. She put it carefully down on the broad arm of her chair.

Penny was saying excitedly, "He wants to marry me. He will soon be going down from Oxford, and he has a job, a wonderful job, and we could get married this summer."

The teacup and saucer fell. Mrs. Lorrimer did not even notice it. It was Penny who picked up the pieces, noted the saucer was intact, but the cup's handle had snapped off, and wondered where she would find some rag to mop up the mess.

"Why did you hide this from us? What have you to hide?" Mrs. Lorrimer asked in sudden anger.

"Why, nothing." Penny was taken aback. Her delight in her news faded. Her voice became defensive again. "And we didn't hide anything purposely. I tried to tell you at Christmas that we were in love. I tried to tell you in my letters that I saw David. But you never seemed interested in anything I said about him."

"Isn't it customary for a young man to make himself known to the girl's family before he even mentions marriage?"

"David was going to write, and he was going to go up to Edinburgh to see father as soon as his finals were over. Don't you see, mother, he had to wait until things were more definite, until he could say to you and father ——"

"And I take it," Mrs. Lorrimer interrupted with withering scorn, "that you now count yourself engaged without the permission of your parents, without an engagement ring, without any announcement?"

"Well, you can't become formally engaged while you are still an undergraduate. At least, it isn't much approved. And you can't marry until you have finished your university career."

"I should think not," Mrs. Lorrimer said in an outraged voice. She paused for a moment to try to restrain her rising anger. She smoothed the skirt of her brown tweed suit, pulled at her beige chamois gloves, all with small broken gestures.

"But," Penny went on firmly, taking advantage of her mother's inability to speak, "that doesn't prevent men at Oxford from falling in love, or making up their minds to marry the first moment that is possible."

WITH THE CHILDREN

Please, mommy, treat me like company. I just broke one of your best glasses, but it was the same kind of a mistake a grown guest makes.

He is my very best uncle because he talks to me the same way he talks to father.

I'm glad I am a girl and not a boy, but I don't want to act like a lady until I have to.

—KATHRYN COFFEY GLENNON

There was no answer. Mrs. Lorrimer searching for her crisp linen handkerch her brown leather handbag. Her lips pinched and thin.

"Really, mother," Penny said indigna "this can't be so much of a shock. Fo thing, you knew that he wrote to me. A did mention him in my letters home a did ——"

"I never imagined for one moment things had gone so far. You are only a c Penelope, and you don't know how fool you are behaving. As for this David worth, we don't know his family, we know one thing about him. He might Catholic or a Communist or anything.'

"They don't often mix," Penny said smiled in spite of herself. "Actually, if feel any happier about it, he is Protes and Labour. And as for his family, he h sister who studies music and a father wh invalided out of the war. There's no insa no drunkenness, no divorces, no pr terms; nothing, in fact, that one migh ashamed of."

"There's no need to be facetious."

Penny took a deep breath. "Look, mot David and I had thought up a surpris you."

Mrs. Lorrimer looked at her daug almost wildly, as if to say that one surpr day of such proportions was enough.

"David would like to have us for lu next Sunday, at Oxford. Mr. Chaundler be there; you know h don't you? Grandfath friend. And once you re meet ——"

"Have you been g to Oxford to visit man?"

Penny's patience en suddenly. "You will on Sunday that there a lot of people trave to Oxford to spend day. A lot of girls What's wrong with tha

"And he has b coming to London in o to see you?"

"Of course. When p ple fall in love they w to see each other, don't they? Our bad l is that we get so little time together, w with geography and David's work and classes."

"It has got to be stopped." Mrs. Lo mer's voice was staccato.

Penny, who knew that tone and wha meant, half rose from her seat and then down again. She knew what was coming, a yet she couldn't believe it. It is now, thought; whatever and whoever I am to be, to be decided now. Her anger left her. had never felt so emotionless, so cal a strange feeling, as if she were stand apart from this scene watching everyth with critical coldness.

"You must give me your word," M Lorrimer was saying, "that you will see more of this David Bosworth. You are bo too young, the whole thing is folly, and if has any decency he will wait for four or fi years until you are old enough to know wh you are doing."

"I know what I am doing. Age isn't matter of years, mother. Some women forty are sixteen, mentally. My gran mother was married at eighteen. You we married when you were twenty. D that ——"

"You are to see no more of him, Penelope Mrs. Lorrimer told her. "He is not the kin of man we want you to marry. You w understand that for yourself in a few year I am only saying this for your own goo Penelope."

"And just what is my 'good'? What goo is there in anything if you are not happy? am the one, surely, to judge what I want, what I do not want out of life. It may not what you would want, if you were me. We all different ideas about happiness, so ho can we judge for each other? Moira's idea being happy would bore me to tears, but

and just get married tomorrow, that after all we couldn't wish the baby away. He looked at me just as cold then and said:

"'Okay, we'll get married tomorrow. But I want you to know one thing; I'll hate that little bastard when he grows up.'

"It hit me right in the heart. I hated him in that moment. I told him to get out and stay out, that I didn't want to marry him, that I'd take care of our child if he felt like that and a lot of other things. That's what pride and selfishness does to you. All I could think of was myself, not him, and how he felt, nor even the baby. He got up and walked out. Three days later I called him and asked him to come and see me. I asked him to marry me and he refused. He said that I'd shown him what a mean, spiteful girl I was and that our marriage would never work. Well, I just didn't believe him. I acted very meek, and I felt so sure he'd come back. I couldn't see how he could possibly go on without understanding that we'd started something we had a responsibility toward no matter how we might feel.

"He never did, of course. He was shipped out three months before little Johnny was born. Sometimes I think he would still have married me if he hadn't had to go overseas, but that's probably foolishness. After all, he came home and married another girl and he's never even tried to see me. Even now when I know in all reason that it would never have worked as a marriage, I get a sort of heartache. It doesn't help much, either, to have little Johnny look so much like him. That same curly hair, that cute grin. I suppose that's what they mean when they say that the woman pays. I wish I'd known enough to know that, no matter what, when you make love to a man you're putting your whole life into a few moments.

"Well, after John left I changed jobs and went to work on the night shift in a factory where nobody knew me and where I could wear a smock. Nobody knew at the factory and I worked until the night I went to the hospital. I worked so hard and refused to think so hard that I didn't really know what I was doing. Johnny's mother sent me $200—Johnny got pangs of conscience or something and told her about it just before he left. She was very kind, but she said she didn't want to interfere in John's life. I guess she was the weak type, too, but nice.

"I USED the money to get a good doctor and a good hospital room. I couldn't see any farther than the nose beyond my face then. When Johnny was born I felt so happy. I felt all my troubles were behind me. Nobody there knew I wasn't married: I told them my husband was overseas. And when I said it I smiled to myself because I was in that kind of mood where I was pretending he really was my husband.

"It smashed up on the third day. It was just like putting your elbow into a lemon-meringue pie. Plump, and the dream was over. A Nurse's Aide came into the room—I even had a semiprivate room—and said to me, 'My, you nearly caused a scandal when you came here. You were rushed in so fast and right up to the delivery room and we didn't have any records on you and we didn't locate them until the next morning, and so—we all decided you weren't really married, you'd been living in sin.'

"She laughed and I laughed and it was all very gay. Very gay. Except that inside me the bewilderment and pain was rising, and when she left the old, awesome nightmare question began working on me again: 'What am I going to do, what am I going to do, what am I going to do?' . . ."

Remember that there is nothing stable in human affairs: therefore avoid undue elation in prosperity, or undue depression in adversity.
—SOCRATES.

Katie was luckier than many unwed mothers. Few have a dream, or a friend, or money. True, some have their families with them, but psychiatrists say t girl who has a baby without marri likely to be a girl in search of a lov security she has never received fro parents. As for those girls who d their parents and friends about the ation, thousands doubtless mana protect their reputations, but it is nigh impossible for them to pu themselves, without help, from the of a pyschological nature. To a girl are sadly in need of sympathetic, h guidance. Their chances of gettin however, are a tossup, varying from munity to community. The first que they face is where and how to hav baby. In the main, maternity h provide the answer. There are som throughout the country; all are ru private agencies: some on modern work lines, some still in the days o Scarlet Letter, some on religious cies. Some began as foundling h others as refuges: two major chain Florence Crittenton homes and the vation Army homes; their homes the outgrowths of nineteenth-cen mission work with "lost" women. only recently that the birth of a ba an unmarried woman has been sidered as an economic, social emotional problem as well as a one, and the problem of the b future life as a separate individual sidered independently of his mot "mistake." And despite this change moralistic atmosphere of most mate homes is accentu by—as is true in so institutions curren a lack of skilled pe nel; and by the ancient quality of of the buildings th selves, set in iso areas, walled off, cloistered in confi tial secrecy. While homes recognize these handicaps are struggling to make their progr more flexible, their surroundings cheerful, their recreation more stim ting, many—however willing to give newest and best in medical care not accept modern social thought.

Katie bore her baby in the chil dream of a secure future. How inse it was she discovered the minute she to live in it—the minute she brough child "home" into it. Her days in a ternity home were ahead of her, a h that was not bad, not good, not typ nor, on the other hand, unusual; to however, to her bewildered but p spirit, it seemed a veritable prison.

"I TOLD the doctor about my situ after I saw I was helpless. He was kind he was sensible. He told the hos authorities—and the nurses got together gave me a layette. I hadn't a thing fo baby. Janie had been living with me she left Roger and she thought I was a She wouldn't let me bring any baby t home; she kept repeating flatly that I couldn't have a baby, and if I wanted t such an idiot not to come near her. couldn't help the way she felt. "It's hard for people who haven't through a social agency to realize how t seem to the people dependent on them know they have to make the decisi mostly, and that people like me haven't right to question them because they are h ful, but oh, it was so hard to learn that I

3. OUR FAMILY USES A LOT OF HOT WATER. But the Bendix doesn't. Thank Heaven! How that machine can wash and triple-rinse and do it with so little hot water simply amazes me.

4. I DON'T LIKE TO LIFT WET CLOTHES. Hoisting heavy, wet clothes up and over to get them out of a washer is my idea of a backache. I guess those Bendix engineers knew that too, so they put the porthole where it belongs—at basket level. I just push clothes in—and pull them out right into the basket.

5. I WAS "FROM MISSOURI" TOO. But when my Bendix dealer told me that 700,000 women have a Bendix and that the Bendix had been doing its job superbly for 9 years—that settled it. Wouldn't I have been silly to experiment with anything else!

just caught, and that the life you al- t take for granted you'll have some- gone, all washed up. Anyhow, the suggested I go to a maternity home some rest, and meanwhile they'd find ster home. A foster home is where a board herself and her baby, while she work.

ought I'd only be in the home a few had on a black dress and black suède when I arrived. The last thing I about bringing was working clothes. ency said rest, and I thought that's was going to do. I was so very tired. all of us had jobs. It was my job to he ward floor and the bathrooms. were about twenty-five girls there first went there; all of us sleeping in room. About ten of the girls were s. Some of the girls were nice, some amps, some were sick, some were very and there were four or five who were rty. One of them was a lovely woman, sterical. She used to say, 'Can you it? I'm a Sunday-school teacher. en to church all my life. How did this appen to me?' and then she'd cry.

first I didn't understand what all the ia was about out there. But I stayed about six weeks, and I got temper- al myself. The only word I ever heard getting out was now and again when I ggressive, the matron would say, , they are investigating your case. an't expect people to do everything for vernight.' It made me feel like a al. And a prisoner.

know now that anyone of us could have out of that place any time we wanted ut I didn't know it. We were all beaten. -even if we did get where would we go? ng out meant some- vanted you, and who ed us?

ne of the girls ran . She left her baby d—she couldn't have it with her even if she'd wanted to: the ry was guarded against us except at ng and bathing time. She walked about niles, I guess, in the snow, without a coat, use our coats were all in the storage room e we couldn't get at them. Finally she psed and some people picked her up and was brought back. The next day the ndant said to us, 'You girls must realize fortunate you are to have babies. You very low girls or you never would have e this thing. God has brought your ies to you to keep you from going any er.'

HEN I got into trouble. It was over se shoes. I wouldn't wear any good ones crub the floors in, and so they gave me a of old ones. They were a size and a half small, so I wore my bedroom slippers. e matron caught me and I got very stub- n about it. She called the agency, and the e worker came out and asked me why I uldn't wear the shoes. I said because they re too small. She said:

"Katie, you must learn once and for all u are not in a position to choose.'

'That hit me. I learned then that from re on in, if I wanted to take care of hnny, I was no longer free. If you learn it, u grow up. If you don't, you're lost. There is one kid there—she couldn't have been more than fifteen—and she simply couldn't rn to love her baby. The attendants were ways saying to her, 'Now, every mother ves her child. That's just nature.' But e'd say, 'It cries so much,' and push at the or with her toe and look like she ought to e out playing hopscotch or something in- ead of caught in those cold, stone walls.

"There was another girl who just adored er baby and who cried because she couldn't e its mother. Her family was going to adopt im and her mother said the baby was never know—the girl was going to be sent to live ith an aunt. And then, there was Betty. he told her father about the baby coming nd said she and Paul—that was the boy she was in love with—were going to be married right away. Her father was furious. He refused to let her see Paul again, ever; he called him a seducer and a rapist and heaven knows what all and packed her off to the home. She'd been there five months when I got there. She worked in the laundry. Twice she'd tried to call Paul up, but they stopped her, on orders from her father. Once they'd told her she had a letter from him and scolded her for receiving it, but they wouldn't let her read it. And one night he came to the home. He made a lot of noise down in the front hall, but he didn't get up to the sitting room where we all had to sit every evening until ten. Betty sat there and just sobbed and sobbed, but she didn't dare do anything. She'd learned by then what all of us had to learn sooner or later: you can't call your soul your own once you've had a baby without a marriage certificate.

"NOT that people aren't kind, mind you. They are. Where would I be today if it hadn't been for the kindness of other people?

"Like Elsie, my 'foster mother.' Finally the agency took me out of the home and sent me to Elsie's to live. She had her own four children there, another baby, and me and Johnny. She was a nurse whose husband didn't make much money and she'd chosen this way to add to the family income. It seemed like heaven when I first moved in there. Elsie was so kind, so generous, so helpful—and she understood about me and how I felt about the agency. I had my last quarrel with the agency one day; my last because I broke away from them and Elsie did too. I paid them the rent each week and then they gave it to Elsie. They had to okay every clothes purchase she made—and I wasn't supposed to make any. And I was supposed to take Johnny to the clinic. Now I don't mind clinics. But I do hate people who take out cards and where it says 'Name of father' they write 'None.' Why should my Johnny have to suffer illegitimate parents? I can't see it. I'll tell my friends about myself because I trust them—but does Johnny have to go through life earmarked? He can know the truth later without having to pay for it now.

"I stayed with Elsie for a year and nine months. The trouble in the long run was—you might know—money. Nobody but a woman who's supporting a baby and working, too, knows what a thin squeeze it is all the time. I made $35 a week when I was at Elsie's (that's about $120 to take home a month) and I paid her $90 a month board and room for us both. That left me $30 over for doctor's bills—and you know how it is the first year—and for lunches, for carfare, for clothes. I had one pair of shoes, and when the heels ran down I sat in the cobbler's until he put new heels on. I had one suit, two years old. Johnny got a few hand-me-downs from Elsie's kids. I was broke and running into debt. When I came home from work I fed Johnny, bathed him and put him to bed, and then I worried and wept, and wept and worried. . . ."

We should take care to lay in a stock of provisions, but not of pleasures: these should be gathered day by day. —NINON DE LENCLOS.

Katie's complaint against the clinic was an understandable one from her viewpoint. It was not, however, the agency's fault. In only twelve states are children protected against the stigma of illegitimacy by simple birth cards bearing only the child's name and date and place of birth. In many states, the word "illegitimate" is stamped on the birth certificate. In others the names of the two parents are included—and the information is clear between the lines that they were not married. A few states issue new cards when a child born out of wedlock is adopted; many do not, and many a man or woman has discovered his true background only upon applying for his first birth certificate. The Children's Bureau in Washington is campaigning for simple birth cards in all states.

I try to think sometimes er it would have been better for y if I had, but I can't think straight on bject. I usually decide, yes, and then art gives a great big lurch and throws logic out. That Sunday-school teacher telling you about tried to take a com- ise. She boards the baby out. Once a she sneaks in to see him. He doesn't she's his mother and probably never Meanwhile he hasn't even got a sub- e mother. Just nothing. And she's ext to nothing. NYHOW, what I decided to do was to be id. Maybe that doesn't seem like much decision, but it's a kind of hard one to e when you hit rock bottom. When you low it's extra hard to do things which are in other people's opinions. But I decided as the only thing I could do and keep nny with me, and keep my health, and e ends meet.

I'm awfully glad I did it now. Of course as lucky. I got a job taking care of two er kids, and they don't mind having nny underfoot too. I can't do it forever. know what's the worst thing about it? nny hears the other kids calling their ther, 'mommy,' and he hears me being ed 'Katie'—and so what happens? He calls my boss 'mommy,' and me 'Katie.' Oh, sure, I think what the heck, but how would you like it—and how about when he gets old enough to know I'm a maid and starts wondering about it? I can't do it forever. But I've got it planned.

"The next step will come when he's old enough to go to a nursery school and I can go back to office work, and maybe work part time helping some other mother out after school. That's the next step—and then, more education. You see, I figure that when your baby's future is all up to you, you have to be twice as good as when he has a father, too, to help. I've got to make something out of myself in order to make something out of Johnny.

"WELL, that's about all there is to it. Get married? Yes, I'd like to get married someday. When someone loves Johnny nearly as much as he does me, someone truly loving, whom I can trust. I've had three proposals—even if John thought I was a bad girl, there are some men who don't. Like the one who told me that I should tell people that John was killed overseas. I said that made him sound like a hero. He said, 'Well, then, say he was shot by court-martial. He should have been.'

"I can't quite feel that way about it, but I must learn how to tell some sort of a fib. I told the people I work for now the truth, and when their friends come in they say, 'Oh, so you're Mrs. Herrick. We've heard so much about you. And could we see Johnny?' And one of these days Johnny's going to be called names. I couldn't stand that. I've every intention of telling him the truth, but as we go along, not slam-bang. He's happy here; it's hard, long work, but we're together all day long and that's heavenly. I've cleared up all my debts and bought some clothes, and even if I do make only $20 a week, I don't have to worry about a roof over our heads or three square meals. I've told father about Johnny, and he's accepted the truth.

"What's the answer to the whole problem? I don't know. I know that having a baby without a husband is the most horrible, awful experience in the world, but I wish that the baby could get a better break than he does. And I wish it never had to happen to anyone anywhere—that all girls would somehow know, from the time they're old enough to have babies, just what a sacred, lifelong thing having a baby is, and how once you've had a baby you've taken on a responsibility for another person's life whether you take care of him or whether you don't. And then maybe, if all girls knew all these things and could talk about having babies, and making love, and what marriage is and what sex is, then maybe there wouldn't need to be any more babies without fathers, and more and more mothers without husbands."

Only time can finish Katie's story. Psychiatrists agree with her that adequate education for adult life would have an important effect on the rising rate of illegitimacy in this country. Philosophers add that our period in history is endangered by a lack of self-responsibility that is an inevitable outgrowth of a lack of spiritual values.

Practical workers in our social field are endeavoring to insure that the child born out of wedlock gets a healthy start in life, and that the mother be re-educated to her position in society. Because of the unresolved and conflicting moral attitudes on the situation, their job is a peculiarly difficult one. Katie has many more rounds in her battle to fight. She is better equipped psychologically than many unmarried mothers; she has still a lot to learn. Through her hardship, however, she may also have something to teach others.

THE END

When the Titanic plunged to the bottom of the cold Atlantic, thirty-five years ago, only a few women went down.

One of them, Mrs. Isadore Strauss, had been placed by her husband in one of the last lifeboats to leave the doomed vessel. But she slipped out and was back on deck before he could stop her. Throwing her arms about him, she cried, "We are old now, and we have been together a great many years. Where you go, I will go!"

NEVER A DULL MEAL

By Clementine Paddleford

Clementine Paddleford, well-known food reporter, plays a return engagement in our Never a Dull Meal series; and, strange as it may seem, her pet peeve is those well-meaning souls who talk recipes interminably.

THE earth smells spicy as a pomander. Breathe it in deep. The young south wind comes ruffling the grasses and curling the fleece of the baby lambs. Butterball ducks search lunch, tail ends up, waving paddle-wheel feet at the sun.

Garden paths grow narrow as the green aisles thicken. Peas plump the pod. Green beans blossom. June with a swish of her brush flames the cheek of the radish; wild strawberries crimson. Orchards fatten. Robins shake the cherry tree as they peck at the fruit. The year's harvest begins. Now a procession of summer's bounty to gladden the menu.

Lamb with Buttermilk Gravy: Wipe lamb leg well with a damp cloth and place in large bowl or enamel pan. Pour over 1 quart buttermilk and let soak 3 days while stored in the refrigerator. Certainly it's a nuisance; that leg must be turned every so often, and it's a space-taking thing. But the bother is forgotten when you taste the results. When ready to bake, remove buttermilk, rub leg with salt and pepper and stick with 5 whole cloves. Place in roasting pan and brown in a hot oven, 450° F., for 20 minutes. Reduce heat to moderate, 350° F., add 1 onion, sliced, and 1 cup of the buttermilk and continue roasting until the internal temperature is 180° F., or a total of 20 minutes to the pound. Baste frequently with the buttermilk in pan, adding more if needed. Make gravy by adding 1 cup of water to pan liquid and thickening as desired.

Curried Lamb: Sunday leftovers make Monday's feast meal. Innumerable the curry recipes, each with a fancy little twist all its own, but for everyday use and meals in a hurry we use this basic sauce, which can be made in quantity, stored in the refrigerator, and put to work whenever a leftover happens along: Sauté 2 small onions in 3 tablespoons butter or margarine until lightly browned. Add 3 tablespoons flour and 2 tablespoons curry powder and stir until blended. Add 2 tomatoes, sliced, and gradually stir in 4 cups soup stock, adding salt and pepper to taste. Bring to a boil. Simmer gently 20 minutes, or until the sauce is reduced to the thickness of heavy cream. Serve the curry with rice, tender and flaky, each grain separate. Mold the rice in ring form and turn onto a large heated platter; fill the center with the sauce, combined and heated with the meat. Pass with your choice of the many curry accompaniments. Chutney is traditional. If you can't get that in your grocery, take apple butter and mix with beefsteak sauce or Worcestershire to taste, and make it quite hot. Other accompaniments might be shredded orange mixed with finely chopped raisins; chopped peanuts; chopped green pepper combined with tomato; grated coconut; chopped cooked egg; chopped raw onions; with approved pressures . . . 5 lbs. for fruits . . . 10 lbs. for vegetables and meats.

Here's How

TO DO SPEED COOKING WITH EASE

Simply set the MIRRO-MATIC control at the recommended pressure, 5, 10, or 15 pounds, and turn heat high. When the proper pressure is reached, this indestructible precision control signals . . . a distinctive jiggling sound. Then turn the heat low so that the control jiggles two or three times a minute. That is all there is to it.

The control automatically limits the pressure to the pressure you selected. Food is cooked in a jiffy, easy as 1, 2, 3 . . . and results are consistently right. Booklet of tested recipes furnished for your guidance.

Flavors are finer, colors brighter, mineral and vitamin contents higher, when foods are speed-cooked in the MIRRO-MATIC Pressure Pan, the perfected simplified way.

then assemble noodles and chicken in the casserole to store in the refrigerator ready for the oven. The salad dressing is made and chilled well in advance, ready for a last-minute shake-up. In early morning, wash and separate the salad greens, dry and place in the refrigerator to be ready for the bowl. Serve the salad with the casserole; it takes the place of a vegetable. The corn-bread batter can be mixed several hours before dinner, poured into its baking pan and kept in the refrigerator. When the doorbell rings, the casserole main dish should be finished, golden and tempting, to wait in the warming oven while the corn bread bakes.

Chicken-and-Noodle Casserole: Have a 5-pound fowl cut for stewing; wipe chicken pieces with damp cloth and put in heavy saucepan. Add boiling water to half cover, add 1 teaspoon salt, 2 small onions and 2 bay leaves; cover and let simmer 1½ to 2 hours, or until tender. Let cool, remove meat from bones and cut into 1-inch dice. Melt ⅓ cup fat, add ⅓ cup flour and stir to smooth paste. Add 3 cups chicken stock, ½ cup milk or cream, 1 teaspoon salt and ¼ teaspoon pepper. Stir over low heat until smooth and thickened and the mixture boils. Let simmer 3 minutes, stirring occasionally.

Cook noodles in boiling salted water 10 minutes, or in chicken stock if there is enough. Arrange noodles and chicken in alternate layers in greased casserole, add sauce and cover with a layer of buttered crumbs. Bake in moderate oven, 350° F., for 30 minutes. Serves 6.

Herb French Dressing: Peel 1 clove garlic and cut in half crosswise and place in jar with a tight-fitted cover. Add 6 tablespoons salad oil, 2 tablespoons vinegar, 1 teaspoon salt, ⅛ teaspoon freshly ground pepper, 4 drops Worcestershire sauce, ½ teaspoon dry mustard and a big pinch of any favorite salad-herb mix. Store in a cool place at least 24 hours. Remove garlic, shake well, pour over greens and toss lightly a few times just before serving. It's a dressing replete with fragrant and nose-titillating aromas.

Black Sweet Cherries should be seeded and sweetened and let ripen with sugar a few hours in the refrigerator. Serve topped with sour cream. Very French! Very good!

agitation did not help matters. Luckily, Mary loved Miss Lucy, and had reason to, for under her fierce exterior she was a devoted mistress and after so many years of their living side by side had become a friend. If there hadn't been real love between them, Mary would have given notice four times during the huge effort they were making together. Once Miss Lucy fell, but with a violent effort of will pulled herself up again. It was really a pitiful sight, the whale of the flesh weighing down and intercepting all that fire. Mary could have wept herself, for pity.

But at long last Miss Lucinda was sitting very straight in her chair, panting audibly and wiping the beads of perspiration from her forehead, fully dressed. The garnet brooch fastened her best dark red satin blouse; the garnet earrings decorated her still pretty ears. Fashions had come and gone for fifty years, so that now her upswept pompadour with a tight knot at the back was in fashion again. She looked what she was, a lady—and a formidable one.

"There, Mary," she panted. "You have been a great help. I'm sorry I was cross," she added meekly.

Mary, who was already at the door, turned at the last sentence: when Miss Lucy apologized it was a sure sign she was feeling poorly, and no wonder, poor soul. She was gone only a moment, but when she came back, she found a different person.

Miss Lucy was weeping; great hopeless tears rolled down her cheeks and she sobbed, "I can't, Mary. I just can't make it. Oh, dear," she sobbed like a child.

"Why, Miss Lucy, don't you cry," Mary said with tears in her own eyes, and, with that delicate instinct Negroes have, came and put an arm around her mistress and pulled out a handkerchief from the suit pocket as if she were an old nurse and this enormous old woman were a weeping child. "Don't you cry," she crooned. "That Nat Sumter isn't worth your tears."

"I'm not crying for Nathanael Sumter," Lucy sobbed angrily. "I'm crying for myself."

After all that valiant struggle, she had had to give up for the first time in her life. She refused to get undressed again, but insisted she would sleep in her clothes—"and probably die in them," she added grimly.

While all this was going on at Miss Lucinda's, Nat Sumter lay comfortably in bed. After his measly lunch he had gone to sleep and he woke up with a start, just as the church bell rang four. At first he couldn't think where he was and wondered if it were four in the morning, and then he realized the full extent of his humiliation; there was nothing to look forward to at all. If he got up and dressed he would have to endure his sister's cooing, for she was one of those women who always addressed men as if they were feeble-minded infants. She would say, "Did you have a nice day in bed, dear?" or, "Are you enjoying that lovely book, dear?"

"LUCINDA!" he said aloud, and it was a cry from the heart. But as soon as he had said it, it came over him in a flash that Lucinda would be worried to death. She'll be sitting there fretting and sending Mary to look out the window every five minutes to see if I'm on my way—she'll make herself ill, poor old dear, he said to himself with a new stabbing awareness that he was failing her miserably.

He got up then very stealthily and opened his door a crack. There was no sound in the house, not even the whiffling of that awful dog. It was perfectly still. Amy had evidently gone out for her drive. Would he be quick enough? He had about fifteen minutes—would he ever be able to dress in that time?

His hands were stiff with age and every movement cost him an effort. The only thing he noticed about growing old was this; emotionally, intellectually he felt as bright as a button, but his body was way

THE INNOCENT FAREWELL

[illegible]

Then they would begin one of those interminable contests with which they occupied themselves every afternoon. Sometimes it was throwing stones, sometimes it was wagon races down the hill which went by our house, sometimes it was climbing trees. My brother excelled in all these strenuous activities and he always won all the contests. But Pill didn't seem to mind. Because he was so thin and pale, so very small for his age, he was made to "play out" for three hours every day, and his mother, who was the kind of woman who went to the PTA meetings every month attired in a navy-blue silk dress with white ruffles at the throat, was pleased, because Pill had never liked to play out before my brother came, and she said that my brother was a "good influence" on Pill.

Actually, my brother was rude and dictatorial. He always made Pill do the unpleasant things. Pill was never the hero in their games; he always died ignominiously. My brother shot him triumphantly through the heart at least four times a day. Pill was the footman, the vassal, the general's aide, the side-kick, the stool pigeon. My brother shouted at him, called him names, ordered him about, hid from him, jumped out at him from behind bushes. Yet Pill continued to smile his crooked smile, to persist in trying to throw stones farther, to run faster, to trail wistfully in my brother's pugnacious wake. I think that my brother aroused some primitive ecstatic element of fear in him. Sometimes when I was walking up the hill from the town I would see Pill coming down in the wagon with my brother running and shouting lustily beside him, and there would be a kind of transfixed horror in Pill's eyes. His soft mouth would hang open and he would look as if he were being rapidly conveyed to his death, as if he were about to be consumed by fire. Sometimes he raised his voice in a wild, shrill shriek as the wagon careened unsteadily toward the bottom of the hill. He never flinched; he never refused to go through what was obviously a terrible ordeal to him. I suppose he had the kind of courage which does not depend upon strength for sustenance and which is not even destroyed by fear.

But still he must have been grateful for the quieter intervals later on when the heavy, languid opulence of midsummer somewhat reduced my brother's unwearying energy. He and Pill spent whole afternoons going down to the drugstore for ice-cream cones, and they both had small vegetable gardens. By the middle of July Pill had managed to produce magnificent lettuce and string beans, but the radishes which my brother had confidently planted refused to grow any larger than small dry peas. He could not understand this bewildering phenomenon at all, although Pill timidly suggested that perhaps it was due to the fact that my brother had watered the radishes before the sun had gone down, which was usually a bad thing. My brother said anyway he didn't like radishes.

When it was very hot they just sat out on the porch talking about things, and wherever we were in the house we could hear the soft, absorbed murmur of their voices. They talked in the evenings, too, standing irresolutely together in the yard, mere shadows in the swiftly shifting, ghostly dusk, trying to decide what to do until nine o'clock, when they both had to go to bed.

One night we all got in the car and mother drove us out to the lake for a swim. Mother and I sat on the edge of the dock while my brother dived crookedly into the water and Pill held his nose and jumped in. Their almost naked figures, tense with excitement, looked thin, active and grotesque in the steady, pure light of the moon, and every time Pill's head slipped beneath the dark water mother and I stiffened a little, waiting for it to come up again; it seemed that the

this time my brother kept on telling Pill out all the places we were going to in a

It got to be a sort of game with them.
ey would be sitting in the kitchen having pper and suddenly Pill would say:
"Will you go to S-South America?"
"Sure," my brother would reply. "We'll to South America all right."

Pill would contemplate this seriously for few moments and presently he would think another country to ask my brother about.
hey would play the game for hours until y mother would grow impatient with them and ask them why didn't they listen to the radio or something.

We had been living in the town almost a year when the telegram finally came one rainy Saturday in April. Pill was staying at home because he had a little cough, and my brother had been standing by the window all morning, looking out at the desolate sweep of the hill. Finally he said, "There's a man coming up the walk," and my mother went to the door. The telegram was there. We were going away again because my father was coming in a week. He was going to fly, and my brother spent the rest of the day wondering what kind of airplane he would fly in. He knew a great deal about planes; his room was cluttered with mechanical magazines.

THE next morning Pill appeared at the kitchen door, having been equipped with a heavy coat, galoshes, a thick muffler and an oilskin cap for his brief trip across the yard in the rain. He knocked on the door and came in saying reproachfully, "Your milk is on the back porch. Your yesterday's milk." He was troubled by our negligent ways and he was very glad to help me carry in the four bottles of milk.

Then my brother came in with his hands in his pockets, whistling a little tune. "Hello," he said to Pill. "We're going away next week."

"Away?" inquired Pill with interest. "For how long?"

"Forever," replied my brother calmly.

Pill was stunned. It was very plain that, after all, he had not believed my brother's stories. He was accustomed to people who lived in one place all their lives. For a moment he stood in silence and then he repeated his usual question hopefully:

"But aren't you ever coming back h-here?"

"I guess not," said my brother.

Pill was so astonished that he was incapable of comment. He pondered a little and then he stammered, "Well, good-by."

"Good-by!" exclaimed my brother. "I'm not going this minute!"

"Aren't you?" said Pill desperately. He looked at us as if he expected us to disappear immediately. He was curiously disconcerted. "Well, that's too bad," he remarked, and blushed furiously. He shifted uneasily from one foot to the other and glanced at me. "I'll put those milk bottles into the icebox," he said finally.

We rolled up the Oriental rugs again right away, and put back the lace doilies and the awful pictures, and soon afterward we left. The night before we were to go my brother went over to Pill's for supper and returned carrying a long flat box. In the box were a blue necktie and a matching handkerchief.

"I'll wear them tomorrow, I guess," said my brother, looking very pleased, and he put the box carefully on his dresser.

We left early in the morning when everyone was asleep, but Pill came running out just as we were getting into the car. He shouted at us and ran so fast that he almost fell. But when he reached the car his urgency left him. His face was pained and distressed because his speech was so inadequate. He twisted his hands and blushed and finally managed to say:

"M-maybe I'll see you again s-someday."

"Maybe," said my brother carelessly.

"I'll write you a letter if you'll tell me where to send it when you g-get there."

"All right," said my brother.

We drove away. Through the window we could see Pill going toward his house. He turned and waved and we all waved in return and mother said:

"He's a nice little boy."

"We take Highway Number One as far as Washington," said my brother, industriously consulting the map, "and then ——"

We went down the hill and turned the corner and after that we couldn't see Pill any more.

THE END

Never neglect your fireplace. Much of the cheerfulness of life depends upon it. What makes a fire so pleasant is, I think, that it is a live thing in a dead room.

Kitchen in a Closet

BY GLADYS TABER

PHOTOS BY STUART STEPHENSON

Once a dimly lit closet with little in it but a shelf, this efficient little 3′ x 5′ kitchen makes getting their own and company meals possible and pleasurable for the busy bride with a 9-to-5 job.

I SOMETIMES think the happiest June bride is the girl who makes home out of an ordinary little walk-up apartment or a cold-water flat or a remodeled attic in a small town. For this is the time for adventure, the time when economizing is painless and gay, for you are not poor at all, you are richer than anyone else in the world.

The lucky bride these days settles for a studio apartment in a remodeled house. There might be a living room and a bedroom, and a bathroom with a high narrow tub. Then there would be a hole in the wall—a closet for a kitchen—lavishly equipped with a one-burner plate and a too small and leaky icebox. The only water, of course, is in the bathroom. And there is no place to set anything except on the floor.

For the June bride in such an apartment, the JOURNAL undertook to see just what could be done to make a space 39″ wide, 60″ from front to back, with a door to the hall into the bathroom on the right wall, into a really adequate kitchen.

After considerable study of ways and means, it was decided that since both members of this household were working, some investment in temporary improvement would pay dividends in money saved by eating at home, as well as conserving the young housekeeper's time and energy. Since the closet was next to the bathroom, it was neither too difficult nor too expensive to bring in hot and cold water and drain connections for a sink. That decision having been made, the bliss of having a sink instead of carrying dishes into the bathroom to be washed on a board over the bathtub, as well as not having to run into the bathroom to wash vegetables or to get water to cook with, made life seem full of promise.

The next question was what kind of sink, and was there any way they could have a real refrigerator? When you have to keep a chunk of ice in the tub for cool things in the summer, it means you really struggle. You and that fifty pounds of ice cannot use the tub at the same time, and every time you lift it out, it leaks all over the floor and melts at an alarming rate. No refrigerator small enough to fit the space was yet being made, but a cabinet combination of sink and refrigerator was in production for new apartment-house construction. A friendly manufacturer was persuaded to sell one of these to this young couple. Again the purchase seemed justified, as the prospects of their finding a place for some time where such equipment wouldn't be needed seemed slim. Undoubtedly other young couples would eventually be glad to buy it, and the price, for the convenience provided, seemed reasonable.

A wedding check that was to buy a very special radio-phonograph was used for the sink-refrigerator cabinet instead. Records are now played with great zest on a windup job, and the same small radio which went to college with the bride still serves them well.

A SMALL range was found, with a grill, broiler and small portable oven, which would fit at the end of the drainboard of the sink. This range is easy to move around and performs wonders. It operates on 115 volts and has interlocking switches so you cannot overload the circuit even if you try to. If you try to turn both switches on high, one automatically turns to a lower heat. And for quick cooking, all the heat can be thrown into one unit. The little white oven is large enough for baking small pies and casseroles, or popovers for Sunday breakfast. Or it can be lifted off and the heat used for surface cooking. I fell so in love with the range that I could hardly resist running out for chops to grill or a tender young chicken to broil. The broiler pulls out with a handle like a drawer.

Carefully planned storage shelves were placed on all three walls—narrow ones for storage of spices and canned goods, and wide ones for pots, pans, plates and the electric toaster and other doubly welcome wedding presents. A file was built on the top shelf for cake and pie pans, cutting boards, muffin tins, and so on. It is a real luxury not to have these stacked down under something and have to stand on your head and unnest them all the time. The can opener, paper-towel rack and wax-paper holders were conveniently established by the sink. On the back of the bathroom door are plywood box shelves for cereals, cutlery and lightweight equipment such as pastry blender, egg beater and rolling pin. Room for a towel rack too. Not to waste a half inch of space, a linoleum-cove shelf was provided on the left wall l the refrigerator. This is big enough t mixing bowl for beating up scrambled to slice bacon on or spread sandwich not big enough to get in the way of frigerator door.

The use of gay clear color added touch to make this kitchen a charmin for the bride. Blue and coral pai shelf paper and edging seemed to a and spaciousness. Heavy dramatic would make the room cramped an overpowering. Light singing colors these enlarge the area and give gai freshness to it. With clean-cut stripe able cotton draperies and a Venetia the door to the kitchen is treated as window. The Venetian blind may be c to close the kitchen cupboard off th room or to conceal the space where th dishes are stacked.

A double pop-up toaster, a good waffle iron, a pressure saucepan and maker are extras from the bride's w presents. I like the idea of a coffee with its own stove so coffee can be m the living room.

All but delicate cakes and large ro turkeys, or meals for large numbers of are within the reach of this pir kitchen. And after all, when you l party you don't need a large roast or a at all. You have real Italian spaghett green salad and garlic French brea Jerry brings in those delicate little things from the baker's.

When dusk drops slowly over th in June, you can stand at your windo look down the narrow canyon of the now filled with violet light. A pushca goes by with cool dark lilacs, glossy leaves, bunches of delphinium. C skate precariously over the cracks walk. Slim girls in slacks walk thei up and down, and a thin eager boy canvas under his arm goes by.

Everything is ready in the blue-an kitchen in a closet. Bouillabaisse i mering gently on the little range. Hal says this was invented in Avignon it smells delicious in Greenwich V The salad, in a wooden bowl from th cent store, is crisp and cool. The blue with white soft Italian cheese and t crackers is ready. And here he comes, the street, walking fast, leaning forw little against the wind from the river.

"Hello, darling, supper is ready."

MR. ELY AND THE UNICORN

He opened the screen door and took the envelope marked "Johnny" that was fastened to the screen with a hairpin. He stood there on the stones before the kitchen door and read the note in the waning light:

Darling Johnny: Do forgive, but Aunt Posy's broken her leg and succor from the heirs was indicated. Come in just the same and sleep it off. Icebox is full. Take in the milk Sun. A.M. Fire laid in east room. Make yourself at home. Thermostat set O.K. Wood in shed. Give the cat milk and pink salmon. Help self to anything in fruit cellar. Door is open—all honest up here. . . . Not sure you know you're coming. Tried to phone—no luck.

Love,
AGGIE AND SID.

It did not seem strange to him. It was all part and parcel of the dead day and his weariness.

He opened the kitchen door and it was pleasantly warm inside. Warm and almost dark. He reached up and pulled a cord with a little white horse off a whisky bottle tied to one end and the center light went on, revealing the big country kitchen with the blue-and-white linoleum tiles of the floor, the shelves with bright peasant dishes and the open cupboard where aluminum pots and frying pans hung. In the middle of the floor was a round deal table.

"I filled an inside straight," Mr. Ely said aloud. The last time here he and Cass had played poker with the Emersons and Ferdie Blythe around this table. The chairs were painted bright colors—turquoise, pink, yellow—old wooden chairs with rounded, worn arms and good stout underneath spindles to catch your heels over.

Something brushed against Mr. Ely's leg and he felt a shudder go over him, sending all his flesh into little hills. He looked down. He walked to the icebox, his hat and coat still on, took out a bottle of milk, lifted down one of the best saucers and filled it with milk. He didn't look for any pink salmon; it seemed to entail too much effort. The cat lapped up the milk in nothing flat. You let them out after meals, I suppose, Mr. Ely said and opened the kitchen door onto thick gray wet twilight. The cat streaked out with alacrity. Ah-ha! said Mr. Ely sardonically, as if he were foreseeing wild nocturnal adventures which a tame kitchen cat should have long since eschewed.

I think I'll go to bed, said Mr. Ely.

He went through the dining room with its corner cupboard displaying the blue-and-white spodeware, its sideboard covered with books and the manuscript of Sid's new play, then through the living room to the stairs.

East, Mr. Ely said. How do I know which is east when the sun isn't coming up? Nor even going down?

He opened a door and saw the big double bed in which he and Cass had once slept. Under a down puff that leaked feathers. They had sneezed and giggled all night through. No fireplace. Not east. No sun shall e'er rise in thee, my pretty room, said Mr. Ely. Oh-ho, the bathroom. Very clean and sanitary-looking—and a plug for the razor. No pioneering stuff about Aggie and Sid after all.

"But I don't think I brought a razor," he said aloud. "They shall wrap me round in my beard for a shroud."

He walked toward an open door at the end of the nall, and, This must be east, for the fire is laid, he thought. He went straight to the hearth and lit the crumpled paper beneath the logs. At once the flame shot up and made shadows and streaks of light in the big beamed room. Let us have light, said Mr. Ely, turning on a switch, standing there by one of Aggie—very feudal, he said. The beds were low and heavy with squat knobs of posts and covers of some hand-woven stuff, rust and white. There was a beamed ceiling, a framed coat of arms on parchment over the mantel and an ancient unticking clock at one end of the mantelshelf. And time stood still, said Mr. Ely. The walls were plastered and painted white. Between two windows—there were six in all—hung a tapestry reaching almost from ceiling to floor. Mr. Ely took off his hat, hung it on a bedpost, eyed it belligerently a moment as if the knob were a head that was about to talk back to him. It was after that moment that he looked up at the tapestry and at once a sudden despairing, wild gleam shone in his eyes.

"The old so-and-so has followed me here!" said Mr. Ely.

He reached for a little love of a rosewood chair that Aggie had put protectively in a corner, planted it without tenderness in front of the tapestry, sat down straddling the chair and facing its delicately carved back, and stared upward with the wild look still in his eyes. Sure enough, there was his mother-in-law to the life standing on the terrace of the castle, all dressed for her part in elegant, lady-of-the-manor clothes: square neck, tight bodice, black flowing sleeves and a long skirt of the same figured stuff as the bodice, only split down the front and banded with some embroidery to reveal an underskirt of black. And beside her there was Cass herself, only with her head turned away from her mother, as never, never was it in real life. She wasn't so elegant as mamma. She wore only a jeweled band across her page-boy bob instead of an ornate headdress. Her dress was black with a quite Dali-ish effect of pattern, and for some unknown reason she was wearing black mittens of the same cloth as her dress. She's a-gathering holly while she may! said Mr. Ely, entranced. For before her, planted smack over the things on the tapestry, was a henna pot containing a little holly tree, with berries as big as grapes but leaves only life-size.

If the ladies stepped off the terrace, as they seemed about to do, they would immediately be surrounded by all the flora and fauna of Ruritania congregated on a henna ground. Daffodils, iris, bluebells, cowslips, anemones, dandelions, foxgloves and violets—and, sporting among them, two white rabbits and a long-tailed, big-footed, extraordinarily lean dog.

All trained down for the dog races, said Mr. Ely.

Below the henna ground a curved band of white enclosed the domain of the feudal ladies, and under this band there were eight or ten inches where more flowers grew on ground of faded gray, while in the corner at the left stood a stork with one foot lifted. No, not a stork—too long a bill for that—perhaps a heron. At the right, a bird as big, but that looked like a starling.

Amazing! Mr. Ely said.

Above the castle were more flowers or the green stuff of trees, and planted among them another white rabbit and three dogs in varying degrees of emaciation. Heraldic banners swirled among the trees. Then, as if his eyes had willed themselves not to take in the gems of the whole piece till the very last, Mr. Ely's gaze fastened upon the lion and the unicorn. The lion, not very fierce, sat upright on the greensward, or hennasward, behind Cass' mother. He wore a black-and-white collar, his mane was very tidy and his tongue was out. Around his feet, his tail with its ornate tuft made a decorative swirl. There's a claw in

A homeowner, wearing his oldest clothes, was mowing his lawn when a woman in a ritzy car stopped and asked him, "What do you get for mowing lawns?"

"The lady who lives here lets me live with her," replied the homeowner, and the lady in the car, without comment, drove away.

"Speaking generally," the unicorn said indulgently. "Mr. Ely is a publisher of books and I am sure he understands me."

"The whole duty of man," the lion said in a rather tired British accent, "is to devour or be devoured."

"Good heavens, you're an Oxford man!"

"Certainly!" the lion said languidly.

"Ah, yes the wisdom of the old school tie!" the unicorn said and one lid drooped in an unmistakable wink at Mr. Ely. "But we were speaking of the imperialism of the mind."

"You seem quite happy in an English meadow," the lion answered truculently.

"Happy? One who has known the asphodel, the myrtle and the rose, cannot be happy with the cowslip and the daffodil. One who has known the snow in the Persian hills cannot be happy with the fog. One who has known the shepherd's flute in the mountains above Fars cannot be happy with the yapping of starlings. But we were not speaking of happiness. To see—to see into—not as in a mirror, but through, into the great secret, that is all."

"Excuse me," the rabbit said timidly. "Aren't the asphodel and the daffodil the same thing? Of course, I might be mistaken." No one answered her.

"Generalize—generalize," said the starling. "As if Mr. Ely cared about such things! He is talking about a certain look that his mother-in-law gives him—a look we know very well and which ought to be forbidden by law. It is demoralizing and it is quite plain that it has demoralized Mr. Ely. He looks as if he had been flying all day on one wing. It takes a strong character to give look for look, and Mr. Ely is not a strong character. If he were he would have poisoned the old harridan years ago."

"There is no clarity of vision gained by violence," the unicorn said.

"Demned satisfying, all the same, what?" the lion put in.

"Indeed, yes," Mr. Ely said. "I would like to take her to the top turret and drop her off!"

"It is plain," the unicorn said, "that you are more childish than when you were young, Mr. Ely."

"He's young enough for all practical purposes," the starling interrupted. "The thing to do is to put this young thing with a mother out of his mind and find an orphan somewhere to give his attention to. It is always well to check on relatives before embarking on a marriage. There are plenty of women, and I am sure you are not a one-woman man, Mr. Ely. You have the look of one who has often strayed far afield. And do not mistake me, I am not criticizing. Do not put all your eggs in one nest, I have always said. One female is much like another. It is when they have grown to middle age that they develop unpleasant tendencies, nagging and pushing and all that."

"Unfortunately, I am a one-woman man," Mr. Ely said.

Yes, you're right, Mr. Ely said despairingly to himself. It would have been better if I had not been. If I could have had some feeling for that pretty little thing in the publicity section. She was willing enough. Or Laura Demming. Whose poetry is as good as we've got now. But who isn't Cass. Nobody is Cass but Cass. Ever since that day on the boat ——

"You ought to have known better," said the starling irritatedly. "Ship romances never pan out."

"It was the Staten Island ferryboat," Mr. Ely said coldly.

"The smaller the boat, the smaller the romance," the starling said.

It was big enough for me, Mr. Ely said to himself. All alone she stood there in the fog and I bumped into her and she looked up at me and laughed. And she never told me she had a leech of a mother who thought I ought to make a good deal of money and never have time to laugh or think or love. She never told me that at all.

"And you wouldn't have heard her if she had," the starling said angrily.

"No, probably not," Mr. Ely admitted. Then, startled: "Hey, I didn't say anything."

"I published the thing," Mr. Ely said.

"Well, why not?" the starling said. "Tosh, but everybody liked it. Very racy bits about the haute monde. After all, that's what people like to read. How the other half lives—only nobody wants to know what's going on in the slums; it's the other half that gives you a lift. Books are meant to give you a cozy half hour when there isn't anybody to talk to, and what's more cozy than hearing how Lady Thingumbob said so-and-so to Lord Thingamajig? If people think they're giving anybody comfort by writing about Capital and Labor or Politics or any of that stuff, they're mistaken. Look at your friend, Aggie Emerson—thinks she's so tough and all that—likes a lady on her bedroom wall as well as the next one. We're all snobs at heart, every last one of us, and what's so shameful about that? Your Cass is a fool with ideals—she liked the fire all right, didn't she?"

"She's not a fool. She wouldn't have published it. She said, 'Johnny, let's go home,' and we went home."

"A woman's vapors," the lion said.

"The rains fall and the sun comes up a thousand times, and the snows keep warm through winter fallowness before the branches reach the mountains of the moon," the unicorn said in his voice like the wind.

"The roots must have got winter-killed," Mr. Ely said.

"'For there is hope of a tree, if it be cut down, that it will sprout again, and that the tender branch thereof will not cease.'"

"Stealing from the Bible, just about what I'd expect from a pagan like you," the starling said impudently.

Get yourself in hand, Mr. Ely said to himself. This sort of thing is dangerous. You've gone completely off your nut. You've let your subconscious run away with you, and that is insanity. And don't fool yourself because everything seems so clear. You've just gone clean over the border, that's what you've done, and when Aggie and Sid get back they'll lock you in here and put bars on the windows and send for somebody who can certify you. They'll send for Cass and she will say, "Yes, he's been queer for a long time now." And she won't look at you, she'll look at Bertha and Bertha will be right there at her elbow and Bertha will say, "That's putting it mildly, my dear." "All right, take him away," they'll say. But suppose then you go amuck and get your hands on Bertha's long proud neck and squeeze and squeeze and squeeze? Then what price bars and baths and shocks? Cheap at half the price. You're dead right, Leo, nothing but violence will satisfy sometimes. This is the time. . . . I'm balmy, completely balmy.

"Dig deeper than that," the unicorn said. "Blood on the hands is only the symbol of a deeper guilt."

"Just so you don't go talking about the 'blood of the lamb,'" the starling said.

"Ancient as time is the sacrifice of the lamb," said the unicorn. "Out of eternity you Christians took that symbol."

"I am not guilty," Mr. Ely said.

"Oh?" said the unicorn.

"It was justifiable homicide," said Mr. Ely. "Besides, it only took place in my mind."

"Where else should it take place?" the unicorn said. "Let us get to the top of the mountain and see the valley whole."

"You said to dig deeper. You can't have it both ways," Mr. Ely said.

"One must dig through the whole mountain," the unicorn said with dignity.

"I'm too tired," Mr. Ely said. "I couldn't hold a shovel. Besides, I plead 'Not guilty.' . . . There's nothing Freudian to dig for. I loved a woman and she stopped loving me and that's all there is to it. That's the beginning and the end."

"What did you do—two-time her?" asked the starling interestedly. "You said you'd been faithful, but I suppose that was just one of those things men say."

"No, I never two-timed Cass," Mr. Ely said, and as he said it such hopelessness went through him as to make his very bones weak.

"I don't mind Freud," the starling said. "Silly, but you get into some interesting sex stuff. We used to have a cook in the castle before the war and she was as good as Freud any day. Couldn't dream about anything she didn't come right up with the meaning. . . . The trouble with Freud is that he thinks you haven't anything to do but tell dreams from the time you're in the nest. Or that you don't do anything but dream from the time you're a fledgling. How does he think you get any nests built or raise a family or get any worms? It's silly. Still, when you haven't anything better to do, it's fun to have a cozy chat about when you were in pinfeathers—or in diapers, I suppose you would say. Tell us about when you were a little boy, Mr. Ely."

"The moon is coming up," the unicorn said.

And there the moon was, pure and cold on the autumn horizon, and there were the branches of the weeping-willow tree whipping, whipping in the November wind. And the lean, lean dog rose up at his mistress' feet and bayed at the moon, bayed with a long, melancholy persistence. It was like the sound of a train in the lonely countryside and made homesickness sweep through you in a tide, made you know that man is all alone, all alone, all alone forever and ever and ever. And boyhood was near because you had known that once when you were a boy. You came down from the barn with old Miles after milking and you carried the lantern and old Miles carried a pail in either hand. And it was cold and there was snow on the grass because you had come for Christmas. And far off down the valley whistled the night train. Your grandmother opened the kitchen door and there was light all around her. She was warm and the kitchen would be warm, but you were a long way from the door and the warmth and the lantern made only a little path through the darkness of the barn road and the sound of the train went through you and through all your world, lonely as dying.

The baying died away and the dog lay down again at his mistress' feet and was still.

"When I was a boy ——" Mr. Ely began.

III

The house on 64th Street was four stories high. On the ground floor were the kitchen, the pantries and the washroom. The boy almost never saw the kitchen. On the next floor were the dining room, a small serving room into which the dumb-waiter came, and what was known as "the sewing room," though no sewing was ever done in it. On the third floor was the drawing room, a room of great elegance. Above that were the bedrooms. An up-and-down house.

Miss Sophronia and Miss Maria Ely fitted their house. They were rather tall, thin, elderly women, handsome, but with no blood under their tight-drawn skins. They both had thin, elegant noses, made for looking down toward a less sensitive world. They both wore glasses with gold chains. For the most part they wore finely tailored suits and good unornamented blouses. They leaned toward the theosophists, were worldly without ever being of the world, proud, inbred. They owned the house and had an infinitesimal income after the taxes were paid. On this income they lived like ladies, hiding their economies even from each other, but neither would have ever touched a penny of the sum left in their hands for the education of their grandnephew, John Thackeray Ely.

They were the last people in the world who should have been given charge of a child. In

His thin and dy father was won- l to him, a special on for whom he ed at night and nd whom the house lved. It wasn't the e on 64th Street, a little brick house e Village. A great y people came to that house, people who hed and made music and ate heartily of Ely's baked beans and apple pie. But e were often nights when nobody came, on those nights it was best of all, for his er would tell him stories, stories of the t fantastic delight that he made up as he t along, or his mother would sing to him of the funny old yellow book that she had ught, she said, "from the farm." Every e he came on anything special in the se his mother would laugh and say, "Oh, rought that from the farm!" There were ny of these "special" things. There was apple stuck full of cloves. There was a set iron gem pans that made gems different m all others. There was a little emery bag aped like a strawberry into which you ck needles to make them shiny and sharp. ere was a set of jackstraws in a cylindri- box with fascinating carvings all over "I got that on the Christmas tree at e church when I was eight years old," his other said. "'Nell Barnaby!' they called t, and I couldn't imagine what it was. It as the best present I ever had, better than doll, better than an orange, better even an the necklace with the locket that Bessie eters got!"

AND then when John Thackeray Ely was x it was all over, the laughter, the songs, he picking up jackstraws from the kitchen table, the eating of crusty graham gems. He woke up one morning and there was no sound in the kitchen, no sound anywhere, though it was full day and the sun was shining. He lay there a long time, but there was no sound at all and he began to be afraid, though he was not often fearful, having no need for fear.

At last he crept out of bed and down the hall toward the bathroom, walking very lightly for what reason he did not know. Then he heard his mother whisper "Johnny!" from her bedroom and the fear thickened in his throat. He went to the bedroom door and saw his father and mother lying in the big double bed, and both of them looked queer.

"DON'T come in, Johnny," his mother whispered. "Get your clothes on, darling. Go next door and ask them to call the doctor. Stay over there—don't come in, Johnny."

He seemed to have trouble with buttons. But he got himself dressed and went downstairs. He went out and everything outside was sunny and cold and there was snow along the top of the iron railing and he went next door and said, "Will you call a doctor? My mother says will you, please?"

And that was all. All. He stayed in that house for five days and then he went to live with the old aunts on 64th Street. He never knew the steel wills that had accomplished this, nor that it was against every wish his mother could have had for him; that his mother had died thinking that at least Johnny would be safe and happy on the farm. But the Ely girls had enormous pride of family and they had been shocked by the marriage of their nephew to that noisy, lusty creature Nell Barnaby. It loomed as their duty to keep the last of the Elys pure Ely, and they took that little boy who had been loved and took him away to that tall stone house and did their duty by him. They were, if the truth were told—which it was not—glad that Nell Barnaby had had sense enough to die with her husband. It simplified things.

"He's very delicate," the sisters were wont to say to all and sundry.

He'd never known he was delicate when he'd lived in the brick house. He'd had beef broth and eggs and all the things to make him sturdy, and they had been good and just part of the days and the games he played with his mother. Now that he knew he was delicate, his stomach turned upside down at the thought of eggs and he could hardly ever finish a meal. He'd worn what he was supposed to wear at home, never questioning scarfs and overshoes. Now, when there were interminable discussions about the state of the weather, about whether or not a sweater was necessary, he grew not to want to go out at all. He went to an old-fashioned private school run by a Miss Haddock, a kindly enough old snob who had come down in the world but who pretended she hadn't. She also was a theosophist and came once a month or so to have tea with the Ely sisters in the drawing room.

If anyone said, "But what charming manners he has!"—and people often did say it—Sophronia would frown slightly, as if to say, "But naturally! He is an Ely!" She and Maria set out at once to eradicate every trace of Nell's heartiness from the boy. He was not what you'd call hearty, anyway, but he had a little streak of gaiety, a sense of humor that had more Barnaby than Ely in it,

THE "MOTHER LOVE" INSTINCT IN WILD MICE

In studying wild creatures, one often marvels at the fierce display of attachment for its young ones that prompts even the tiniest creature to rush to their defense.

One summer day I picked up a cinder building block, lying in the tall grass of a long-abandoned farmyard in upstate New York, and discovered the home of a field mouse. There were six tiny, hairless young ones in the rounded grass nest, their eyes not yet opened. As I picked up three of the short-tailed, velvety creatures and held them cupped in my hand near the ground, one of them gave a scarcely audible squeaking cry. At the young one's call, one of the parent mice, probably the mother, suddenly appeared from a thick clump of grass. Without hesitating, she rushed fearlessly to my hand, seized one of the baby mice, and ran off with it. A few moments later she returned, grasped the second one and disappeared. I held my hand motionless, expecting her to return, which she soon did, making off with the third one. Then she carried the remaining three youngsters away from the nest one by one. After the last trip, I saw her no more, nor did I follow her for fear of further frightening the tiny creature which I had already disturbed so rudely by disrupting her home.—JOHN K. TERRES.

and this the sisters felt unseemly and did their best to dampen. Every day he joined in the rites of tea. In his own cup was only warm milk with a teaspoonful or so of tea to lend illusion, but he learned to pass cups, he learned to hold the fragile, transparent porcelain gracefully. He learned to stand up when a lady entered. He learned to say "No sir," and "Yes, Miss Haddock." And since he was about a size four when he was six, this was all considered charming and precocious. And he fitted the Ely girls' drawing room to perfection. They went in for miniature objects. Frail little Dresden vases and figures, spindly, beautifully carved furniture covered with light and easily smudged fabrics. The room might be looked at approvingly over a precious teacup, but it was not meant to be lived in.

And there were no jolly meals on the kitchen table in the basement. All meals were served formally in the dining room, though the Ely sisters prepared them themselves. They went in for casserole dishes because they kept hot best on the journey up in the dumb-waiter, and there were always salads, because they used up things and made a showing on the table. Dishes were more important than food, and the dishes were always of the best. The everyday set was Limoges and the glassware was long-stemmed crystal, the silver heavy with an ornate straight E on the handles. For dessert there always had a scanty serving of fruit or two sardines and cheese. Occasionally there was a dish of junket pudding for Johnny.

That it took an enormous effort to maintain this dignity was not realized by the little boy of course. That all the fine dishes had to be washed with great care, that all the fussy figurines had to be dusted, that the many silver pieces had to be polished, that the linens had to be washed and ironed—these

The sisters considered "help" when Johnny came to them, but they decided against it. Without ever saying so, they agreed that it was up to them to be elegant by themselves, without getting any domestic in on their little economies. No, they decided, they could manage by themselves. But they were not young and the effort they had to make was considerable. Nevertheless, they were sustained by the consciousness of doing their duty and by the reward of having such a satisfactory little boy to exhibit to their friends. Even his frailty was a source of satisfaction to them. It seemed to them somehow a matter of fine breeding that he should be so small and so hard to feed.

He was so lonely those first months with his great-aunts that it is a wonder he did not die of it. He wondered constantly about his mother and father. That they had gone to join "the great Oneness" was no comfort to him at all. He thought for a long time that they would come back from the great Oneness and get him and he was all waiting for a period of months. There was never a walk home from school, always beside one of the tall aunts, that he did not have a hope that when he got up the two flights of stairs his mother would be sitting in one of the carved chairs in the drawing room. Hope deferred maketh the heart sick, and Johnny's heart was truly sick that year. In the spring he was so white that the sisters, after much consultation as to whether a doctor was necessary, gave him a tonic, very bitter.

During the summer they sometimes took him to the park to play. They took turns taking him, sitting stiffly on a bench, feeling somewhat annoyed that he did not occupy himself more childishly. But there was no one to play with and he took to dragging a book along and curling up somewhere under a tree and reading the afternoons away. Once a boy did say to him, "Want to sail my boat?" and he went with the boy, suddenly excited and happy, but Aunt Maria called to him at once "John!" and that was the end of that. "You never know who these children are," she explained. "He might have measles or whooping cough—you never know."

Of course there were other children in Miss Haddock's school, but they didn't like

The sisters had ex- ed the journey to be made by train, and were immediately apprehensive.

Now don't fuss," Mr. Barnaby said rfully. "I've got a good warm blanket we're not going to the North Pole. The 's not made of china. We'll get on fine, 't we, young man?"

Yes, sir," Johnny said.

Ir. Barnaby's bushy brows went up norously at that politeness, but he just ned and said, "This the luggage? Then s get going, shall we? Your grandma's king great plans for supper!"

After they had gone Sophronia fussed ound the room nervously for some time. en said, "We shouldn't have let him go. e's not made of the same stuff they are. ney'll give him all sorts of indigestible food d he'll come back sick."

They were both feeling a little guilty be- use of the real reason they had had for lowing the trip, but they never said so.

They needn't have felt guilty. For the rst time in almost a year young John Thack- ay Ely was happy. Though it was a cold and ustery day, he felt flowing into him again e warmth he had known in the little brick house. There was something about the big man with mittened hands on the wheel of the old car that was all warmth. The red big face, the bushy brows, the friendly grin—all were warm. Johnny wanted to cry for happiness -he hadn't known how cold he had been all these months.

"Sir, will we have a tree?" he managed to say at last.

"'Gramp' will do, son," Mr. Barnaby said. "And we certainly will have a tree. There's one up on the hill I've been saving, and I thought we could go up there tomorrow and cut it. Ever cut a tree?"

"No, not yet."

"Well, we'll see what kind of a woodsman you are. All the Barnabys have had a knack with trees."

"Am I a Barnaby?"

"Sure are-- half one."

Then they didn't talk much, just drove through the wintry countryside, getting farther and farther from New York. It was dark when they got to the farm, drove up to the back door and got out.

"Well, here we are, son," Grandpa Barnaby said.

Then the door opened and, with the warm light of the kitchen all around her, there stood grandma, plump, merry-faced, with a big apron on over a blue dress. If her eyes on him were for an instant sad, there was nothing sad about the way she hugged and kissed him, drew him into the big kitchen, urged him out of his things and said, "Now hurry up, Will—we're going to have dumplings and I'm putting them in right this minute!"

They ate in the kitchen. The Ely sisters would have been shocked if they had seen the number of dumplings Johnny stowed away.

"I feel full," he said at last.

Grandma Barnaby laughed heartily. "Now that's funny!" she said. "I'll tell you—suppose you put the scraps on that plate in the corner for the dog, will you? I've got a few things to do around here and that would be a help."

After a while he was in a big bed in a room with a register that was nice to stand over.

Grandma came in and said, "Everything all comfy?" She bent over and kissed him.

He slept almost at once, not waiting for anything.

Pancakes and sausage and eggs and a tall glass of milk, maple sirup from a jug with roses on the side. A tramp up across a hilly field through the snow and into the woods pulling the sled. Gramp saying, "Right the first time! Yes, sir! Got the Barnaby knack all right. Now I'll take a swing and then you." Gramp's ax was bigger, but the hatchet was big enough, just right for him. They cut the tree down, roped it onto the sled.

They set it up in the living room, where there was a big stove that you could see the fire in through the isinglass doors. Grandma Barnaby brought down from the attic some big pasteboard boxes filled with ornaments, the most beautiful things Johnny had ever seen. An angel with glittering wings, a swan, two birds of paradise, a balloon, stars and bells and balls, ropes of tinsel.

"I guess your gramp better fix the angel on top," grandma said, "but maybe you can manage the rest. That brown stool's good and sturdy you can stand on that for the high things. Your mamma always wanted the angel on the very top."

Johnny stood there very still by the tree, looking down at the rag carpet. Then he said, "Will my mother come for Christmas?"

When they are scarcely more than infants, our children begin to judge us. They judge us by the very principles that we inculcate. We must be serious without being tiresome: both firm and yielding: gentle, yet armed with authority: indulgent as well as just. We must be virtuous, which is not easy, or at any rate appear so, which is not easy either. Above all, we must be sure of ourselves: when our children ask advice on some point, we must give them a prompt answer, and it must be the right one! They must never be able to say: "Daddy was mistaken." It is essential that we should appear to them as at once exemplary and infallible. Everybody is not equal to the task. Yet paternity is a career that is imposed upon you one fine morning without any inquiry as to your fitness for it. That is why there are many fathers who have children, but very few children who have fathers.

*REG. U. S. PAT. OFF

There was a long moment while grandma was still, too, folding the apron over her hands, her brown eyes taking on depths of sorrow. Then she went over to the old green rocker, took Johnny in her arms, held him close and rocked a little. There were tears running down her round face and she did not wipe them away.

"No, she won't be here for Christmas," grandma said. "It don't seem possible, but she won't be here. She liked Christmas best of all the children, your mamma did. Almost as quick as school opened in the fall she began to get ready for Christmas. I don't know why she had to go. I don't know, Johnny. But she's gone and she won't come back. She'd want us to have a merry Christmas, though. There's all your cousins coming—she'd want them to have fun. You too—she'd certainly want you to have fun."

And then grandma began to tell him about things his mother used to do in this house. About funny things she said. About the garden she made one year that turned out so queer. About how she learned to ski and broke her leg jumping. About how she spent her last penny for presents one year and had to walk ten miles home loaded with packages. And Johnny's heart stopped its too fast thumping and he lay there quietly in grandma's arms and even gave soft little chuckles now and again and grandma laughed, too, though there were still tears on her face. He knew now that his mother wouldn't ever come back. That hope was gone, but he was comforted all the same. He was greatly comforted.

After a while he finished the tree; for the cousins, he told himself, but it was partly for himself, too, as if his mother were there helping make the magic for him. Instead of the vast, waiting emptiness, he seemed somehow to have his mother again, even though he couldn't see her.

When it came dusk, Miles, the hired man, came for the milk pails. "You want to go help Miles with the milking?" grandma said. Miles lived in a little house beyond the barn. Sometimes his wife Sairy came and helped grandma when she was "in a pinch."

It was coming back from the barn, carrying the lantern ahead of Miles in the path, that the train whistled down the valley, that mournful, lonely sound that made him small: an orphan, that made the world too big and loneliness one's lot.

"Hold that lantern a little higher, Jack!" Miles said good-naturedly.

Jack—he grew big again, strong, proud. No one had ever called him "Jack" before.

And no one ever called him "Jack" again. He never spent another Christmas with the Barnabys. That was all he had of those warm, hearty relatives, for grandpa had pneumonia that next spring and died and grandma went away from the farm, went out to South Dakota to live with Uncle Charlie. She wrote him letters sometimes and sent him little packages, but he never saw her again. He went back to the house of his aunts, strained his young heart on all those stairs in the tall house, passed teacups, ate his finicky, insufficient meals, read till he had to have glasses at twelve.

At thirteen the doctor called in for bronchitis discovered a slight heart murmur. "He'll outgrow it, probably," the doctor said. "Better not do too much going up and down stairs; no sports for a while, no bicycling."

But what did you do in a house like a ladder? You never had gone in for sports nor ever had a bicycle. But you had to go up and down stairs.

"The Elys have always been delicate," Aunt Sophronia said, making his heart murmur something like a badge of honor.

He lay there in the prim room that looked not like a boy's room at all, but the room of an immaculate spinster. He didn't mind being sick. It was a kind of relief. But there was something he wanted. He wanted to be warm, he wanted to be loved. But years had gone by now in the tall house, years since he had experienced what it was to be really warm. He knew no life but this unnatural one of elegance and scrimping combined, of books and y linen.

Dead now. Knowing the sea of night to be ultimate wave. "No, thanks," Young, E., had said. "I don't care to appear at any ok fair. I haven't time—and besides, I'm not the type, do you think?"
Oh, yes, you're the type all right, Mr. Ely had thought. You have a face that'll be your fortune if you let it be seen by the old ladies and romantic girls. But it's quite all right with me, my boy, whether you appear or hide. No, hide, nurse your gift in secret, in darkness.
You're very, very young. Too young to be found in gray linen. But you are one of the "promising" ones, and on the promising ones we feed. If you force the bloom you weaken the plant. . . . But then, was it not better that you had had that one thin book in gray linen than nothing? Did it not comfort you a little when the waves of fear swept toward you, over you, Young, E. J.?

"The thing accomplished never comforts," the unicorn said. "When the poem is written it is dead and gone. The you that wrote it is dead and gone. Brief moment of rapture while the words flow—and then it is behind you. You reach toward the next one in the reaching lies the growth."

"There was no poem ever written that equaled dying for one's country," the lion said.

"He'll start reciting Gunga Din or Recessional in a minute if you don't stop him," the starling said.

The lion began in a deep rumbling voice:

"God of our fathers, known of old — Lord of our far-flung battle line ——"

THE unicorn said with scorn, "Let us have gods of the wind and the stars, the sun, the moon, the night, if you must have gods! But of battle lines? How barbaric! . . . He thought of sand sores and flies, Mr. Ely, not of poems or God. He lay in the sun a long time dying, Mr. Ely. He gave one thought to Cass, because she had lunch with him before he sailed, and wore the red hat, and talked about his next book, because she knew so well that it was the next one that was all-important."

"She never told me she had lunch with him," Mr. Ely said.

"This is getting interesting!" the starling said.

"How narrow is our vision of the faithful heart!" the unicorn said. "To die in battle—one has kept the faith. To refrain from lunch with young poets—one is faithful. How stupid! How small the mind that so conceives faithfulness!"

I must sleep, Mr. Ely said. I must sleep or I shall die.

He got out of the bed, very cautiously, keeping his head turned so that he could not look at the tapestry. He crept in his bare feet toward the door, slipped through it, closed the door gently but firmly behind him, drew a deep sigh of relief and went toward the stairs, down them, came into the huge living room and walked over to one of the great brown velvet sofas flanking the hearth. He dropped down into the softness, pulled a striped afghan that lay along the back of the sofa down over him.

I wish I had some slippers, he said.

As if conjured by his thoughts, a pair of furry scuffs stuck their noses out from under the edge of the sofa. He reached for them, put them on. They must be Aggie's, not Sid's, but the fact did not for the moment disturb him—that he should have feet small enough to wear a woman's slippers. Aggie was a big woman, anyway, taller, heavier than he. He wrapped himself again in the afghan, sank into the softness of the long sofa.

But he did not sleep. He was away from all of them. He was warm and comfortable. But he did not sleep. He was wide-awake, aware of the room, sharply aware of everything. He had been in the room before, but he had not really seen it.

It's a good room, he said. A very good room.

There was nothing gay or surprising about it as there was about his own living room. There were no knickknacks, nothing that could not be used by children, though Aggie and Sid had no children. But the furniture was sturdy and a little battered. The velvet on the arms and edges of the sofas was a little frayed. The rug was a huge red Oriental with gray-blue design. There was a large carved table back of the sofa where Mr. Ely lay and it was covered with books and magazines. One end of a great roll-top desk with many drawers came up to the back of the opposite sofa and extended to the window. At one far corner stood the grand piano, over its wide shelf an interesting cover of some sort of fine, nearly brittle leather. Indian, perhaps. To the ceilings everywhere were books. On the leather cover of the piano stood the sculptured head of a child, and beyond it, on the wall by the front door which was never used, a large portrait of Sid, done by Aggie. Aggie was not a professional, but the picture looked like Sid, bold, big, sensitive—though not so sensitive as was the painter.

Aggie and Sid had lived here ten years, but the house looked as if they had lived in it forever.

He thought of their own drawing room. It, too, was a big room, but there the likeness to this ended. It was a gay room with bright linen hangings and a linen cover on the sofa facing the fire. Over the mantel was the picture of the Spanish house, white walls and red-tiled roofs and little iron balcony, blue sky, and the priest walking past. The priest had a sinister, a Moorish look, but the picture was full of sun and warmth. There were always flowers in the room, generally something you did not expect, some color you might have thought would clash with everything else, but which never did. Cass had a genius for flowers. By the hearth stood a small eight-sided table with a kettle and alcohol burner, teacups; on the undershelf a lacquered box of Chinese tea. The alcohol burner was always filled; it always worked, he thought with sudden wonder. But worked for what? For whom?

"I wanted to ask you to tea, but John had the place cluttered up with some of his authors. Authors are not amusing people, darling, popular opinion notwithstanding. John really uses the house for an office. If I were Cass I'd put a stop to it. She's bored, but she lets him do it. It seems that a contract can't be signed without a certain number of highballs."

A muscle twitched along the side of Mr. Ely's face. She had known he heard her. She had known it very well. Why didn't he go in and say, "Get out of here. This is my house and I will have authors or anybody I please in it. And Cass is not bored. She has never been bored in her life"?

Why didn't I say it to her? Mr. Ely said.

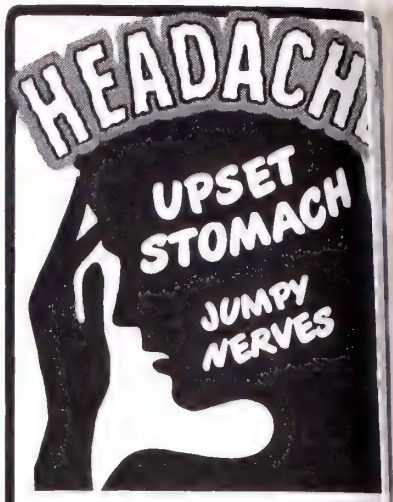
Why didn't he? Why didn't he? He could see her slender, almost scrawny hands, see the bright-red nails.

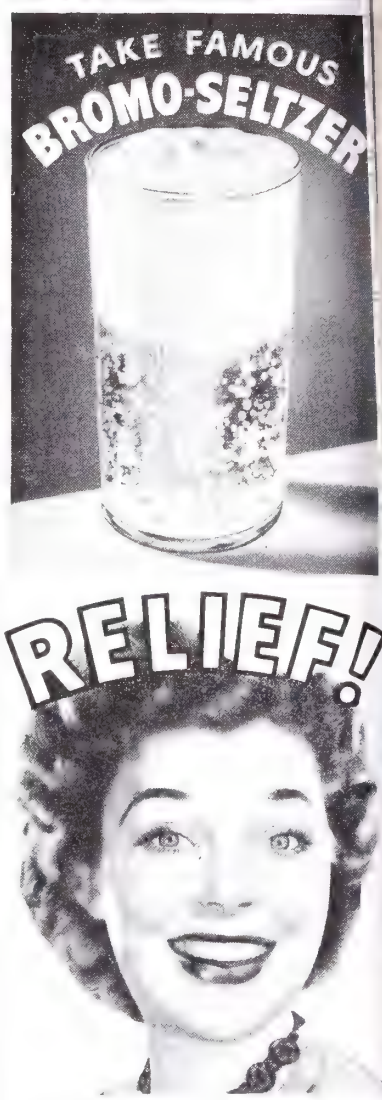
"Look, Cass, what did you think of Holden? Like him?"

"Not much," Cass said. "Did you?"

It was true then. The rock on which he could build up indignation against Bertha was hollow. Cass had been bored. Well, Holden was a conceited jackanapes. But that didn't mean all authors were. She'd had lunch with Young, Edgar J. . . . How did he know she had? Who'd said so? They'd said so.

He burrowed into the softness of the sofa, willing sleep, blessed oblivion, but sleep did not come. He could not get his mind to work in a straight line, however. It kept working on a tangent. All this day had been like that, and the night was getting progressively worse. But then, all the year had been working toward it, had been a sort of nightmare. All the year? It went back farther than that.





Three-way distress calls for three-way relief. So when headache, upset stomach and jumpy nerves all hit at once, take Bromo-Seltzer. It fights ordinary headaches three ways:

1. Relieves pain of headache
2. Relieves discomfort of upset stomach
3. Quiets jumpy nerves

—all of which may team up to cause trouble.

Simply put teaspoonful in a glass and add water. Bromo-Seltzer effervesces with split-second action . . . ready to go to work at once. Caution: Use only as directed.

"How was he de-

"By marriage. By ttempting to live a ife alien to his breed-ng your mother, Johnny. I dare say she was an estimable person in her way. But she was not your father's kind. When you marry, Johnny, as I suppose you will one of these days, choose someone of your own kind or you will never know happiness."

She had given him the picture of his father, in a little deep-set frame beaded with gold.
A little younger than the father he remembered, but still like him. A boyish, thin, nervous, sensitive face, eyes intelligent and lonely, nose thin and straight like all the Ely noses. He was grateful for the picture, but he was angry too. He felt that Aunt So-phronia was giving him the picture not out of love, but as a warning. A warning not to follow in his father's footsteps.

Deflected. Aunt Sophronia's cold, thin, proud voice seemed to sound in Aggie's big comfortable room. Well, had he been deflected? Would his talent ever have flowered in the tall house? There wasn't much to show for his father's years of painting. Woman Paring Apples. There was that, of course. He had gone many times to the gallery where it hung. It was very fine, bold, warm, earthy.
What else?

"DIDN'T my father leave any other pictures than the one in the gallery?" he asked once.
"Nothing of any value," Aunt Sophronia said. "There was a pile of rather crude things—I gave them to a friend of his."
"Who was the friend?"
"I have no idea. An unpleasant man who needed a shave. They should have been destroyed. They were not worthy of his talent.
But this man begged for them and I was weak enough to give them to him."

I was only fourteen or so, but I should somehow have found out, Mr. Ely said. I ought to have found out somehow. I thought of it, but I didn't know how to start. I didn't know whom to ask, where to begin. And now they are gone, the years are gone. I will never see them. Perhaps they were crude—Aunt Sophronia had taste, one can't deny her that—but I should like to see them all the same.

HE opened his eyes and looked at the picture of Sid Emerson.

I don't like you very much, he said coldly.
*There are too many of you. You don't do the theater any good. It is too easy to be ironic and amused. You learned the patter early and you never deviate. Only Aggie believes in you—
there must be something.
I do not think you could fool Aggie. She says you are writing a really good play. I wonder. I wonder if you could. Aggie has lived up here in the woods with you for ten years and it hasn't broken her.
She loves you. Nothing has deflected her from loving you. There must be something there I don't see. You're not her kind. You pose—she never does. Or maybe you can never say off-hand who's what kind.
She has never thought I was Cass' kind. But I was. Once I was.*

"So you had to follow suit?" Cass said.
"It's the 'slut in costume' period in the publishing business, so you had to follow suit."
She put the book down and stood looking down at it in its bright jacket. The advance orders had been staggering.

"It might as well be a slut in costume who pays the rent as anyone," he said.

She just stood there, looking down at the book, saying nothing.
The light was on her fair hair, done with a part in the middle in back and swept up to some soft pile on top.

"Hadn't it?" he insisted.

She said, still looking down, still standing so the light fell on her hair, "That won't do, Johnny. It just won't do any more. You want this apartment for yourself."

He wanted to strike her, strike Cass, his Cass. He was shocked at the rage that swept through him. . . .

He was walking down Fifth Avenue with Aggie Emerson. She had on a camel's-hair coat and a brown beret and her lively brown hair flew out around the edges. She wore heavy walking shoes and her handbag was worn. She looked what she was, a woman in from the country for the day. It was March and there were forsythia and pussy willows and daffodils and pots of crocuses in the windows.

"I've just driven the most unholy bargain in bulbs," Aggie said. "I'm going to have a whole bank of daffodils. . . . Cass told me about the man."

"Cass? Have you seen her?"

"Had lunch with her. I hope you know how lucky you are, Johnny."

"What d'you mean?"

"Nicest woman I've ever known, bar none."

"Yes," he said.

On Mark Twain's trip to the Holy Land, he met a young fellow named Langdon. Visiting the boy's cabin one night, Twain saw a picture of Olivia Langdon. It was a case of love at first look.

Back in America, Mark made it his business to get an invitation to the Elmira, New York, mansion of the wealthy Langdon family. Here he spent a week end. The lovely Olivia was even more charming than he had imagined her to be. He knew that she was the one girl he wanted to marry, but he was only a strug-gling reporter. So he didn't have the nerve to propose.

Came the day for his visit to end. Mark slipped out to the stables and bribed the coachman to fix the car-riage seat so that it would upset and dump him out. Then he packed his bag, told everybody good-by, and climbed to his seat. The servant cracked his whip, the horses jumped forward, and the back seat turned over. In an instant, there was Twain on the ground—with his eyes closed, and groaning.

Naturally, Mr. Langdon insisted that he be carried back into the house and put to bed. The hastily summoned doctor could discover no injuries. But that didn't keep Mark from spending two weeks in bed—with Olivia as nurse!

After the pretense could be kept up no longer, he announced one day that he would get dressed and walk about a bit. He called Olivia to help him get on his shoes. As she tied the second knot, he whispered, "Livy, will you marry me?"

And the answer was "Yes!"

RIDE makes for silliness," said the uni- n. "Pride, which grows out of fear. Man lds the bars in his own mind. It is the s that are the mirage, Mr. Ely. . . . They e silly, true, the spinsters in the tall house, y and vain, but they were all of a piece. at is something. There were no chinks the armor of their silliness and vanity. ey had integrity in their vanity. It takes ne manipulation of the mind, some irage, to build your pride around a olish small name like 'Ely.' Pitiful—but ere is something there to admire, you must mit."

"No, I do not admit it. It was cold and eary there. I was always hungry in that use."

"Ah, but pride is fed on different things, r. Ely! One can be proud of despising other's pride. Let us say, for argument's ke, that your hunger was your pride. Not be satisfied with junket pudding and small, iserly economies for the sake of outward ow. The artist in his attic is proud of his nger too."

"And should he not be?"

"You see? You do not know the first letter the alphabet of freedom, Mr. Ely!"

"I suppose you are not proud to be unique mong creatures?" Mr. Ely said a little pitefully.

There came a soft, breezelike laugh from the unicorn. "That was clever of you, Mr. Ely. But let us keep to the general. Yours is a searching soul and so worth saving. Your bars are thin."

"That's what you think!" Mr. Ely said with tired impudence.

"They are made of mist," the unicorn insisted.

"It may be that I scorned their pride," Mr. Ely admitted. "But the hunger was real."

Again came the soft laugh, like wind, softer than wind, hardly a sound at all.

V

THERE was nothing wrong with Booking. It was a good school, not especially snobbish, sound in scholastics. It did not ignore sports, but it placed them below a thorough grounding in Latin in importance. But John Thackeray Ely was not happy there. No one was unkind to him. Such talents as he had were recognized, and in his senior year he was editor of the school magazine. He won honors in both English and Latin, and he was respected and not persecuted in any way whatsoever. He was voted "the best-dressed boy in the school."

Still, he was not happy, though he seldom said definitely to himself that he was unhappy. He worked hard and his scholastic triumphs were taken for granted by the great-aunts. But somewhere beyond his accomplishments, somewhere beyond the borders of his small, intelligent world, lay a country whose green grass lured him with a persistence that never died. This world was represented in his heart by a boy known as "Buzz"—Buzz Beebe. It would have amazed even Johnny himself to realize how much of his thinking time was given upto Buzz Beebe.

Buzz was a big, red-headed boy with dancing brown eyes. He was no student and spent five years getting through Booking. He had a crooked nose and no good looks at all. But he was so full of life that he could not contain it all and let the surplus pour out on everyone he met. He was earthy, inclined to be bawdy, though without giving offense, and he had a rollicking, infectious laugh that made strangers grin at him in the street. No project was too small for his exuberant energies. He played football, not as if to bring honor to Booking, but just because he found it exciting enough, rough enough for his nature. His jackets and trousers never matched and were never pressed. He wore dirty old sweaters and sneakers or scruffy shoes. In spite of his clothes he always gave the impression of a clean, vital body. There wasn't a girl who didn't like him, and he liked all the girls.

The first time Johnny saw Buzz was one day when Buzz came out of the drugstore on a hot fall afternoon at the opening of school carrying two ice-cream cones. Double deckers. Buzz stood there an instant, grinning at the cones, his red hair standing up in a frowzled crest. Then he saw Johnny and reached out a cone to him.

"Here—take one!" he said. "They're going to melt on me before I can get to 'em."

And they had walked down the street together eating the cones. Johnny hated ice-cream cones. They always dribbled and he didn't like the end of the cone and never knew what to do with it, being of the tidy nature that disliked throwing things in the street. He was dressed immaculately, as always. The ice cream dripped to his suit and he stopped in the street and tried to wipe the spot off.

Buzz gave his hearty laugh and said, "Fussy!" but not as if he were making fun of Johnny, just in a friendly mockery.

A Yorkshireman was so confident of the result of a general-knowledge competition between himself and a Scotsman that he offered to pay a pound note for any question he could not answer, on condition that the Scotsman paid up a shilling for each question that he in turn could not answer.

The Scotsman thought hard for a while, and then asked, "What is it that has a hundred legs, can fly backward, and can be folded and put into your waistcoat pocket?"

After a while the Yorkshireman gave in. "All right, you've won," he said good-naturedly, and handed the Scotsman a pound note. Then he asked, "Well, what's the answer?"

"I dinna ken," replied the Scotsman, and handed him a shilling.

But Johnny was fussy. He had been trained in the 64th Street house to be fussy. He couldn't wipe it out of his nature.

Then Buzz had stopped at the corner of Vine, wiping his hands along his grimy trousers, and said with a grin, "Guess I'll see what Polly's up to. Want to come?" He was always perfectly willing to share his girls, his life, his ice-cream cones with anyone, as if he knew that all were inexhaustible.

Johnny longed to go. He knew who Polly was—the young girl who helped out in the candy store after school hours. But he said, "Sorry—got to study."

Buzz laughed again. "Well, so long!"

Not an important encounter, one would say, but it proved important to Johnny. It was the pattern for all their encounters at Booking. Buzz was always being generous, always off on little adventures with the fair sex, and Johnny was always wiping spots off, being about to study. Johnny certainly didn't admire Buzz's mind. Buzz didn't really think at all, and Johnny had a good deal of discrimination as far as intellect went. But Buzz had something Johnny didn't have, a hearty appetite for action, a whole-souled willingness to gobble life whole without analysis. That was what Johnny wanted, and wanted desperately.

It wasn't that other boys never talked with him. There was a small group he might have designated as friends, boys with good heads and not too much physical strength, boys who fancied themselves as poets or potential novelists, boys interested in the school magazine or the glee club. These boys respected Johnny's taste and ability, and matters of policy on the magazine or arguments about religion or literature were often referred to him.

And he busied himself with these boys, pretended that their companionship was something special. All the time he wanted something else. Wanted it and wanted it and wanted it, though he, when he was with his usual companions, professed himself as so far beyond the world of the Buzz Beebes that that world was hardly worth commenting on.

Once Buzz came up to him when a group was standing talking in the path by the library, flung his arm across Johnny's slender shoulders and said, "Hi, there, old crease-in-the-pants!" It shows how meager was Johnny Ely's life that years afterward he still remembered Buzz Beebe's voice saying that, felt the exact sensation when Buzz had put his arm on his shoulders. But at the time he drew away almost at once.

Buzz was at the back of nearly all the rowdyism that went on in school. He it was who superintended the building of celebration bonfires, who made a snow man that was a wonderful caricature of old Bony, the president of Booking, who incited the strike in Cicero class one spring, who broke all rules as if they were made for that particular purpose. He had no fear of anyone, and if anything had to be asked of an instructor, if any complaint was to be lodged against the cook, Buzz it was who did the asking, the cajoling. He had no particular friends but was a friend to all, without discrimination.

Juniors and seniors were allowed permission to go to occasional parties in town, provided they came at the week end, and provided their destinations were approved and they got in by midnight. During Buzz Beebe's time at Booking, this privilege was used more than at any time before or after. Any kind of party was meat to Buzz. I the kind he especially liked was a good fashioned country square dance, full bounce and swing and squeaky violin lusty calls. He somehow got acquaint probably by just lifting his brows at her o country road sometime, with a girl cal Matey Bean, a big, jolly country girl, v like Buzz himself. This girl went to coun dances at the rate of one a week through winter, and these were mostly held in an deserted cheese factory at a crossroads kno as Watt's Corners.

THESE dances at the cheese factory w Buzz's special joy. He generally sig out to go to town to some respecta house known to the authorities, but most every week he and probably two three cohorts attended these dances, pulli all sorts of subterfuges to cover up the h they returned. They were harmless-enou affairs, but the boys who did not accompa Buzz looked on them as some perversion, nice, something much wickeder and wil than they were, though there was pr ably not a boy at Booking who would r have gone with Buzz if invited.

At Christma time of Johnn last year, he said Aunt Sophroni "Would you mi if I used my Chri mas money for so dancing lessons?"

"Why, I thi that would be a ve good idea, Johr Aunt Sophron said. "I have ways thought th nothing gave a p son better presen than the ability dance well."

She even went the trouble of fin ing who was consi ered the best teach and of making appointment f him. He spent mo of that vacation those lessons. H was good enough it, too, for he w slender and gracef and had a natur rhythm. He had reached his full height no and was, though not tall, no longer a runt.

Then, filled with a new excitement, h went back to school. The very first day h managed to walk from class back to the do mitory with Buzz.

"Anything doing at Watt's Corners Satu day night?" he asked carelessly though h felt the palms of his hands going moist.

"Sure! Sure! Want to get in on it?"

"Don't mind," Johnny said, soundin more superior than he felt.

"Okay, keed! Matey's going to pick us u in town at half past eight—out by the Bap tist church." Then he gave his loud heart laugh and said, "It's not Mrs. God's, yo know—they'll muss you up!" He found i funny, the thought of Johnny at Watt's Cor ners, but he was perfectly willing to take him

The reference to Mrs. God had to do wit a very refined little dancing club in town ru by a Mrs. Gottlieb. This club gave a sprin dance that was approved by the authorities and many of the boys attended it. But it wa not for boys like Buzz.

So Johnny Ely went to the cheese factory and found out what sort of orgies were held there. He had put on his best suit, though al his clothes always looked like his best. He put on his favorite tie, though it was a littl bright for most times. He looked exactly what he was, a clever, studious young intro vert, the editor of the Booking Scholastic dressed to a nicety a little strange in a prep school boy, his hair carefully combed, his glasses polished glitteringly. He looked more sophisticated than his companions. He had to put it briefly, the Ely air.

The dance was all Johnny had expected of it, and more. At least more in itself. The crowd was mostly country people, strapping, tough-fibered boys and girls. The factory had a big, barren hall with a battered old piano in it, and at one end a long rough table with benches along it. Benches along the sides. A big pot-bellied stove. That was all the furniture. The people furnished it. The fiddles furnished it. Buzz was welcomed with greetings from all sides, and his companions felt excited as if the greetings were for them, too, and they took on a jauntiness that they did not always show at Booking, a boldness, a freedom of speech and movement. Or all but Johnny, though he felt at first this sudden relaxing as if it were a physical thing.

Buzz at once seized a fat woman, the wife of one of the fiddlers, shouted, "Come on now, Mrs. Garry—no shirking!" and swung her into the dance. People laughed and everything became a little more fun because Buzz was there.

Then it was one reel after another, the shaking of the old floor, the clapping of hands, the stamp of feet, the rush down the middle, the crazy, swift, joyous rhythm of the fiddles, the shouts from the lusty old man with the mustaches who did the calling: "All join hands and swing down the middle! . . . Swing your partner for a do-si-do! . . . Advance from your corners—now back to back!" And then Bingo, with Buzz's voice ringing out more joyously, more heartily than all the rest: "There was a farmer had a dog, had a dog, had a dog. There was a farmer had a dog and a Bingo was his name. . . . B-i-n-g-o, go, B-i-n-g-o, go, B-i-n-g-o, go, and a Bingo was his name, sir!" Buzz at the end of a line advancing to meet the girls from across the hall, swinging his girl with a rough abandon that she seemed to like, his red head seeming a symbol of the fire of energy that burned within him.

John Thackeray Ely at first felt only a crazy joy at being part of the fun. This was it. This was what he had hungered after year after year. He didn't say that to himself, but he felt it. Though he was unfamiliar with the dances, it was not hard for him to follow the steps. He did everything the rest did and was happy—at first—and tremendously excited.

Then as he linked arms with a red-faced jolly woman, she said to him with a comfortable grin, "Unbend, sonny! Have to limber up for this stuff, you know." After that he went to the corner to get a drink from the tin pail. The dance started up without him and he stood there holding the dipper and was suddenly conscious of a distaste for drinking from the dipper that had been used by all the rest. He put the dipper back into the pail, and as he did so some of his joy died out of him. He stood watching the dancers, and for a moment they were far away, the noise, the stamping and clapping, the fiddles were all far off and had nothing to do with him. Buzz was still going full steam, none of his life abated. At that moment he advanced from a corner and swung Matey Bean around so that her feet left the floor. It seemed as if he hadn't tried to lift her, that he had strength to spare, though Matey was a big girl. And Johnny knew in that moment that he couldn't have done that, not if he had practiced for years. He might be a precise and graceful dancer, but this kind of dancing required life, not grace, and he didn't have that kind of life to give it. He couldn't "unbend."

He slipped outside and felt the cold air on his hot face. It was a still night, there was snow on the ground, and the sky was thick with stars. That he knew the names of many of the stars did not comfort him, nor that he might have written an admirable sonnet to them. He was lonely, lonely and confused.

Love is a strange thing. It is a flower so delicate that a touch will bruise it, and so strong that nothing will stop its growth. Think how often we miss love in a lifetime—by a wrong gesture, by an unspoken word, by not keeping silent at the right time. We lose it by the interference of other people, by a lack of money; by a quarrel over a trifle; and yet we cannot live without it. —DION CLAYTON CALTHROP: Hyacinth (Williams & Norgate, Ltd.).

He was too young to say, "It's all right I am a critic of life—that must constitute joy." He could only stand there in the c feeling himself an outsider, all the danc lessons gone for nought. He was conscious his slight body, his too good clothes, his ca ful enunciation. It seemed to him t he hated what he was, that he was sl out by fate from life itself, that being precocious little twig of the Ely tree v less than nothing beside the hearty anim vigor of the dancers in the old cheese f tory.

At last he began to shiver and he we back into the hot hall, joined in the dan again, but all the rest of the evening he f awkward and out of place, and he was gl when the dance was over and they were pili into Matey Bean's creaky old flivver a headed toward town again.

The rest sang noisily, but Johnny Ely w quiet in his corner. They were let out a blo away from the school and made their wa stealthily across the snowy yard to a cell door that they had arranged to be left u locked.

They all had to attend chapel Sunda mornings, and when they were in chapel ne morning Buzz winked at him from across th aisle and he tried to grin a conspiratorial gr back at him, but his face felt stiff and to haughty. When one of the boys who ha never been to Watt's Corners asked hi eagerly about it, he said, "Oh, it wasn't s much. Just a lot of horseplay!"

And when Buzz aske him the next week h he wanted to go again he said, "Oh, I gues not. I've got to ge started on my them paper before mid years!"

"You can rattle tha off in a tick!" Buzz said. "Or aren't w high-brow enough fo you?" He spoke lazily good-naturedly, not with malice at all.

"Don't be silly!" Johnny said uncomfortably. "It was fun. But I've got a couple guardians who don't think it's funny if I don't get good marks!"

Buzz said, "Gee, I'm glad my dad is pleased if I just squeak through. He knows I'm a moron and he makes the best of it."

Johnny never went to Watt's Corners again. Sometimes he went to Mrs. Gottlieb's dances and danced with precise circumspection with the nicest girls in town. But it was a thin pleasure compared with the lusty romping of the factory dances and he never enjoyed it much. He knew what it was now to have fun, to let yourself go, to use the whole body without stint. The polite little giggles and sly smiles of the "nicest girls" were meager fare to one who had heard Matey Bean's hearty laughter when Buzz swung her off her feet and whirled her about as feet stamped and hands clapped and fiddles screeched.

Buzz Beebe's most ambitious escapade that winter had to do with Johnny's own pet project, the Booking Scholastic. This paper came out once a week and every student and the professors, too, read it. Buzz and some of his satellites knew a girl in town—well, they knew many, but this girl was the daughter of a printer. Buzz evolved this scheme of printing an edition of the Scholastic that should be a take-off of the pseudoliterary contents of the usual edition. There were quite a few in on the scheme before he got through, for he had to have cartoons, jokes, someone who knew how to put the stuff together—all that. There was a subdued excitement for weeks ahead.

And Buzz pulled it off. It involved a seizure of the regular edition as it left the printer and a substitution of the new papers, but that was just the sort of thing Buzz enjoyed and presented no difficulties to the bold. It involved paying the printer, but with the aid of the town girl who was the printer's daugh-

Happiness Ahead... When Two Become One

What a wonderful moment for them both . . . when George lifts Janet across the threshold. When their life together really begins! It has to be a modest beginning, so they've planned carefully . . . wisely selecting furniture that can grow with their home . . .

"Honeymoon House" is a 1-room apartment. Space is limited, so Janet and George start their Mengel group with "Mr. & Mrs." Chests that look like a sideboard, yet provide storage for personal and household things.

When they get a bedroom, Janet wants a Commode, a Vanity Table and Bench . . . a striking group, topped by a matching mirror. "Mr. & Mrs." Chests will move in. Twin Beds complete the picture. Mengel open stock design makes matching easy.

When little Janet comes, and more room is needed, they'll buy a Commode for a night-table; another to enlarge the Vanity. For George, a Chest-on-Chest. Simply and economically, they have assembled a beautiful bedroom.

When they have a home of their own, they'll find more advantages in this versatile furniture. Two Commodes and a Chest make a charming buffet. Add matching Table with Chairs . . . and presto! . . . they're ready for a snack or a feast!

We, at Mengel, had a wedding too! For in this graceful group the past and the present become one. The rich lustre and beauty of fine mahogany veneers blend with the crisp clean lines of the modern age . . . to give you furniture with timeless beauty. Furniture that's right at home in any room . . . harmonizing perfectly either with traditional or modern interiors.

And it's *Permanized Furniture. What does that mean? Well, it's Mengel's name for the process we use to keep joints and veneered surfaces from coming apart . . . ever. Regardless of climate. No matter how damp or dry . . . hot or cold.

This is what the Mengel Man Trademark means to furniture. So look for it when you buy. Meantime, ask us to send you a free copy of our new booklet — "Let's Dress Up Your Bedroom." You'll find so many ideas in it for making old rooms look new. Mail the coupon.

ter, and a little pressure on allowances, that was accomplished too. Or at least the residue of the debt was finally paid off by Buzz's father in June.

The paper burst on the school one Friday morning in early March and made a noise that echoed down the years and is still remembered at Booking. It spared no one. It wasn't really malicious, just funny—that is, if you didn't have too thin a skin. Some did, of course. There was one picture of a professor whose false teeth had won him the name of "Old Click-Click" and he seemed to feel too great prominence had been given his teeth in this picture. And there was one of Johnny Ely, notebook in hand, his glasses too big, his nose too sharp, saying, "I must make a note of that for my next sonnet!" Those edged on the cruel, but for the most part it was just hearty laughter, a nose thumbed at snobbery and pretension.

Fuzz Beebe thoroughly enjoyed being called on the carpet for this bit of effrontery. Now and then in the interview with the president, his joyous laugh pealed out as if he couldn't help being amused even when he was in danger of being expelled. As a matter of fact, the president could not restrain an occasional indulgent smile himself.

Buzz never objected to taking full responsibility for the affair. "Booking's getting too snooty," he explained to the president. "Gee, sir—you've got to have a little fun once in a while!"

He wasn't expelled. Booking needed Buzz Beebe, and the authorities were smart enough to realize the fact. They let him get away with it, taking away his off-campus privilege for two months, demanding an apology to the thin-skinned ones. But Buzz Beebe's apologies amounted to little more than, "Gee, can't you take a joke?" And he got off the campus when he wanted to by one means or another. He really got off scot-free.

Johnny Ely, though he had not demanded it, was one to whom an apology was forced. Buzz dropped in at his room one night, grinning his usual friendly grin.

"Been crying on prexy's shoulder, have you?" he said. "Thought you were a good egg and could take it, Johnny."

Johnny flushed. He had never uttered one word of complaint and he was bitterly hurt to think Buzz thought he had. "Don't be silly!" he said more sharply than he had meant to speak. He knew that laughter was the answer, but the truth was that he had been pricked by the cartoon deeper than Buzz or even he realized, and he couldn't laugh. "Nobody's been crying on anybody's shoulder so far as I know."

"Well, prexy's sent me over to apologize, but heck, I wasn't trying to hurt anybody's feelings."

"Nobody said you were. You haven't hurt mine, anyway."

Buzz slapped him on the shoulder. "Knew you were a good egg! Well, so long!"

But it hadn't been quite right, because Johnny had spoken with just the air of the boy in the cartoon, as one too absorbed in his own legitimate business to be even touched by the slapstick humor of morons. And he knew he had so spoken.

The truth was that he envied Buzz the conception of that bit of slapstick nonsense beyond measure. All his careful writing and editing for the Scholastic faded into futile nothingness beside this one shouting number of tomfoolery. It was just another piece in the puzzle of his loneliness and hunger.

When it came June and graduation time and the aunts were there staying in the village for the event, Buzz went around with a leather notebook that had been intended for notes in class and obviously never used for that or anything and got all his classmates to write something in it. Everyone was feeling sentimental at the thought of parting and excited, and each put something special the book. Some pasted snapshots. Bu book became quite a volume before he done with it.

"Hey, Ely—stick your moniker in will you?" he demanded one morning, thr ing the book at Johnny. "I'll pick it up I see Horny."

JOHNNY stood there with the book in hands, while Buzz ran down the stairs wi great noise, sounding as if he had slid the flight. Then Johnny took the book into room and sat on the bed turning the pa It was young humor, crude and somet downright silly, but it was done with g and sentiment. Johnny thought at once drawing he could make. It came, comp to his mind and would, he knew, have m everything all right between him and I forever. He thought of a pen drawing o aunts, very elongated and severe, hol out their glasses in exact unison, their o hands holding a string that was attached hind them to a tiny picture of Johnny self, like a little toy being dragged along would show Buzz that he could laugh himself. He even went over to his desk made a little preliminary drawing and it funny. But then he thought of Aunt phronia and Aunt Maria, of their proud gance, their insistence on good manners. didn't love them much, he thought th pride ridiculous and he resented that he been brought up to their standards, bu pulled the book toward him and wrote simply, "Yours since John Thackeray Ely.'

was awake again. He didn't open his owever, feeling he was winning some triumph over the unicorn by feigning It was the voice of his mind saying g" that woke him. He had said it so lovingly, with none of that caustic edge that makes "darling" so common a word of hate between intimate enemies. And Cass, his darling Cass, his lovely, warm, laughing Cass, came real beside him, cuddling under the afghan with him, not hating him any more, just loving him in the old way, in the way that it had been before she came. There were no sharp edges between them, no walls, no anything. It was such a blessed sensation.

"They didn't happen, darling—these horrible years, did they?" he whispered. "It was all a dream. We couldn't have let them happen, being us, could we? Could we?"

THE cat went on purring and that was the only answer, and after a little the sensation of Cass' nearness faded, and there was a breath of cold in the room, creeping all around Mr. Ely, under the afghan, between his shoulder blades, at his feet, down his neck. He changed the name of the cold to Fear, as addicts of bridge shift to the other side of the bed in the night and call it a "finesse."

I'm five feet five inches—that's not very little, he said. That's big enough. There have been lots of great men shorter than that. My proportions are all right. I've never got fat. With Cass I'm just right. But she's so very little. . . . She always seems tall. I don't. I don't feel tall. . . . What does it matter? Why should I care? She is forever saying, "He's a remarkably fine-looking man, isn't he?" about some six-footer. She said about Larry Hilyer, "But he's so insignificant, darling. So undersize all through!"

She it was who had seen to it that he noticed that remark on him in the gossip column which called him "our elegantly wispy Mr. Ely." It wasn't that, though—it was that she made Cass feel him small and insignificant too. . . . Or was he only afraid that she did?

"Don't be too tidy, Johnny! I can't match you," Cass said. She came into their place on Beekman Street and threw her hat to the table, her jacket to a chair. He didn't mind, not then he didn't mind. He liked it. It was like life sweeping in, like the wind of life blowing through the house. "Why do I get every dish in the house dirty when I get a meal?" she asked ruefully. But then she flew at the dishes and cleaned everything up as neat as a pin. "This is the day I clean my bureau drawers!" she'd say. "Oh, not today!" he'd protested then. "This is the day when we drive up the Hudson and get some dogwood!" And the dogwood sprayed out over their dining-room table and they sat there drinking coffee, drinking the sweetness and the wildness of the dogwood, loving each other, the day, everything. Not thinking about the bureau drawers. And then—and then—"Oh, he'll be down soon, I dare say. There's probably a hair out of place—or he can't decide on a tie!" Making him fussy, making him an old maid.

"Why should men's styles change? Men are all alike."

naturally, it is harder to tear the leech away. But I wouldn't blame my aunts, if I were you, nor your wife, nor even the leech."

"I saw the lifeblood ebbing away—but I am not a man of action," Mr. Ely said.

"You mean you didn't play football when you were young?" the unicorn said with a sardonic waggle of his beard. "Being a man of intellect does not preclude decisions, does it? Though actually it is not a matter of decision, is it, but of a sense of proportion? Do you not think your wife has seen the lifeblood ebbing away also? Do you think her despair is less than yours? Greater, no doubt, because she is kin to the leech. You want all the strength to be hers? But you are aware of the despair; that is something. That is why you lie here, ill and alone. But you must see farther than that, much, much farther."

"It is too late. It is all gone—like smoke."

"Gone?" said the unicorn. "Gone? It is just beginning, Mr. Ely."

VII

He did quite well in college, John Thackeray Ely. There was more room for his kind of person. Oh, there were some of the Buzz Beebe kind there, too, but there were more of Johnny's kind. He wasn't alone and he gained a kind of strength by having so many of his own ilk about—or, if not strength, confidence. There were boys who could talk well about poetry and philosophy. Johnny's fastidious habits of dress were laughed at a little, but copied some too. They made him a legend of elegance in his own time.

Yes, he was part of the pattern and didn't fit in too badly. But all the time the hunger was there, allayed, but there. Now and again would come over him the most intense sensation of waiting. Waiting for what? For everything, it seemed to him. For this dream of life to cease and his real life to begin. And there were moments of despair as well—moments when it seemed to him that this dream was all there was, that he was a fool to expect anything more.

In his senior year he fell in love, wildly, unreasonably, foolishly in love. With the wife of an English professor. She was a thin, pale woman, with black hair parted in the middle and combed back like lacquer to show the shape of her beautiful head. She had dark serious eyes and a wide mouth and a smile that was all sadness, all mystery. She never talked much, but sat knitting when students were there, but sometimes she would look up and her eyes would seem to say, You talk too much. I knew that all so long, long ago. She bore the incongruous name of "Lil." It was probably from Lilian, but Johnny called her "Lilith" in his mind. Her husband was an uninspired, stocky man who would break into the mystery by saying, "How about some sandwiches, Lil? And coffee?"

Johnny wasn't the only one who fell under her spell. More than one poem was written to her. There were always flowers, brought by some adoring student, on the desk or the wide sill above the window seat. She seemed immune, but she wasn't. In her still, remote way, she accepted the adoration of boys.

There was one day that Johnny could never look back on without embarrassment. It was March and windy and there was still snow on the ground. He had been walking up and down the street where she lived for an hour, his blood at fever pitch, his infatuation making him not quite sane. He had been at a dinner party the night before, and Lil and Professor Sanderson had been there too. It had seemed to him that Lil's white face was a mask of tragedy, that such unhappiness dwelt there he could not bear it. Professor Sanderson had talked and laughed in his dull way and seemed utterly unaware that he had a wife whose heart was broken. From looks Lil had given him, sad, revealing looks, Johnny thought Lil cared for him.

He saw her through the lighted windows. She walked across the room, walked slowly in a dazed sort of way. He went up the snowy steps, opened the door and went in, without ringing or knocking or anything.

She was standing by the piano and she had on a black dress and a close gold necklet, twisted like snakes. She turned and said, "Why, Johnny—what is it?" Her voice was low and calm.

"I can't bear it any more," Johnny said. "I can't bear to see you dying of starvation—with him. He doesn't know you're alive. You're dying—and I'm going to take you away from here. You can't stand it any more and I can't stand it either."

She didn't deny her starvation. She said, "Sit down, Johnny. You're in a state! . . . You boys all think there's only one way out, don't you?"

"Well, what other way is there? Anybody can see you're unhappy—and why wouldn't you be? You needn't love me if you can't—but I'd let you be free. I'd love you enough for two. . . . I'll do something horrible, Lil; I'll kill him—something violent. I can't stand it any more."

"Dear Johnny ——" she began gently.

And then Professor Sanderson came from somewhere into the room. He wore baggy old slacks and his thick hair was disheveled as if perhaps he had fallen asleep in his chair. He looked as stolid as ever.

"Here, here—what's all this?" he asked in his rumbling voice. "Another young pup trying to save you from the dragon, Lil? . . . Better clear out, Ely—she doesn't want to be saved. . . . If Lil wanted to go with you, I wouldn't stop her, you know. I don't keep her in chains. She just wouldn't think of going—or perhaps I ought to say she might toy with the thought, but she'd never act on it, would you, Lil?"

And Lil laughed, the first and last time Johnny ever heard her laugh aloud. "You see, Johnny—he's quite perspicacious," she said. "Sandy, you didn't need to come in so soon—I was going to do a very nice renunciation scene!"

"You'll no doubt have other chances to use it," Sanderson said dryly. "How about a bottle of beer, Ely?"

"No, thanks," Johnny said, and went out of the house, feeling a stinging of the face that did not come from the March wind, a stinging that was not limited to his face but seemed to go all over his body.

It is the one thing youth cannot bear, to be laughed at. He was cured of Lil, but it made him very cynical and doubtful about his own discrimination. He would have liked to think, indeed tried to make himself think, that Lil was just covering up, that she really loved him, really was sad but dared not show it. But his common sense told him that that was no good. She had let him love her because she liked the sensation of being adored so blindly, but she would never have gone away with him or anyone. She liked it, as Sanderson had said, the way it was. He was off women forever, he told himself. He looked on marriage with suspicion and he had forgotten for the time being his father and mother who had loved so gaily, so tenderly that his loneliness had fed on that love ever since.

And that affair, if it could be called that, with Lil Sanderson was the only flare of passion throughout his college life. It was a long time before he could remember it with equanimity, and it was after he knew Cass before he could really laugh about it the way the Andersons had laughed. As a matter of fact, the call for help in Lil's sad eyes had no doubt been real enough. But it was only a call to bolster up her own illusion of her seductiveness. It deeply shamed him that he had not seen this at once.

lifework. "I've invited Mr. Knoll to dinner, Johnny. I hope you'll get on with him," she said. "He's a very reputable publisher, I believe, and he might have a place for you in his establishment."

Johnny revolted at the thought. He had no feeling against the publishing business. Indeed, he had thought of it himself. But he did not want Aunt Sophronia responsible for a job for him, he did not want her running him.

He could not have behaved worse with Mr. Knoll. He was arrogant, contradictory, really insufferably rude, and Mr. Knoll raised his fine brows at him more than once in surprise. Aunt Sophronia, who had worked hard to prepare a good dinner (though it seemed insufficient when it was prepared), was hurt and annoyed and her straight mouth grew thinner as the meal progressed.

Mr. Knoll made no suggestions about the publishing business as a career for Johnny, and Aunt Sophronia made none either, evidently realizing her case lost even before presentation. Mr. Knoll departed and Aunt Sophronia began at once clearing up ash trays, piling the dishes for their descent on the dumb-waiter. She was stiff and silent and Aunt Maria seemed on the point of tears. Johnny had to break the silence, a sure sign of his own guilty embarrassment.

"Well?" he said. "I imagine that finishes me with Mr. Knoll, don't you?"

"Yes," Aunt Sophronia said succinctly.

"Sorry," Johnny said, ashamed but still angry. "I just didn't feel up to licking his boots for a job. I'll get myself a job."

"Very well," Aunt Sophronia said. Then she turned and looked at him sternly. "You will of course do as you wish about a position," she told him, "though the publishing business seems eminently suitable for you, but rudeness to guests in my house I will not tolerate. I was ashamed for you, and for my house."

Johnny flushed. "All right. I'm chastised. I was pretty bad. But I don't like being shoved down anyone's throat."

"You might have said that before he came. I was only thinking of your interests."

"Yes, I know," Johnny said. Suddenly Aunt Sophronia looked very pitiful to him. He gave her his rather rare smile and said, "Perhaps I ought to apologize to him."

"It would be suitable," Aunt Sophronia said stiffly.

He hated apologies. He rarely made them, feeling them a weakness. "Never complain, never explain," he had heard his mother say once, and it stuck in his mind like one of those maxims of childhood that seem inviolable rules.

Nevertheless, the next day he walked down to the offices of the Knoll-Conley Publishing Company and asked to see Mr. Knoll. Knoll was a thin, irascible man and he was having a bad day. He had not enjoyed last night's dinner, nor the performance of young Ely.

When Ely's name was given to him he said, "Busy. Can't see him today." Then as the secretary turned to go, he changed his mind, feeling a compulsion to take out his ill-humor on someone, and said, "Tell him to come in—give him ten minutes."

Johnny came into the somewhat cluttered office, feeling a desire to straighten its papers and books. He saw at once that Mr. Knoll had no desire to see him and that his temper was thin. Johnny had an ingratiating sweetness when he wanted to use it. He began with a smile, then sobered.

"I don't blame you, Mr. Knoll," he said briefly. "But I don't like such obvious hospitality as was accorded you last night. I didn't want any part of it—a job for a dinner, that's what it amounted to, didn't it? But I

"Why don't you want to work for me?" Mr. Knoll said irritably.

"I want to choose my own job," Johnny said, not quite so certainly.

"Well, why wouldn't you want to choose one with me?"

"I don't know that I wouldn't. But I want to be the one to get it. I don't want it tied up to family obligations."

"I don't hand jobs out because of family obligations. This is a business house. I knew your father and thought highly of him, and I thought if you had the guts he had, you might be someone I could use. We generally take on a boy or two just out of school every year, and now and then one shapes up. I had a little curiosity about Ely's boy—but, good grief, what an awful dinner!"

"Aunt Sophronia does the cooking," Johnny said. "But she keeps her mind on a higher plane." He spoke quite soberly, but Mr. Knoll gave a quick little bark of a laugh.

"Your father took me there to tea long ago," he said.

"Sometime I wish you'd tell me about my father," Johnny said humbly. "I've always wished someone would."

"Well, come on out to lunch with me right now and I'll tell you," Mr. Knoll said, getting up.

Johnny went down in the elevator with him, silently, followed him into a commonplace eating house and to a corner at the back by a window. Mr. Knoll, however, was not one to talk expansively about anything.

"Had some good times with your father," Mr. Knoll said abruptly, picking up the menu. "We were both young, which probably made them seem brighter than they were. Nothing seems quite so jolly now. . . . Never ate such roast-beef sandwiches as your mother used to make."

The waitress came and they ordered.

"I can just remember them," Johnny said. "I was six when they died."

"Remember," Mr. Knoll said. "Both in one week, of typhoid. Bad. Shock to me. I'd been there a couple nights before—drank a lot of beer and talked a lot of nonsense about art. Your mother got to playing Gilbert and Sullivan and your father made up parodies on the spot—very funny; at least they seemed so then. He could have been a good actor."

"Do you think he was a good artist?"

"Yes. Makings of one anyway. Didn't get much of a start. Pity. Didn't go in for any of the new isms, though he'd defend them at the drop of a hat. Trying for something though. Never could quite make out what. More like Van Gogh than anyone else I can think of, though not definitely like him. Had something of his own. Often wondered what became of his things."

So have I. Aunt Sophronia said there was nothing of any value and she gave a stack of canvases to someone who asked for them. I never found out who it was. I didn't know where to ask."

"Wonder who it was? I'll ask around. Never seen any anywhere—think I'd recognize them if I did. Real pity. Completely happy man—knew where he was going and was on his way. . . . Literary ambitions?" His brows shot up in that quick way.

"I don't know," Johnny confessed. "I'm afraid I don't know where I'm going." Then he gave a shamefaced grin and said, "The truth is that I'd thought about the publ... business. It Does Not Matter

By Marsh Campbell

It does not matter that it is a day
And not a year, that we must be apart;
It does not matter the short time my heart
Must ache in this intolerable way.
It does not matter that the smallest space,
Not widest, on this globe must separate
Your voice from me; my pain does not abate
Because I am not far from your embrace.

No time is longer than eternities
Of seconds spent from love's infinities.
No space is wider than one iron mile Dividing me from your magnetic smile.
No brevity of absence can subdue
My soul-felt need to be again with you.

EVE: # But I thought a fast cleanser had to be gritty!

Heavens no! Gritty cleansers leave scratches that slow you down...

Well, for Pete's sake! How can scratches slow you down?

Because they're dirt-catchers! They catch and hold grease and grime and make your cleaning twice as hard. That's why I use Bon Ami—it "hasn't scratched yet!"

EVE: But I still don't see how a cleanser can do a thorough job without scratching some.

KAY: You would if you'd try Bon Ami! It simply slides the dirt away, easy as pie.

EVE: H'mm . . . I must say you made this bathroom sparkle fast enough.

KAY: Not me, hon! Bon Ami's polishing action leaves everything satin-smooth.

EVE: Hands, too, if I can judge by yours! O. K., Kay—you've sold me. Tomorrow I switch to Bon Ami . . . for keeps!

US: Remember Bon Ami comes in two different forms. There's the sifter-top can of Powder for sinks and bathtubs. And the handy Cake for making windows and mirrors sparkle.

"Exactly," Aunt Sophronia said stiffly. "Does that preclude his having knowledge of Truth?"

"I should think it might, somewhat," Johnny said.

"He speaks where he can find a place to speak," Aunt Sophronia said. "His appeal is to thinking people."

"So?" Johnny said, laughter almost choking him again. "Don't tell me you're off the Bahai brotherhood."

"Certainly not. But it takes thinkers to lead. . . . You are being facetious, Johnny."

"Does a brotherhood have to have leaders? Seriously—does it?" Johnny demanded.

"Jesus was a leader, was He not?"

"Was He? I wouldn't know, Aunt Sophronia. I really wouldn't know. I've often wondered if He meant to be."

"Certainly, He meant to be. His brotherhood coalesced about Him."

"I wonder. Or was He just being a brother and mankind found it so strange it had to make a God out of Him?"

"He stated his leadership over and over. Did He not say, 'Follow me'?"

"And are you thinking of taking a position of leadership in matters of the soul?"

"It is a matter of being," Aunt Sophronia said. "That does, I suppose, constitute a sort of leadership."

"Just what I've been saying," Johnny murmured.

Their talk seemed to have a curious circular movement to it. But Aunt Sophronia, who did most of the talking for the sisters, brought a practical note into it.

"You could be of service, Johnny, if you would," she said.

"How?" Johnny asked warily.

"Your house could be instrumental in bringing Jehrunanda's message to a larger public," she told him. "We have just been telling Jehrunanda that his talks should be published."

"I'm afraid it's hardly the sort of thing Knoll-Conley would care to sponsor," Johnny said. "They're a bit fussy and their department on religion is small."

"You might ask Mr. Knoll."

Johnny had meant to speak of leaving the 64th Street house that day, but somehow the Hindu's visit had thrown him off his stride a little and he could not seem to bring the matter up.

On Monday he chanced to have lunch with Mr. Knoll, who took an irascible but somewhat fatherly interest in Johnny.

"How would you like to bring a Spiritual Message to the People?" Johnny demanded over coffee.

Mr. Knoll gave a small skeptical snort. "I wouldn't," he said.

"I HAVE a wonderful opportunity for you," Johnny said. "There's a gentleman holding forth at the Astor on the Soul. Name of Jehrunanda. You know the kind of thing. Draws the crowds—sex appeal, I should say. Head that ought to be on a coin. Marvelous looking man—I met him at tea with the aunts. He wants to break into print—or I don't know that actually. The aunts think it would be a service to the world if he should. I haven't discussed it with him."

"You needn't," Mr. Knoll said. "I make it a rule never to publish anything that turns my own stomach, and nothing is so apt to do so as one of these pseudoreligious tracts."

Johnny laughed and they talked of other things. Luncheon was always a quick, hurried affair with Mr. Knoll. You didn't have time for much conversation, though Mr. Knoll always managed in those few minutes to give Johnny something to think about.

It was a week later that one morning Aunt Sophronia stopped Johnny as he was leaving for the office. She had a large Manila envelope in her hands.

"I have persuaded Mr. Jehrunanda to allow me to show these to Mr. Knoll," she said. "I should prefer that you give them to him personally. They are too precious to be passed indiscriminately around an office."

"Oh, I say, Aunt Sophronia—I don't think it will be any use," Johnny said embarrassedly. "As a matter of fact, I spoke of the matter to Knoll. He didn't seem interested."

"He hasn't read them," Aunt Sophronia said.

Johnny took the envelope. Really out of a kind of maliciousness. It was a kind of thing Mr. Knoll would chuckle at.

HE chanced to meet Knoll in the elevator and thrust the envelope at him. "Find one century," he said. "I haven't read it—I'll give you the opportunity of discovery." And with a grin he went down the corridor to his own cubbyhole of an office.

It was not till he was about to leave that afternoon that Knoll came into his office and put it on the desk.

"Not so pseudo as you might think," he said suddenly. "Got something—that Indeed. Might publish it."

"Good heavens!" Johnny protested.

"Serious," Knoll said half angrily. "Don't think he's a quack. Bring him in."

There was a moment when Johnny stood beside Jehrunanda in Knoll's office while Johnny felt his own smallness beside the giant dignified stature of Jehrunanda. He was intensely aware of his own insignificance. For that moment he had a belief in the message, never knowing what it was.

Margaret, aged five, had been very rude to a little guest, and after the child had gone home Margaret's mother told her very feelingly how grieved she was at her rudeness. "I've tried hard to make you a good child, to teach you to be polite and kind to others; and yet, in spite of all my efforts, you are so rude and naughty."

Margaret, deeply moved, looked sadly at her mother and said, "What a failure you are, mother!"

And the book was published under the vague, disarming title of Serenity. The company never got over the sales that book had. They gave it a rather mild build-up, embarrassed at having it on their list—and it sold and sold and sold. After a space of years it was put into a cheap reprint edition and kept on selling. Johnny Boyd never read the book though he was curious. But he was convinced it was quackery and he was ashamed that they had published it and he was embarrassed by a few obvious efforts on the part of the peppery Mr. Knoll to acquire serenity by means only imagined by Johnny via Mr. Jehrunanda. Mr. Knoll, he was relieved to note, never became fully serene and after a few months gave off trying, but apparently there was a great hunger in the American people to achieve serenity, a hunger that never died and made them go on trying and trying. And Mr. Knoll gave Johnny the credit for bringing them the book and he was from then on the white-haired boy of the force.

But before the book's saga was hardly begun, Johnny began his attempt to break loose from the aunts. He began one night when he was late for dinner.

"Sorry to hold you up," he said. "I met Standish. He wants me to share his apartment with him. It might be a good idea mightn't it? I make a lot of work for you two." The small silence that followed his words had shock in it and Johnny felt the shock.

"You're not contented here?" Aunt Sophronia said at last, speaking with her usual cold calm.

"Oh, of course," Johnny said too quickly. "But I know I am something of a nuisance—and one has to start out on his own sometime."

"But, Johnny, of course you're not a nuisance!" Aunt Maria put in somewhat reproachfully.

"I eat," Johnny said, "and my bed gets made and my room dusted and my clothes sent to the laundry and the cleaner. It's considerable work, I know, though it's nice of you to pretend it isn't."

"We always thought you considered this your home," Aunt Sophronia said, starting to pour herself tea when her cup was already full. Johnny noticed this and began to feel a tightness, whether of resentment or pity or resentment at having to pity, he hardly knew.

"Why, I do," he said. "But I can't let myself be coddled forever. I'm making a living and ought to stand on my own feet, hadn't I?"

"I didn't think we had prevented that," Aunt Sophronia said. "Nor did I think we had coddled you. We have never believed in coddling. You were a delicate child and had to have some special attention, but we have never tried to keep you from independent action. However, it is something you will have to decide for yourself. We've hoped you were happy here."

Johnny managed to smile and say, "Oh, well, I haven't gone yet!" and escaped to his room on the next floor.

He felt shaken, as if the brief conversation had been a long and wearying battle. He stood there looking around the little room that had been his so long. It seemed singularly empty, little changed from the room he had come into so long ago after his father and mother died. He disliked the cold little room very much. But he knew that the aunts were deeply hurt. He had hardly ever even considered the possibility that they were fond of him. A coldly conventional sense of duty toward him was all they had ever made him feel. That he not disgrace the name of Ely was all they had ever seemed to expect of him.

But now he knew they expected more. They wanted him there to wait on. They were fond of him. It touched him in spite of himself, even though it angered him at the same time.

They were old, but he had no sense that their lives were almost over. They would live to be as old as Methuselah, getting drier, more set, but they would not die. And he felt his own life going the same way, caught in the tide of their desiccation. He would become another Ely mummy. He was caught. He would never be free.

THEN he asked himself, Free for what? And he got no answer. He didn't imagine that his life with Standish would be good. Standish was a young high-brow poet and egoistic to an annoying degree. He gathered about him people who flattered him and listened to his poetry, which was surprisingly good in spite of his nature. His apartment was an unholy mess of symbolic murals and curtain patterns, and he had to have flowers that fitted his mood. But when Standish had suggested that they join forces, it had seemed for a moment that life with him would be infinitely preferable to this sterile one. He began to wonder why he had ever thought it would be any better than this. But the real source of that wonder was the fact that he felt this affection of the poor old women reaching out to him, clinging to him, holding him here. It was, in fact, his old hunger being fed ever so little. And yet he felt his whole future hanging in the balance and he was frightened. He had again that sensation of waiting for life to begin, of feeling it slip past him in great pieces—his childhood gone—his youth gone—his manhood beginning to go. And when was he going to live? Ever?

The next day he said to Aunt Sophronia, "We ought to discuss finances a little, hadn't we? Here I am, a moneyed man—I want to chip in on the groceries at least."

"If you feel you can," Aunt Sophronia said. "Though it isn't necessary. You will be more able when you are more firmly established—and you have your clothes and your entertainment to pay for."

He received at that time thirty-five dollars a week.

"Oh, I have enough suits and other things to last me for a while, and my desires are simple," Johnny said. "Suppose I give you eighteen dollars a week? Would that be any help?"

He was a little startled at the relief that came for an instant into Aunt Sophronia's eyes and then was quickly vanquished. "If it

But it had seemed im pure magic and he had gone to Knoll h it and fought for it. The first book of ry Gordon, now considered the foremost man writer in the country. A star forever the crown of Knoll-Conley, now Ely, nley and Pierce. And Laura Demming. money-maker, but a credit to the firm. had found her too.

No—let's not think of Laura Demming, his nd said. Let's not. Had he, he wondered, en to blame about Laura? Had his enthu- sm for her verse been equivocal? Had encouraged her? But how could he have, hen there was nothing of him that did not long to Cass? Or had he, like Lil Sander- n, liked the adoration without wanting to ore? And in the end he had had to say utally and baldly, "But I don't love you, aura."

He could see her intriguing, lovable, child- n little face, the dark eyes staring at him the strangest, most tragic way, and he lt again that cold sensation in the pit of his omach that he had had when they told him e had tried to commit suicide. She hadn't ed. She had gone on writing poetry and he w her now and then and she laughed with im and never mentioned that bad time, but e guilt remained in him. And yet what had e done? Praised her poetry. Sent her flow- rs when a new book came out—just a gesture om the firm. Asked her to tea now and then. ook her to lunch to talk over contracts. He id as much for other authors and they didn't all in love with him.

Cass had never blamed him. "Cass never lamed me," he whispered. At the time he adn't thought it more than natural that Cass should have never doubted his love for er, his undivided love. Now it seemed sud- denly wonderful and strange.

"It's so awful to love like that," she'd said. "So awful to have it one-sided, Johnny. I feel so sorry for her I could die of it. But I can't shame her by telling her so."

And then—then what was it she had said? What was it?

"I used to love my brother like that, almost like that. He couldn't move without me at his heels. I would, as the saying goes, have gone through fire for him. But he had no heart."

"I didn't know you had a brother," he'd said, and he felt anew that startled sense of having great areas of Cass yet to discover. "You've never even mentioned a brother."

"I never talk about him. He's dead," she said. "He's dead. He was a scientist and he experimented with women and one of his experiments killed him."

"He couldn't have been more than a boy," he said.

"No, he was just nineteen."

She was putting bulbs in some little pots for the sill and she stopped and sat there, her fingers around the little blue bowl, as if hanging on to it. There was light on the braids above her forehead, but her face was in shadow. He had felt a great compulsion to have her face turned toward the light. He had felt, too, such a tenderness for her that it choked him, and at the same time a sadness, as if he were shut out from part of her.

"Do you ever have a sense of doom, Johnny?" she'd said.

"I used to," he said.

"You think that you're hardheaded, that you've got your life in order—and then—and then ——" Cass searched for words.

"And then, darling?"

"It all comes back," she told him. "As if it had been waiting."

"I know," he said. "I used to know. But I don't any more—I've got the upper hand of my doom."

And he remembered the night he'd gone to his room and given up the plan to room with Standish. He remembered standing outside the cheese factory at Watt's Corners and he remembered certain nights at college after an evening with the literati.

"I wonder if you ever do," she said. "All my life I've loved so hard and hoped so high—and then there always comes a moment when everything I've loved and hoped for falls to pieces in my hands. When there's nothing. I start again—it happens again. As if it had to be that way. Like a pattern. My brother—my mother—my father—Louis Duane in Baltimore—my job. . . . Somehow, sometime, I ought to learn to put a curb on my heart—I never learn. It seems like doom that I never, never learn."

His heart had begun to pound and he had been frightened, as if their love were threatened, as if a shadow had passed over his heart. "Come here," he said.

But she sat still, too still, looking at her hands on the bowl. He got up and drew her into his arms in the old green chair that he had brought from his room on 64th Street. There had seemed to be some confession that this, this too, would end, in the way they clung together in silence. But at last she relaxed against him and put her hand up against his face in a way she had and whispered, "Oh, Johnny!"

I ought to get up, he said now. It's morning, I ought to get up.

He didn't feel now any fear of Them, but his body felt weak and strange. The cat jumped down and began to miaow softly but querulously. He must feed the cat. First he must go up and get dressed and then he must feed the cat and get out of here. He pushed back the afghan, then pulled it over him again, resisting movement. It was getting lighter, but it wasn't going to be a bright day. It was a gray day. Thick and soft the snow fell steadily.

At last he stood up, looked down through a haze at the gaudy pajamas as if he had

Beneath them in the blue-and-white spode

Italian pottery they had bought, he and Cass, in their first house. "Of course they'll chip," Cass said, to the assurances of the salesman. "But they'll be such fun to eat from while they last!" They had certainly chipped—but they had as certainly been cheerful while they lasted.

He turned aimlessly from the cupboard, and there was Sid's play on the old oak sideboard. Something out of the night in the cocktail lounge at the Sheraton came back to him. "I'll read you my play," Sid said.

He left it there for me, he thought, but he did not want to read it. He seemed to have escaped forever from the world of books. Plays were utterly unimportant. Books were futile indeed, and he felt a faint wonder that he had given his life to making them seem important.

BUT he walked over to the sideboard and picked up the bulky manuscript and sat down at the round oak table in the middle of the room. The silence closed round him and he began to read. He was aware that there was a veil between him and the pages, that he was somehow cut off from books, from the written word as reality. Nevertheless, he read carefully: settings, cast of characters, every stage direction.

Then, quite abruptly, there was no veil there, and the words came at him without interference, powerful, sledge-hammer words with a kind of terrible beauty.

"My word, it's good!" Mr. Ely said.

It was a story of greed, greed that ate the soul. An American story, yet Greek in its simplicity, in its inexorable march toward doom. Doom—doom—doom . . . the word in his thoughts tied suddenly to words he had thought of at dawn out of the long ago.

He looked up from the manuscript and the world was a little lighter, but the snow still fell, and there was a wind now that swept the snow against the panes and sounded in the chimneys. All right, Aggie, he said. All right, old girl. You knew.

HE got up and went into the living room, walked across the red rug and stood looking at the portrait of Sid. Sid Emerson, with his malicious critic's tongue, his swagger, his bigger-than-life gestures. There he was in the portrait, just as he was in life. And yet—and yet—this he had done, this sound play, this play the Theatre Guild would grab at, this wonderful, awful play. "If you are in need of a good soporific, I can't do more than urge you to see Bay Leaves at the Empire." That was the kind of thing Sid said, and said, and said. But it might be that his boredom was real, that he had had a hunger, too, a hunger for something brutally dramatic and it had eaten at him over the years till he had done this. And—and this was the important part of it—Aggie had known he would. Aggie had hung on and taken care of him and now he had done it.

He had a sense of waiting for the moral in that to be explained to him. Somehow he had to make an analogy between Sid's life and his. But he did not. He let it remain Sid's story and left his own apart in its dark empty place.

He heard a clock ticking suddenly. It was not in this room. He walked through the dining room, found it on a shelf in the kitchen. Threeten.

That's queer, he said. It didn't take me all that time to read the play. I wonder what I was doing the rest of the time. I'll have some coffee.

He had just had coffee a few minutes ago, it seemed. But he had it again. It didn't satisfy him, but he didn't want food. Things were growing hazy again. The play that had jerked him into consciousness for a time faded—became part of a dream, a disturbing, powerful dream, but a dream. His cup shook in his hand, he saw, and he watched his hand with a faint, scientific interest.

I'll write to her, he said suddenly. I'll tell her it's all right. She can be free of me, free forever and ever.

But he washed the cups, the coffeepot, put them away neatly.

I don't think there's any ink, he evaded. They write on the typewriter. I couldn't write it on a typewriter.

He went into the living room and on the desk was one of those inkwells of some red plastic, with a pen jutting out from it. The inkwell jeered at his evasion. He sat down and took out the pen and began to write. He wrote quickly, the pen moving of itself the way the car had moved under its own power on the way up here.

Cass, my darling—or Cass, who used to be my darling—or were you ever? Or was it all a dream from the beginning? No, it wasn't all a dream, was it? The worms ate in, that was all. They have eaten in and devoured us and our love and there is nothing left but a little dust. I am willing enough to say it was my fault, but that's immaterial when you're dead, isn't it? The unicorn said I chose death and I did. I didn't have the courage for life. I never have had it. I have always thought a miracle would happen, but miracles don't happen to people who choose death. BLUESTOCKING

In the late eighteenth century it was the fashion to hold soirees at which women were permitted to participate in conversation with literary and ingenious men. These societies came to be known as Blue Stocking Clubs because one of the most eminent members of these clubs, Mr. Benjamin Stillingfleet, wore blue worsted stockings rather than the more common black silk stockings of that day.

Such was the excellence of his conversation and so great a loss was his absence felt to be that it became the fashion to say when he was not present, "We can do nothing without the bluestockings." The term has come into common and popular use to denote women who show a taste for learning and an inclination toward intellectual pastimes. —DAVID T. ARMSTRONG acle, but I might have known the resurrection takes place in yourself—no one resurrects you. I can't do it, Cass. I'm fading out. I'm giving up. I'm being swallowed by a snowstorm and it doesn't matter any more. . . . That's a lie. I don't want to lie now. It does matter, but I can't or won't do anything about it. I hate your mother. Having given up devils, I have made her into My Devil. The unicorn said men do, and they do. I have made her into such a Big Devil, so All-Powerful, that she is too great for me. She has poisoned me and now I am all poison. I thought I loved you very much—I thought I did—but I couldn't have, could I? When I let it all turn into poison? . . . Cass, go away—go away from me—go away from her. I'm no good for you. It takes too much out of you to make me anything. And she's no good for you, either. She eats you up, my darling. You said she does. She does. You said to take you out and drown you—you said so, do you remember? But I didn't. How could I? Even when you began to go away from me, how could I? . . . All I've known of life has come through you. And yet it would have been more merciful, wouldn't it? . . . But my chance is gone. It does no good to talk of it now. Only the sin of indifference, that is not mine. I have never been indifferent, Cass. Never, never. My will may be like water, but I have always been aware of you. I have even been aware of what was happening to our love, and why. How can a man let such a thing happen? If I had been worth your loving I would have managed your mother. Somehow I would have managed her. Instead of that I let her make it all little, I let her diminish our love, eat at it, eat it all away. You see me small now and small I am. I can't ever puff myself up again to any real size. . . . Could it be that I loved you because you made me feel big? No, no, that's not so, no matter what the unicorn says. I was big once—for a little while. I was big enough. But no more, Cass. No more. I've shrunk. . . . Only—you hate her, too, don't you? Then why—why? Why did you have to give her loyalty if you hate her? Was it pity? If you were here, Cass, it seems to me we could say things not yet said. I could ask you things I have been too proud to ask. But you are not here. Go away, Cass—go far away. Try again. Put on your red hat and lunch with poets and laugh again—laugh in the old way with someone, anyone—only don't give in to your doom, darling. Don't be afraid. Be not afraid. . . . Be not afraid. . . . I am afraid, but don't you be. . . . There's a cat here—with yellow stripes—I think of you—you would laugh, Cass, if you could hear the lion's Oxford accent—you would laugh—and laugh—the mountains of the moon—it does take three logs—three—three—three—gather ye holly while ye may—the holly will prick you, darling—your hands will drip with blood—the blood of the lamb—washed in the blood of the lamb . . . three—three—three ——

THE years of his beginnings at Knoll-Conley were strange years. Years of making armor, years of illusion building. They made it easy for him at the office. They helped immeasurably. He gained his reputation for discrimination and perspicacity so soon. Mr. Knoll talked about him. He had invitations to go elsewhere. His salary was raised—and raised again. He paid the aunts twenty-five a week—thirty. They got a little maid, not very efficient. The maid was not worth what they paid her, but she gave John Ely some relief of mind.

He met writers and critics and publishers and his life, such as it was, was bound to the literary world and he had a kind of sense of belonging to a strong fraternity. He also met musicians and a playwright or two and he was accepted by these people—he could talk their language, really he could talk it better than they did. He even got to the point where he took people home for tea. He knew that he did it more or less maliciously, but he did it. He had so armored himself th could be indulgent to the aunts, and he that these stiff little tea parties with th ladies were amusing to sophisticates.

But sometimes at a concert he would denly find sweeping over him a sense of ure. A sense of not being in his right w It wasn't that the music bored him—he a genuine love for it. It was more the feeling: Is this all? He thought sometim marrying, but the thought left him cold. saw women enough and they liked him enough, too, but he didn't want to marry least, no one that he knew.

PERHAPS it was, he thought, the house. always went back to the tall, dull, c house. Sometimes through a whole eve of talk he could maintain the illusion tha was having a good time, that he was a us citizen, a man of taste, a man liked and spected. But then he would go home. aunts would be up. They had always sat till twelve, he could not imagine why, now they sat up till one or two if he sho chance to come home that late. They insis that he had nothing to do with it, that t were not waiting up for him. "Why, I hac idea it was so late!" Aunt Sophronia wo say. "Maria and I were so engrossed with book!" But he knew they sat up for h They would go briskly up to bed as if he nothing to do with their affairs, as if t filled their days a nights very well wi out him, but he kn And then the illusi of the evening wo fade and he would only a somewhat fus young man living wi fussy old maids a frustration would e gulf him. Then would know the ca tic, witty young m he had a reputation f being was only a shell this lonely, inadequa boy in this cold roo was the real John El

Then Aunt Mar died. She had had stroke. Sophronia an Sadie got her upstai to bed, and as they wer both slight of body, it must have been some thing of an effort. Aunt Sophronia for th very first time phoned Johnny at the offic and asked him to come home. Aunt Mari rallied a little, but on the third day she ha another stroke and died.

After that life was different, or that whic passed as life. Aunt Sophronia did not weep She hardly seemed to mourn. Perhaps Johnny thought with some surprise, she really believes about the Oneness. Johnny missed Aunt Maria more than he would have thought possible. She was a little gentler than Aunt Sophronia; she never talked much, and when she did it was more or less as an echo of Aunt Sophronia. It was partly that Maria's going put an added burden of responsibility on Johnny. He could not help thinking of Aunt Sophronia sitting there all day long alone. He took to spending more evenings at home, because he couldn't help himself. He resented the necessity, but he went home. He brought his phonograph down to the drawing room, and many an evening played records for Aunt Sophronia. He was surprised to find that she was not unfamiliar with good music.

One day she told him about a week she had spent in Stuttgart with Maria in 1912.

"They said we should not be able to find a room," she said. "There was some sort of balloon contest and the city was crowded. But of course if one has the will, one can find a room anywhere. We had no trouble."

Johnny could just see her, looking down her long nose at hotel managers, taking it for granted that a room would be found for an Ely, even an impecunious one.

"They were having a week of Richard Strauss," Aunt Sophronia went on. "I must confess it was a disappointment. A money-grabbing man who smoked cigars. But I remember the voice of a certain Anna von Mildenburg in Elektra. Over all much virtuosity, but not the greatness I was led to expect—and much derivation."

To Johnny's surprise, Debussy was Aunt Sophronia's favorite and she often asked for his records.

"Why Debussy?" he asked. "I'd have hardly thought him your cup of tea."

"Must you use such phrases, Johnny?" she'd asked disapprovingly. "Debussy is of the spirit."

"Is he?"

"I find him so," Aunt Sophronia stated with definiteness.

Once he took her to a Zimbalist concert at Carnegie Hall. She got out of some long-hidden store a black lace dress and a black fur cape that smelled of moth balls. He was touched as well as amused by the effort she made to do the thing right. And somehow she managed to look the lady, even in clothes that must have been twenty years old.

"Thank you for a very pleasant evening, Johnny," she said afterward. "It was most rewarding."

But he saw that some of her had died with Maria, that she seemed to have shrunk a little, dried a little more.

One day he said to her, "Aunt Sophronia, why don't you sell this house? We could find a small apartment on one floor that would simplify life a good deal." He was walking about the room restlessly. He was nervous these days and smoked a good deal, which he knew annoyed Aunt Sophronia.

"No, I wouldn't care to sell this house," Aunt Sophronia said calmly.

"But why not? You work so hard to keep it going. Why should you?"

"It's the Ely house," she answered, as if that were all there was to it. "Elys have lived here for a great many years. It is to be your home when I am no longer here."

God forbid! Johnny wanted to cry, but he did not. "You could rent it, then," Johnny said. "I would like to see you take things easier."

"I do not care for the modern apartments," Aunt Sophronia said. "They lack character. And I like my own things about me. There would scarcely be room for them in a smaller place. However, you know you are quite free to take an apartment for yourself if you like, Johnny. You are not bound to stay here."

"I was thinking of you," Johnny said, not altogether truthfully.

"I am quite content," Aunt Sophronia answered.

He had stopped in front of the old cabinet with its shelves of knickknacks. He opened the door—he had never in all his years there opened the door before—took out a small Dresden figure and stood there holding it in his hands. It was an exquisite bit of nothingness. A tree, with branches not stylized, but sweeping and full of the natural irregularities of branches. And on a branch was the most perfectly formed brown bird not more than half an inch over-all, while at the foot of the tree sat a white cat, tail a big circle about its feet, head uplifted, blue eyes on the bird. She will get you! Johnny's heart said to the bird. He put it back carefully, closed the door.

"Well, at any rate, let's have someone here more competent than Sadie."

He took it upon himself to dismiss Sadie. It was more difficult than he had imagined it would be. He went down to the kitchen where Sadie was doing the dinner dishes.

"Sadie," he began, "we are thinking of making some changes here." He had a little speech all ready, about his desire that Aunt Sophronia should have a sort of companion and so on, but Sadie didn't give him time to say it. She turned, but left her red hands dripping above the dishpan.

"You giving me the sack?" she demanded.

"I should think you might be pleased," Johnny said, abruptly on the defensive. "You could certainly get easier places than this. The stairs here are enough to kill anybody."

"I'm used to 'em," Sadie said. "Oh, I know I don't suit her, Mr. Ely! But couldn't

He didn't like Sadie. He was weary of her uninspired cooking, her slapdash cleaning, her flat face. But she seemed in that moment unbearably pathetic.

"Perhaps the first of the month," he said gently.

He made his departure, for she did not answer. He could not bear to know that perhaps she was crying into the dishwater.

He found her a place as he had promised. A professor he knew at Columbia was glad to get her for the small wages she expected. He had three children and his wife was a harassed, inefficient housekeeper, but somehow Johnny knew, in spite of the children, that Sadie would be happier there. Or would she? How did he know?

He took great pains in choosing her successor. He was somewhat oppressed by the consciousness that he was trying to find someone who would really be a companion for Aunt Sophronia, someone who would lessen his own sense of responsibility. At last he found Mrs. Beaseley, an impoverished gentlewoman, who seemed exactly right. She impressed upon him the fact that she was an omnivorous reader and spent all her spare time with books, that she had run, in her better years, a fine household with economy and taste. So he hired Mrs. Beaseley.

MRS. BEASELEY was not an unqualified success. In the first place, she was curious insatiably curious. This was a quality that Aunt Sophronia despised. Aunt Sophronia never pried, nor did she expect others to pry into her affairs. That Mrs. Beaseley had ever been a lady, Aunt Sophronia doubted. And it may have been true that Aunt Sophronia had made friends with loneliness, or had the habit of loneliness, and was irritated by this encroachment on her silences.

"I must say you have courage to upholster a chair with that peach damask," Johnny once overheard Mrs. Beaseley say. "That material used to run as high as fifteen a yard did you pay that much for it?"

"I don't recall," Aunt Sophronia answered.

WELL, you must have. Because that's the best. And for all I have little now, I do know what the best is, Miss Ely. We had two drawing rooms as well as a music room and library and there was little I didn't know about imported fabrics in those days. I liked delicate things, too, though of course I expected some wear from them. I don't know whether I would ever have considered damask. Of course I had my children, and that makes a difference. . . . It's odd your nephew has never married, isn't it? He's such a charming person. But no doubt he contemplates it soon and then you'll have the joy of watching his children. . . . I can't tell you how wonderful it is to have the devotion of your children, Miss Ely. My boys can't forgive me for not making my home with them. But I have a great deal of pride and I don't think it is ever satisfactory to have two generations in one house, do you? Oh, I don't mean your situation, Miss Ely! That's very different. Quite different. If he had a wife, you would understand. And children!"

"I am afraid children bore me," Aunt Sophronia said coldly.

"Oh, how can you say that! Of course they have their problems and are often trying. My son Rob's little boy has been, I'm afraid, badly trained. Sometimes his mother's management of him seems quite intolerable to me, but I never interfere. Never. . . . I do think blood tells, don't you, Miss Ely? Rob's wife has little background. Of course, before he married her, I told him my opinion. But you know what young men are. Often stubborn and rebellious. Though Rob had everything, Miss Ely. . . . Mr. Ely's parents are dead?"

"Yes."

"And you've had all his bringing up?"

"Yes."

"I must say he has the most exquisite manners. I can't understand why some girl hasn't snapped him up."

"He's fastidious," Aunt Sophronia said. "He would never choose a wife who was the kind to 'snap him up.'" Her scorn of Mrs. Beaseley's language was implicit in her quotation.

"He seems to be doing awfully well in his business. He must make a really fine salary."

"I'm sure I don't know. We don't discuss money matters," Aunt Sophronia said.

"You know, Miss Ely, I think, if you'll pardon me for saying so, that's most unwise. My husband was one to be very discreet, and I must say we suffered for it. Of course I don't know anything about your affairs and I don't want to pry, but I do think it's wise to know where one stands. And I do know whereof I speak. If I had known a little more where I stood, I shouldn't be supporting myself today—though I do feel very happy here and feel God led me to this haven. Of course I could be with my sons nothing would please them more—but as I've told you, I do have pride and, I hope, common sense. . . . I'm not saying you're dependent on Mr. Ely—I can't know that, of course—but if you are, I should think it would be very wise to know exactly what you can count on. I should imagine he

Dr. Heinrich Schliemann didn't decide that he needed a wife until fairly late in life. He had made a large fortune in business. Then, at the age of forty-six, he sold out and became an archaeologist—and a very fine one too.

Because he had a great admiration for Homer, Doctor Schliemann specialized in the study of cities mentioned by the blind poet. He gained world-wide fame from his discovery of the ruins of ancient Troy.

Basking in this glory, the German scientist one day presented himself at the Young Ladies' Academy, in Athens, Greece. The principal was overwhelmed at a visit from so distinguished a figure, and reverently inquired what service could be rendered.

"I want to marry one of your girls!" replied the archaeologist. And to the astonishment of the student body, he announced that he would marry the girl who first memorized the whole of Homer's Odyssey!

Never before or since has there been such frantic study of the great poet! Undaunted by the length of the epic, half the girls in the school entered the competition. In just four days, one candidate announced her readiness to be tested. Without a pause, she recited the famous lines for a full two hours. Convinced that she was letter-perfect, the rich old scholar permitted her to stop.

"Now that you have accepted my proposal, we will be married," he chuckled.

They were—and lived "happily ever after"!

Libby's
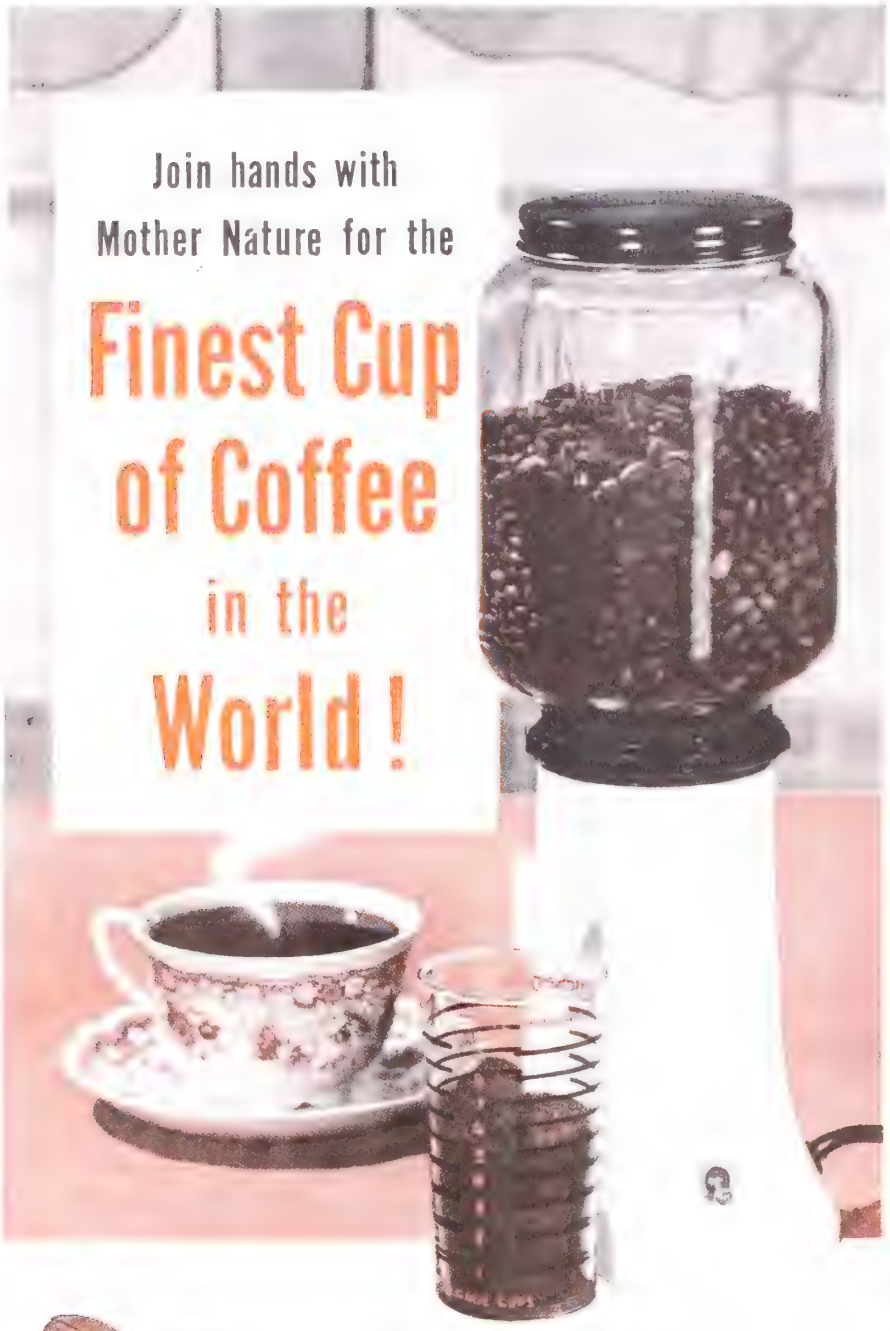
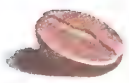
Libby's CORNED BEEF HASH





HERE'S the best "coffee package" ever made — the coffee bean itself, designed to guard rich coffee flavor until the bean is broken. Ground moments before use, you get all the full, fine flavor undiminished—in the cup, where it belongs. There is no chance nor time for precious flavor to escape.

That's what the KitchenAid Electric Coffee Mill does for you — just a flick of the switch tumbles fragrant-fresh coffee into the measuring glass in a matter of seconds. No bother with containers and measuring spoons. Just keep whole bean coffee — always more economical — in the transparent hopper, ready for use. Whatever your brewing method, the grind selector gives you the proper grade of grind quickly and accurately.

The KitchenAid Coffee Mill is compact, sturdy, finished in bright white baked-on Dulux, and built to serve for years. See it — try it — and serve coffee so flavorful, so fragrant, that your whole household will declare it the finest in the world!

KitchenAid Mixers are outstanding too. Ask to see both models.

earns three or four thousand a year, judging by what I hear. He seems to be very well thought of in the firm, and judging by what a Mr. Traven I know of gets, I should think he might earn that."

"I am not dependent on my nephew," Aunt Sophronia said stiffly.

"Oh, how fortunate for you! You have done better than I, then, in conserving your fortune. But tell me how you did it. Do you depend on bonds and such things, or do you believe in real estate?"

And that was a sample of the conversations that went on between the two old women. Nor was Mrs. Beaseley a great help around the house. She had moments when she went at things with great energy, but the day-by-day routine bored her. The books she liked were the more racy autobiographies and the popular novels. She pretended to know a great deal about music, but in reality she could not recognize more than a Strauss waltz.

Even so, at first Johnny felt relieved at having her there. He went out a little more and saw some of his acquaintances, but gradually even he could see that Aunt Sophronia loathed Mrs. Beaseley and could scarcely be civil to her. And Mrs. Beaseley was always there. About once a month one of the boys so "devoted" to her would come of a Sunday and take her for a ride, or, more commonly, home to stay with the children while he and his wife went off for a little pleasure of their own. But the rest of the time she was there, talking, talking, talking.

One day Johnny came home and found Aunt Sophronia alone. "Where's Mrs. Beaseley?" he asked. The table was laid for two.

"I've dismissed her," Aunt Sophronia said. "She became intolerable."

Johnny felt a sinking sensation. "Oh, I say, should you have done that?" he asked.

"She became intolerable," Aunt Sophronia said again. Then: "You mean well, Johnny, but I'd rather be alone. I can manage the little work there is here and I am quite self-sufficient. A few days more of Mrs. Beaseley's chatter would have driven me insane."

"Yes, she was a fool," Johnny agreed. "It's all right, only I just can't have you staying alone. For my own peace of mind, I mean. I can't have it. It's ridiculous to have you cooking for me when I have means to hire someone to do it. I apologize for Mrs. Beaseley—and for thinking you might want a companion. But someone to do the work there must be."

"It's a relief to be alone in the house," Aunt Sophronia said. "I don't mind the work."

"I'll find someone who will leave you alone," Johnny said, though he felt inadequate for choosing the someone

He found Ruby, a colored girl, and she a jewel beyond price.

"She's a very superior maid," the age woman told him. "She won't work for than twenty-five a week, but she's worth

He found himself trying to explain A Sophronia to the woman, finding it diffic "You see, my aunt is old and a little pecul and set in her ways. She has a lot of exp sive, if useless, bric-a-brac and she treasu it. She's fussy. I—I can't afford to make other mistake."

"I'm sure you'll find Ruby isn't a m take," the woman said.

So Ruby came to them. She was not a m take. She had unbounded energy, thou she was quiet enough. She had warmth a intelligence and Aunt Sophronia liked h She took over the household as if she h known it forever. She cooked superbly a she knew exactly how a table should set. She had admirers and she entertain them in the kitchen and sometimes the would come up from the depths the sound their warm laughter. She called Johnn "Mr. Johnny." Into the staid household s brought the first feeling of life Johnny ha ever known there.

At teatime she dared bring Aunt Sophroni an eggnog. "Come now, Miss Ely! There no nourishing in tea!" she'd say with he wide smile. And Aunt Sophronia would obe diently drink the eggnog.

One day she said, "Mr. Johnny, you nee a little furbishing up in here—you do for fact!"

He looked about the plain little room tha he had never had the courage to change, be cause all in this house seemed completely un alterable, and he said, "Furbish it all yo want to, Ruby."

She grinned and said, "You mean that, sure enough, Mr. Johnny?"

"Sure enough," he answered, and it seemed queer to him that he had never done any thing about it before. That was the great strength of Ruby: she had the courage for change.

It wasn't more than a week after that that Johnny came home and found his room fur bished. New curtains of chintz, very gay and cheerful, with a red background. The dull paper had been painted over with a very light yellow, the Parthenon had been taken down and a shelf put up under the window, with little pots of ivy along it. Instead of the plain little bookcase with the glass doors that he never felt inclined to open, there were some cheap painted open shelves, painted yellow outside and the red of the curtains inside On the bed was a white spread tufted with yellow. It was Ruby's taste that had done it, and certainly Johnny would never have so furnished it, even had he felt he had a free hand in the doing, but it was warm and cheerful.

"Bless you, Ruby," he said. "I like it."

"I like a room cozy," Ruby said. "Now you put your girl's picture on the wall or something, Mr. Johnny. Who wants to look at an old building?" She laughed her warm laughter at that notion.

"I'm afraid I haven't got any girl."

"A nice-looking boy like you!" Ruby said with disbelief.

He found some bright prints that didn't dull the curtains, and he grew almost fond of the room and didn't mind coming back to it at night.

One day he came into the drawing room and found the little china tree standing on a table, all alone, unprotected by the glass doors of the cabinet. It made a gay note in the old room. Johnny didn't know whether to mention it or not, but he found himself saying, "That's nice there. I always liked that piece."

"Ruby is very careful. I think it will be safe," Aunt Sophronia said. "She is like a child—she wanted it there where she could see it, and I have humored her."

"Do you think she is like a child?" Johnny asked slowly. "Sometimes I feel she is extraordinarily wise."

"She comes of a childlike race," Aunt Sophronia said.

"Oh?" Johnny said only. He was tempted to make some remark about Bahaism, but he refrained.

It was during Ruby's time that Johnny most often brought people to the house for tea. Ruby loved company. She loved the excitement of people in the house. She loved making surprises: tiny cakes covered with tinted icing, angel food, cinnamon toast or little cheese biscuits. She loved carrying in the silver tray, and the ceremony of passing cups. She loved comments on her baking. And her love seemed to reach out to all the guests who were, she felt, honored by being served here. She had a special reverence for authors, and when she knew one was coming she made a special effort.

"Ruby is very extravagant," Aunt Sophronia said after one occasion when Ruby had outdone herself in the culinary line. Perhaps she thought of the days when she and Maria had skimped on the spongecake to make it last another teatime.

"Well, we can afford a little extravagance," Johnny said.

"I don't believe in waste," Aunt Sophronia said.

"Waste? It's all gone, down to the last crumb," Johnny said.

"I have always considered tea as a social occasion, not a time to satisfy greed," Aunt Sophronia said.

But she succumbed to Ruby too. It was impossible not to. There was no stopping the expectation of warmth received for warmth given in Ruby.

THEN it was all over. There was a year of Ruby, a year that was curiously satisfying, a year when Johnny felt happier than he had felt since he was a small boy in the Barnaby kitchen. Then it was all over.

He came out to breakfast and Aunt Sophronia wasn't sitting there waiting for him as she always was.

"Where's Aunt Sophronia?" he asked.

"She's not down," Ruby said. "You better call her, Mr. Johnny. I hope she's not took sick."

"She's never sick. But I'll see."

He went up the stairs and knocked at the door. There was no answer.

"Aunt Sophronia—are you all right?" he asked. There was no answer.

He opened the door. He rarely went into her room and he felt an intruder, but he suddenly had to go in. She looked very small in the prim bed, very small and still.

"Aunt Sophronia," Johnny said.

But she was gone. No illness, no complaint of any pain. Just gone quietly away in her sleep.

"Poor little body," Ruby said.

All her affairs were in order. She left the house and all its contents to Johnny. The trust fund ceased at her death.

JOHNNY did not want the house, nor could he afford it. He had always longed to get away from it, but at the last he found himself reluctant to part with it. It seemed a sort of betrayal of Aunt Sophronia. If it hadn't been for Ruby he might not have done this. But in any case, he could not keep it. Nor Ruby either.

"Don't you worry about me, Mr. Johnny," Ruby said. "There's plenty of places I can step into."

"I know. I just hate to have you go," Johnny said. "Are there any of Aunt Sophronia's things you would like, Ruby? I won't be able to keep them all, they'll just be sold.

All Ruby fancied, it seemed, was the little china tree and a rocking chair that Johnny had once bought Aunt Sophronia in a moment when his discrimination slipped or his optimism was high, and which she had never worn. He gave her these and a little silver creamer and sugar bowl and a small table. He was ashamed that he was reluctant to part with the china tree but he could not refuse it to her.

"What you do, Mr. Johnny," she said, "if you get married. Then I can come keep house for you!"

"Well, it's an inducement," he said. "And if I should get married, I'll hold you to it!"

The house brought more than he expected. He went to Mr. Knoll and said, "Is there any chance I could buy in on the firm, Mr. Knoll? I've come into a little money, but whether it would be enough, I don't know."

"Why not? Do with some new blood," Mr. Knoll said in his jerky manner.

Are you willing to forget what you have done for other people, and to remember what other people have done for you; to ignore what the world owes you, and to think what you owe the world; to put your rights in the background and your duties in the middle distance, and your chances to do a little more than your duty in the foreground; to see that your fellow men are just as real as you are, and to try and look behind their faces and their hearts, hungry for joy; and to admit that probably the only good reason for your existence is not of life, but what you are going to give to life; to close your book of complaints against the management of the universe, and look around for a place where you can sow a few seeds of happiness—are you willing to do these things even for a day?

Then you can keep Christmas.

MR. ELY lifted his head. The pages of his letter to Cass were strewed out across the desk, blurred where his head had fallen against them. He looked at them from far off, not able to read a word.

I am ill, he said. He was dizzy and let his head rest again on his arms. I must get into bed, he said.

But for a long time he sat there, unable to move. Something kept insisting to him that he should stay there, that he shouldn't go up stairs, that some danger awaited him there but he couldn't for the moment think what the danger was.

At last he pulled himself to his feet. The room was in darkness except for the one light by the desk. His head ached excruciatingly and his body seemed to have no bones. Something was unfinished and he dimly knew it but could not identify the something.

He moved toward the stairs. He floated there, rather. It was like one of those dreams in which disaster waits at the end of a road but in which you have to take that road and move toward catastrophe as if you wished to. He could name neither his unfinished business nor the disaster awaiting him, but his action was the same. In the east room he undressed and got into the red pajamas, crawled into bed. There seemed too many blankets and he thrust one back.

"Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego," a familiar voice said. "Into the burning fiery furnace goes the soul. There is always the fire and then the phoenix rising."

"For a pagan you do a lot of quoting from the Bible," the starling said.

"Symbols, symbols all," the unicorn said.

"Please," the rabbit said timidly, "please don't talk of fire."

"I was talking to Mr. Ely," said the unicorn.

"But he's afraid of fire too," the rabbit protested in a small voice.

"Mr. Ely is afraid of many things."

Mr. Ely felt suddenly that his head was clear. The blankets still seemed too many, however, and he pushed another back. "Words—I am afraid of words," he said.

'Let them go," the unicorn said.

"I make my living from them."

"Your living? Your money, you mean. But is not this journey into the fiery furnace the proof that your living lies elsewhere, Mr. Ely?"

"I am not alive," Mr. Ely said.

"Look here," the starling put in. "Let's not have any more talk like this. It doesn't get anywhere. You've got a fever, and that's no burning fiery furnace. Your girl's got you down. That's silly and nothing to give anybody a fever. You've been married to her ten years. What more do you want? You've published too many books where love is eternal—you've got so you believe 'em yourself. When it comes spring you get a sort of itch—you feel as if some little fluff would ease the itch. She does. But it's spring, and that's all there is to it. The next spring you get the feeling again and do something about it. I remember down in Capri once there was a bunch of feathers—but that's neither here nor there; you seem to think it ought to be spring all the year around! What's so special about that chick?"

"What's so special?" Mr. Ely said. Oh, what's so special? his mind asked wonderingly. What's so special about Cass?

For a moment she was there, warm and real, as she had been downstairs for a little breath of time. In a happy plaid suit. The plaid suit she had worn that night on the ferry. Queer, she never seemed to think of clothes at all. "That yellow blouse—that'll be all right," she'd say, not looking any others over at all. And it was always the exactly right thing. . . . That's special, Mr. Ely said. . . . "Let's be thrifty and use up this jar of caviar!" she said with a grin. Never save anything, not best dishes or best clothes or special foods or conversation—be thrifty, use them up. There'll be more. . . . That's special, Mr. Ely said. . . . She put her hand up flat against his cheek and her fingers said, every one of them, I love you. . . . She stood holding a new book in her hands and she said, "Oh, Johnny, I shall make a red banner and hang it out the window and on it I shall sew big letters saying, 'Johnny Ely lives here. He printed Tent City!' It's so good I could eat it!" . . . She put the review down on the sink and she said, "Don't they know—don't they know, Johnny, that they're not reviewing books, they're writing their autobiographies?" . . . She stood on the sidewalk and waved good-by to Ruby in the taxi, Ruby going off to see her sick sister. "I love Ruby," she said.

I love . . . I love . . . I love . . .

"I love Steppie."

Murray Steppington. I haven't seen Steppie in a long, long time, Mr. Ely said. He was always there then. . . . Little Steppie—little blue eyes—sharp nose—a passion for James Joyce. Not young. And Doctor Th . . . profane unbeliever, and Eveline, his w . . . good at church bazaars, so erring in p . . . life. . . . I could walk through that . . . Mr. Ely said. Even yet I could. Snore . . . that was Snorecombe. . . . I love Step . . .

A frog was caught in a deep rut in a road, and in spite of the help of his friends, he could not get out. They finally left him there in despair. The next day, one of his friends saw him, chipper as you please, and no longer in the rut.

"What are you doing here?" the friend asked. "I thought you couldn't get out."

"I couldn't," the frog replied. "But a truck came along and I had to."

"Oh, I do love Aggie!" she said. "Sh . . . strong as a lion! When I'm with her I . . . lion too. I can do anything."

"She's too much of a lion for Sid," he . . . "She deserves better."

"It doesn't matter what Sid is. T . . . he's all right," Cass said. "But it d . . . matter, does it? They love each oth . . . the right way—in . . . everlasting way. . . . what matters."

water in a scary land . . . you must leave her alone." . . . "Let's not wax poetical about Ruby."

"But, Ruby, she couldn't have told you to go! You misunderstood."

"No, Mr. Johnny, I understood. I said I wouldn't ever leave Miss Cass, not till I got carried out in a box, and that I wouldn't, only she don't want me to stay."

"Wait. I'll talk to her. You misunderstood, I tell you."

"You is the one what don't understand, Mr. Johnny. I'd stay if it was so as she wanted me."

Cass was in the bedroom, just standing there by the window, looking down into the street below.

"Cass, what have you done to Ruby?"

"I've dismissed her." Her voice was almost cold, very flat and expressionless.

"You can't do that!"

"I've done it." Was it coldness? Was it loneliness? Was it despair?

"After all she's done for us? Just because she isn't the automaton your mother thinks she ought to be?"

"Put it any way you like," she said.

"I put it that you've broken her heart."

"You can't break Ruby's heart. Would you mind going away and not talking about it any more? Has she gone?"

He'd stood and stared at her. "You mean you'd let her go without saying good-by to her?"

"I've said good-by to her."

It was dark in the east room, but the unicorn spoke softly through the darkness. "Ah, faithfulness that lets go, that cuts the bars before the bird dies, that hands the candle on before the enemy snuffs it out!"

"But there should have been no bars! There should have been no enemy!" Mr Ely cried. "She chose the enemy!"

"Fiddlesticks!" the starling said. "What did you do about the old witch, when it comes right down to it?"

"Was that the way it was?" Mr. Ely demanded of the unicorn, ignoring the starling. "Was it? Was it her heart broken, not Ruby's? Was she saving Ruby? Did she see her light going out and save her? Was that it?"

"Why do you think you're here?" the unicorn said.

"You mean me, too—you mean she'd thrust me out, too, to save me? You're mad!"

"To have courage to save others does not mean you have the courage to save yourself," the unicorn said.

"Did she ever have any more babies?" the starling asked.

"No. No, she never did," Mr. Ely said.

"Oh, dear," the rabbit said, as if she were going to cry.

Somewhere a door shut. It seemed like the door of his heart to Mr. Ely. Or was it the door to this room? Was he shut in here, alone with Them? Fear crept over him in little hot waves.

There were steps on the stairs.

"No, she never did," Mr. Ely said again.

"Cass? Are you here, Cass?" Aggie Emerson said.

"She didn't seem to want any more," Mr. Ely said.

"Cass?" Aggie said again. "Johnny? Are you here? Who's talking?"

The voice was sane. It was a thread of hope. It was help coming. It was the end of these voices, this furnace, these voices, voices, voices, that went on and on. He got out of bed and started toward the door. Everything began to swim about him. It seemed to him something large and shining gave a bound past him and went right through the wall.

"Johnny!" Aggie said.

He felt himself falling, but not heavily, lightly, lightly as a leaf, as snow, as a feather.

rest went. All the little ornaments, all the damask-covered chairs and the fine rugs and the little tables and the spodeware and the set of Limoges and the books and the beds that the two old aunts had died in, the quite good pictures, the fine linens that Aunt Sophronia and Aunt Maria would not trust to the hands of any but themselves. All gone, gone under the auctioneer's hammer.

And at night he went out and could not talk to anyone, could not go to Streeter's house, or to any bar where he might meet the talkative critics and musicians and those of their ilk that he knew. He did not know why he chose the ferry. It was just somewhere where he might be alone in the fog and get his life started again. Back and forth, back and forth. The fog was very thick and there was the constant sound of fog whistles, lonely and deep. A boy and girl were giggling and the girl said, "If we ever get home, Joe Kozyk, I'll show you!" He moved away from the voices toward the end of the ferry and he bumped bang into someone.

"Whoops!" said a rueful voice.

"Sorry," he said.

He leaned against the rail. He could see nothing, yet there seemed to be life out there in the fog. The whistles seemed very close.

"Do ferries ever bang into anything?" the young, rueful voice said, and he turned and just made her out, a young thing in a plaid suit with a plaid cap like a jockey's cap.

"I don't think so. If one has to give up believing ferries are invulnerable, what has one left to believe in?" he said.

She gave a soft chuckle, delighted, warm. "Then I'll just float in the fog and stop worrying," she said, and was silent, there beside him against the rail.

"Is that all you've got to worry about?" he heard himself saying, though he was the last person in the world to talk to strangers on a ferry or anywhere else.

"Quite all," said the voice. Then that soft laugh came again. "You sound very nice, coming out of nothingness like that."

"You do too," he said.

She moved her head and for an instant he saw her face, dimly, but he saw it, that small, irregular face under the brim of the silly cap. Then someone passed and the face was shadowed, lost in the dim night again.

THEN came the bump of the ferry against the pier, the sound of ghosts moving off. But Johnny stayed there by the rail and the girl in the plaid suit stayed there too. And presently more ghost cars took the place of those that had vanished and the ferry moved out into the river again. Just their both staying on the boat made a sort of intimacy.

"I wonder if they had fogs on the Styx?" he said. "D'you think Charon had fogs to contend with?" He waited for the slow chuckle and it didn't come.

"Oh," she said at last, "are you going from one life to another too?"

"Exactly," he said. "The furniture's sold and the house is gone. You know, I thought I'd feel something when strangers took the furniture. I didn't."

"Then why are you here?" she asked. She sounded serious now, serious and a little sad.

"I don't just know. I didn't want to talk to anybody. . . . There was a misty little Monet—I ought to have kept that. I can't think why I didn't."

"Oh, I don't think Monets would do on the other side," she said. "They'll have Van Gogh's at the very least—something soaked in sun. Nothing misty!"

"Do you think so? Do you really think so? 'Something soaked in sun'—that's nice, you know. But I'm afraid my imagination doesn't stretch past the fog."

"Sometimes I wish mine didn't," she said more slowly. "I can always see my next life very clearly—oh, and such a life! I have a heart like a tiger in it—I can make myself over, make changes, bear anything I have to. All easy as pie!"

"Have you lived so many lives?" he asked.

"Yes, a good many. Well, four or five."

"That's a good many. I've just lived one."

"Only one?" she said with soft mock dismay. "In the same house—with a Monet on the wall?"

And I thought you were tight Friday ight!" Aggie said. "Johnny! Johnny, come—into bed with you. You'll have to make it on your own—you can't lie here."

He felt the soft camel's hair of her coat—and then the bed again. "Take me out of here," he whispered. "Don't leave me here with them!"

But she went away and then she was giving him a pill and a glass of water.

"Just aspirin, old man—it won't hurt you. Down it!" Then she laughed. "You look very fetching in Sid's pajamas."

"See, they're all alike—trying to make you the first five minutes!" the starling said.

"She's got Sid," he said.

"Eh?" Aggie said. "Who's got Sid? I hope the New Haven and Hartford's got him. I dropped him off in Waterbury. . . . Steady now, Johnny. Lie still and I'll be back in a jiffy."

He lay very still, as if by stillness the fires would die down in the fiery furnace.

She came in without the camel's-hair coat. Her brown face looked far off, but clear. Her eyes were troubled. "Sissy!" she said. "Afraid of a little snow! Couldn't make the hill myself, but it wouldn't have hurt him to walk up. He'll be here in the morning, though. What's the world come to when a doctor has to get a full night's sleep? . . . Want me to call Cass, Johnny?"

"No. No," Johnny said.

She sat down by the bed.

Suddenly he was going to sleep—he felt himself going, blessedly going away from the awful night, the awful day, into nothingness. Really going this time. No false promise. He knew Aggie was there. Everything seemed controlled, all right, with big brown Aggie Emerson sitting there beside the bed.

He woke and Aggie sat there in the chair by the bed, but it was still night. Sweat stood out on his thin body and he didn't feel hot now. Little chills crept over his back. Aggie's head was back against the high back of the chair and her eyes were shut. He wanted to wake her, reach out and take her hand, but he didn't. He lay still and shivered, wanting to pull another blanket over him, not having the strength.

She looks so tired, he thought. She's got Sid's book born and now she's got to lay me out. She's a lion, but she looks so tired. I ought not to die here and give her all the trouble.

She moved, opened her eyes.

"Go to sleep, I'm all right," he said.

"Thank God!" she said. "But don't talk, Johnny. Go to sleep yourself. You've talked enough for one night."

"I have?"

She gave a grim little laugh. "I'm sorry I couldn't take it down," she said. "You'd have been surprised!"

"Something hit me," he said. "What did I talk about?"

"We'll save it for some Freudian novelist and it'll be a best seller," she said. "Go to sleep, Johnny."

"They won't leave me alone in the dark," he said.

She stood up, went over to the bureau, came back with a thermometer, thrust it under his tongue.

Studies in Frustration

By Ethel Jacobson

She loves to run her fingers
  Lightly through his hair.
There's nothing he hates worse.
  You take it from there.

Little mannerisms,
  Each once considered cute,
Day by day by day by day
  Bring out the snarling brute.

He went to take a shower,
  He went to take a bath,
But intimate apparel,
  Dripping, barred his path.
So he married a Bali maid last fall
Who never bothered with clothes at all.

He wants the window up.
  She wants it down.
Everything's settled:
  He's rooming in town.

Their home life has
  More downs than ups.
He puts out butts

"You were meant to," he said.

"I think you've got something there."

"Sit down and talk to me, Aggie."

"All right, Johnny. The doctor said to keep you quiet, but I don't seem to have any faith in doctors this morning."

"There's a little girl downstairs." He had something he wanted to say about the head on the piano, but he couldn't think what it was. Aggie was sitting in the chair. He could see her hands holding tight to the arms.

"Yes, that's Sally," she said. "Sid's girl. Didn't Cass tell you?"

"No, she didn't tell me."

She had on slacks and a green blouse. He didn't know when she'd put them on.

"You know, Johnny, that makes me want to cry," Aggie said. "That she didn't tell you, I mean. You think, 'Well, she'll tell her husband'—you think no secret is really a secret. And she didn't tell you. . . . That's Sid's little girl. She's a big girl now. And it was all my fault that she's not here. She came and they took her away—her grandmother. I hated that woman. I talked like a fishwife to her. Just like a fishwife. I made myself no fit person to bring up a child and they took her away and kept her and Sid has never had her. And then I couldn't even have one of my own. . . . And I went to Cass and told her and wept all over your davenport—and she never told you."

"No, she never told me."

"Johnny, what's wrong with you and Cass? I thought you were drunk Friday night. I'm sorry. What's wrong?"

He looked at the unicorn and the unicorn looked at him, silently, sternly, not amused now. The horn stuck up through the branches of the holly tree and there was Cass, reaching, reaching with her mittened hands.

"Darling! Darling! You'll prick your hands!" he said.

"Johnny! Johnny!" Aggie said.

"Her doom fell, Aggie. I told her it wouldn't it fell. . . . Doom doom that has an awful sound - awful, dying sound. Doom doom doom"

"Oh, Johnny!" Aggie said.

"I'm being an awful nuisance," Johnny said quite clearly. "But it's about time I stood on my own, don't you think? You have to send my clothes to the cleaners and all that. And there's all those stairs. I think it's about time I had a room of my own."

ONE year of magic. Pure magic. No, it was better than magic. It was real. You made it be real. She made it be real. The little apartment in the Village with the yellow dishes and the pot of ivy that grew and grew and grew till they thought they would have to move out and give over the apartment to the ivy. "It's my green thumb," Cass said. They laughed there. John Thackeray Ely had never laughed so much in all his years before. People came. Steppie and Standish and Minnie Burke and even Mr. Knoll. It didn't seem just talk any more. The talk was tied onto life and laughter. And Cass let her hair grow. She had first little stubby pigtails that she used to tie little bows of red or white baby ribbon onto and she looked about ten. Then it grew longer and she put the braids up on top of her head and pretended it made her dignified. And the baby was coming.

"Now I am going to get Ruby," he said. "We can swing it and she'll take care of you and The Pumpkin." They called him The Pumpkin.

"Do we have to? I know I'm not very efficient, darling, but I like it this way."

"You're efficient enough—but Ruby won't spoil anything. You'll see."

And Cass said, "Johnny, don't ever let me doubt you again. How did we ever live without Ruby?"

And it went on being beautiful and right. Even when she lost The Pumpkin.

"Never fear, Johnny!" she said. "It scared me for a minute, but you'll see what I can do when I really put my mind to it!"

And then the letter came. She came. Not what Johnny had expected at all. Tall and elegant, with her nails a frightful shade. A great deal of luggage. An amused, malicious, worldly manner. He didn't see how she could be Cass' mother. He never thought of her at first as Cass' mother, just a too dressy female that had come to visit them. He half liked her at first.

"When do you expect to begin really keeping house?" she asked one day. That might have been the beginning.

"What do you call this?" Cass demanded.

"I call it rather juvenile playing at keeping house," Bertha said. "Don't you? Is Johnny trying to keep expenses down, or what?"

"No, I'm not," Johnny said. "We like this place."

"Really?" she said. "I'm not surprised at Cass. She always had a taste for the Bohemian. But I should think you had a bit more discrimination."

And that cut him, in spite of himself. He had been so happy in the little apartment that he had never even seen it was not beautiful, that it was too small, that it was inconvenient and cluttered. It had been very gay and he had been starved for gaiety.

"It's just right—for us," Cass said.

But he saw it was too small. He saw that he could afford better. He saw that there wasn't room for them and Ruby and Bertha.

Two nights later he said to Cass, "I've found a decent place on Fifty-seventh."

"Why?" she asked.

"We need it. Ruby has to sleep in that little cubbyhole. I won't have your mother thinking I keep you in the slums."

"Oh," Cass said. Then: "But, Johnny—it's our house—it's our life. It's all the room I want. If you have a big house, it begins to own you. I've lived in big houses. I don't want any part of them."

The secret of success in conversation is to be able to disagree without being disagreeable. —The Universe.

"We couldn't even ask a guest to stay all night here. There's no place for a guest."

"After mother goes, there will be. Ruby doesn't mind the cubbyhole. She says it's cozy."

But they took the house on 57th Street. It had a big, formal drawing room and a real dining room that they had to buy furniture for. They? Bertha was the one who hunted up this antique shop and that, induced them to pay two hundred dollars for a bureau and four hundred for an old French desk.

STANDISH appreciated the desk, but Steppie said, "Very fine. Very fine. What did you do with old Bumpy?" Old Bumpy was the battered old roll-top desk that Cass had found in some secondhand shop. It had a lot of room in it and that was all you could say for it.

Still, it was good for a while. Cass bought things, she made the place gay. She said, "Come in for tea, Minnie!" . . . "Come have potluck Saturday night, Steppie!"

Bertha went off somewhere for a trip, and while she was gone the crowd collected again and for a little space it was all right. Then she came back.

"Why haven't you ever looked up Emily, darling?" she said. "She is hurt that you haven't."

"Emily Gorham? I have always loathed her," Cass said.

"She was once your best friend, wasn't she?"

"No, she never was. I haven't any intention of looking her up."

"Then you'd better have an engagement this afternoon, for I've asked her for tea."

"I will," Cass said.

"Who's Emily Gorham?" Johnny asked Cass.

"A girl I used to know. Out of a world I used to know."

She went out for a long walk in the park, and when she got back Johnny had come in and Emily Gorham was still there. A lanky, beautiful, redheaded girl.

"Cass, darling!" she cried, went rig Cass and kissed her. "Why didn't you tell me you were in town? Heavens, th we could have been having! You look derful! Simply entrancing—but you al did, darling! I hate you for not lookin up!" All in a high, unreal voice.

Cass smiled, but vaguely, walked aw

"Cass seems to have forgotten he friends," Bertha said coolly and amus "You must dig her out of the rut she herself into, Emily. She and Johnny the oddest collection of creatures who gregate here. They need to see a new now and then."

"Odd?" Cass said. "How—odd?"

"Oh, darling, don't start champi your lame ducks! They're all odd, fan cally so. Even your Mr. Knoll doesn't any manners."

"He has enough for me. He has a heart," Cass said.

"I ADORE lame ducks!" Emily said. must ask me to see them, Cass—you t must! Oh, we did use to have fun, you Bobo and I, didn't we, Cass? . . . never knew Bobo, did you, Mr. Ely?"

"No, I never knew Bobo," Johnny

"He had the face of an angel—absol an angel! Like Shelley or one of boys! . . . I'm not trying to dig int wounds, Bertha—but Bobo was divine never forget him. . . . Cass, you had a passion for him—quite Freudian, I us think! . . .Whenever I think, 'He's go it's as if a star went out! You don't min talking about him, do you? He was my love and you always do get sentimenta your first love. . . . Oh, I've got to Look, Cass, why don' and Johnny get yours into something das and join us later? W going to the ballet and make a few rounds would be heaven! have you along! Si heavenly! . . . You Bertha, of course! Oh I've found you, I'm not going to let you even if you have been simply foul about ing me up!"

"I'm sorry, but we're tied up for toni Cass said. She hadn't moved toward E to say good-by to her or anything.

Bertha was aloof and angry all thr dinner. But after dinner she said, "Ca don't need to tell you that you behaved inexcusable rudeness to Emily. You you did. Am I to understand that I can what guests I like here?"

"Of course not," Cass said. "But, told you—only you didn't seem to he I loathe Emily Gorham. Do you see reason why I have to go through the far pretending I don't?"

Bertha laughed and said, "If we were to everyone we loathed, it would be a pl messy business, society, wouldn't it?"

"I've never known Cass to be rude to one before," Johnny said. "If she was, I'm sure she had reason to be."

Some of the tightness seemed to go o Cass. She said, "Oh, let's not talk a Emily any more. Have her if you like mother, but don't ask me to welcome that's all. . . . Let's take a walk, Joh It's snowing and I want to get out in it

They walked in the snow.

"Look, Johnny," she said suddenly. " don't have to mix up lives, do you? O you? Do they always overlap? Can't help it?"

"I think they always overlap—sor he said.

"Oh, no, Johnny! Some things you h to cut right off. You have to!"

"Well, we'll cut off the beautiful Emi you like. I'm speaking in general. . . . know what I was thinking about while that unseemly row was going on? A Sophronia and her false teeth."

She put her hand on his arm. Ligh but lovingly. Waited.

aunt making out with her new plate? She was bound to have them in right away, so I did it, but I was afraid she'd have trouble.' I didn't even know she'd had a new plate. Here she'd had her teeth out and gone through all that, and it must be pretty devastating, and she'd never said a word. She never in all the time afterward mentioned those teeth and I never did either. Now, was that courage or pride, or some of both? The point is, in case you've missed it, darling—I never liked Aunt Sophronia much. You couldn't. But all the same, she's part of me. She overlaps into now. I find myself remembering things about her at the most unexpected times. The way she fussed over tea, whether there were guests or not; the way she said, 'Your father was -deflected'; the way she put down every penny she spent in little black books; the way she dressed up one night when I took her to a concert. She overlaps. I just don't believe you can help it. Even if your new life is incredibly different, you're made up of old lives. Aren't you?"

She didn't say anything for a full block. Then she said, "It makes life a prison. You never get out."

"But we are out, darling."

"Are we, Johnny? Are we?" she asked, and her fingers were a little tighter on his arm. He wanted to stop there in the snow and take her in his arms and kiss her. But he didn't.

"We are," he said. "We don't have to ever 'make the rounds' with Emily and her crew, you know. We never will, so help me. But that sometime or other she was in your life enough for loathing, that I don't think you can deny."

"No, I suppose I can't," she said. Her voice was a little tired. "She married a very old, very rich, dying man when she was nineteen mother thought it clever of her. And while he was dying she was –was playing around with Bobo." Then she laughed, quite warmly, quite unexpectedly, and said, "Let's go and rout out Steppie!"

And they did. Steppie was delighted to see them, but Johnny couldn't help noting that he was surprised too. But he came with them and they stopped in somewhere and had coffee and Cass was very gay, very funny, and it was like old times in the apartment in the Village.

But when they parted, Cass took Steppie's two hands in hers and said, "Steppie, come to see us. Don't leave us alone so long again!"

Steppie stood there in front of his ro house, a little gnome of a man, but sweetness in his face that went ri your heart. "I'll come," he promised. you're a little grand for me these day two."

"Grand?" Cass said. "Us?"

"I'm used to eating in the kit Steppie said.

"I know," Cass said, and then she him suddenly and said, "All right, S You needn't come."

Johnny walked away with her in s He felt a small resentment; not jealou cause Cass had kissed Steppie—yo weren't jealous of Cass' warmth—b sentment because he had wanted to the snow and kiss her earlier in the e and because he had been too inhibite so.

"You did a quick about-face ther said at last.

"I know," she said. "Johnny, a happier in the new house?"

"No. I have more room to ha clothes. No, I'm not happier. Though see why a little extra space should p happiness."

"It shouldn't, should it? But—i kept it a little crowded, a little clutt little inconvenient—it—it wouldn't easy for my other lives to get in. Or my new life out. I—I'm just not managing both, darling."

"You don't like the house?" he sa

"I might—if we were alone there. my house."

"Your mother'll be pushing off t new lotus bed soon," he told her be ours again."

"It's like the albatross—from s grade," she said.

"Where's your tiger heart?" he her.

She hugged his arm and said, "I've I've got it again! Oh, Johnny, I felt gone. But I can do anything now, any And after a little, more soberly: "Wit and Ruby's help."

Steppie came once, but Bertha ha people in for bridge, fashionable, m people, and though they escaped dining room and talked some, it was good. Steppie and Cass never play vicar game in that house. Indeed, stopped coming after that. Standish Bertha intrigued him and he was ofte in the late afternoon, slyly egging he confidences. Minnie Burke didn't either. She was the girl who was studying medicine and painting at the same time. She couldn't decide what she really wanted to be. She looked like a gypsy and had a great deal of energy and spirit. Johnny knew that Cass saw her sometimes. But Minnie didn't come to the house.

Bertha always pretended she was on the verge of dashing off somewhere else. "I'm toying with the idea of Sea Island for March," she would say. Johnny would wait for March. "Grace writes that it's intolerably dull at Sea Island," she said. "I think I'll wait till April and go to Pinehurst."

"But it's dull for you here, isn't it?" Cass said. "It would be different, at least."

"Oh, I amuse myself here. You aren't getting tired of me, are you, sweet?"

"It just seems as if you'd have more fun on your own," Cass said.

And in April, Cass came in one day and cried, "Oh, mother, come see a love of an apartment. It's perfect for you, absolutely perfect. Smart as anything and on top of the world!"

"Perfect for me?" Bertha said. "But what would I do with an apartment?"

"Come see it! Just come see it!"

"But I haven't the slightest desire to see it, Cass. It would be very stupid to take on the responsibility of an apartment when I am always knocking about from pillar to post. Of course I can always put up at a hotel for the week or two I'm in town between jaunts."

"Don't be silly, mother. It just seemed exactly your place. And you do seem to like New York—so why not live here?"

"Oh, but I don't like it especially. I think next winter I'll try Mexico. The Wickards are going and I might trail along. They know a Spanish family in Mexico City that sound fabulous. No, I certainly wouldn't want to tie myself here."

Our main business is not to see what lies dimly at a distance; but to do what lies clearly at hand.

—THOMAS CARLYLE.

And then Cass didn't try again. And the summer went by. Bertha did go off somewhere for a cruise. It was very hot then and they were quiet during her absence. One week end they did go up to the Cape with Knoll, but Cass was quiet there, too, though she seemed to like it.

It was on that trip that Knoll said, "What's troubling Cass?"

"I don't know," Johnny said.

"Don't know? Why don't you know? Too thin. Don't like it."

"She's always thin." But he looked at her sitting on the sand dune a few rods away and she looked very small, as if the wind might blow her away.

"Take her over to England in fall. Losing touch over there. Pick up a few good numbers. Do you both good."

When he told her, her eyes filled with tears, though she never, never cried. "Oh, could we? Could we?" she said, as if she had been longing terribly to go somewhere.

They had fun in London. They seemed to be liked among the literary folk.

"They think you seem quite British!" Cass explained it with a grin.

"Well, you don't. No one could be less British than you, darling—and they love you!"

But after two weeks there and at that house in Kent where the lady had written her memoirs, they ran away for a week in Cornwall and that was the best of it all.

They sat on the edge of the cliff and watched the mighty waves tumbling about the mighty rocks and they were all alone in the world. They walked down and ate at the Tinner's Arms and came back and walked across the heather.

"Oh, when I die, bury me under the purple heather!" Cass said.

They lay in the heather and let the autumn sun, warm for once, shine down on them and they were happy.

Cass laughed and said, "Your shadow—it was so like father that I had a feeling he was walking along with us. So tall and thin and jerky! Father would have loved heather. He had the loveliest garden. peaceful, so lovely. People never seeme spoil it. He was so busy, but he worke the garden every morning, early. 'Cass, said once, 'there's no grief so deep that w ing with flowers won't assuage it. Alw have a garden!' But he had a grief garden didn't assuage—he died of it." voice grew quiet and somber. She flung her arm, let her hand rest on his cheek he loved her so much that all the w seemed made of love.

"Do you need a garden?" he said.

"Not while I have you," she said. "Yo my garden, Johnny. . . . He loved Bob terribly much, you see. Oh, so much r than me. He loved me, too, but so much Because I didn't hurt him, maybe. He me for granted. Bobo you could never tak granted. He was shining and unpredict like—like Lucifer. And when he died, in a stupid, wicked way, father died too the garden—he went out to assuage his in the garden and he had a heart attack died there."

He rested his face more closely ag her hand. "I never see you in that life, said. "I know you had it, the big house the gardens and all that—but I neve you there. You were born on a ferryboa me—a poor girl who had lost her job. I can't see you any other way."

"I'm glad," she said. "That's when I born, Johnny."

"I too."

"No, you weren't. You're more of a than that. I can see you in the Sixty-fo Street house very cle I know Aunt Sophi as if I'd lived with and Mrs. Beaseley. Sadie, with her flat and her skipping of ners. . . . Sometimes I such an awful sense of darling. That I'm not a piece. . . . Johnny

He looked up at her. "H'm?"

"Johnny—you said the past always laps. But if nothing reminded m wouldn't."

"Ah, but something always does, do it?"

"Yes, something always does. Still, didn't, I could forget it. I could cut it o my heart. I really could. I mean, if I see Emily, for instance, she would be unimportant. I am a now sort of pe If mother was off on a cruise somev or gone to Mexico or—anywhere but me, I could forget her, I could forge guilt."

"Guilt?"

"About not loving her. But when there I know she's got a sword throug heart. That she lives like that, year in, out—I'm afraid she is clinging to me be of the sword and I pity her. Though doesn't act like that, does she?"

"No, she certainly doesn't. I think imagine the sword."

"Perhaps I do. If I did, I couldn't give myself for it. Only I don't think imagine it. How could you not have it you know you are responsible? You see encouraged Bobo and—and that wo She wanted it that way. She didn't Bobo to have young friends, girls he r marry. She liked him precocious and wo and wicked. And then—and then whe friend killed him —— Oh, the sword is t Johnny! It has to be. For she loved Bob Sometimes I think father was lucky, th died of his grief. felt suddenly warm all through. "All this heather, all this purple heather," she said. "I feel as if it's me—as if the purple heather were growing out of me and smiling at my Johnny in the sun."

For it was true: Cass was a now sort of person. She spoke of the past seldom, and then when she did slip into it for a moment, she slipped out again with an abruptness, a completeness that made you a little dizzy. She put the past away somewhere and now, this moment, this heather, this sun, this being together in Cornwall was all there was, all that was needed for complete happiness and peace. And yet the peace wasn't static. It had life in it, life and laughter and brightness. It seemed, lying on the heather, that they loved each other so much that nothing could possibly come between them ever.

But they came home. Ruby was different.

"Did you make hay while we were away, Ruby?" Johnny said.

"I made beds," Ruby said more tersely than was her wont.

"You mean," Cass said, turning her hat around in her hands, "you mean—mother didn't go away, Ruby? She said she was going away."

"Well, Miss Cass, she didn't. She had a lot of company whilst you was on your trip. A powerful lot of company. . . . I like company, I like it real well—I don't mind the extra work. It's not that, Miss Cass."

"I know, Ruby. I'm sorry."

"Nothing you're to blame for, Miss Cass. Only don't nobody like to feel like nothing."

"I know, Ruby."

"Bless you, child. Everything's all right now you and Mr. Johnny is back. This house, it surely's not the same with you out of it. You looks wonderful, Miss Cass, sure enough wonderful. Mr. Johnny too. I certainly am glad to see you look so good!" And the warmth came back into her smile and she bustled about getting food for them.

But Cass' face seemed to grow smaller, not quite so gay. Still, she sat there by the kitchen table and laughed with Ruby and told her a few funny things about the trip. "Oh, it was fun, Ruby. Only I kept wishing you were along—I kept thinking, 'I mustn't forget to tell Ruby about that.'"

Ruby laughed. "Sure enough, Miss Cass?"

It was Johnny who first mentioned the guests. "Ruby says you've been having company," he said.

"I don't doubt you," Bertha said. "Ruby felt herself put upon, I suppose."

"I didn't say that. Ruby has always liked company. Only I did tell her she could have herself a vacation while we were gone."

"You pamper her," Bertha said.

"She deserves pampering. She's Ruby, who has no like under the sun."

"Nonsense! She comes a dime a dozen in the South. . . . I thought I was being quite considerate, having my friends in while you were away."

"Why? Don't we make them welcome when we're here?" Johnny said.

"Well, they don't feel you do. They may not be literary, but they know when they bore people," Bertha said, eying Johnny with something like maliciousness.

"That's silly, mother," Cass said. "You're just trying to put us in the wrong. We've always welcomed your friends here and you know it. It's a bit crumby of you, trying to give people the impression that we don't, that you have to sneak in guests while we're away."

"Sneak?" Bertha's voice was suddenly sharp.

"It seems like that," Cass said stubbornly. "You knew we promised Ruby a holiday."

"You're very considerate—of Ruby," Bertha said.

"Do you mean we're not—of you?" Cass said.

"Oh, come—we're quarreling," Johnny said, ashamed. "Of course you're welcome to have your friends here, Bertha. It did seem a bit of a reflection on our hospitality, but naturally, you didn't mean it so."

"I think she did," Cass said. "I think we ought to quarrel about it."

Square meals have 3 sides!

● Square meals can't get by on good looks alone. They must have good flavors and good nutritional values as well. And that's something to reckon with—when you realize how easily raw foods can lose flavors and vitamins in long transit from farm to market to kitchen—in exposure and storage—and even in home preparation!

But when you serve canned foods you can count on flavors and nutrients—as well as fine appearance. Yes, the steel-and-tin can is your best meal protector!

For hungry folks . . . blended citrus juice, luncheon meat, corn, brussels sprouts, diced vegetables for vinaigrette salad, apricots, cookies, coffee, milk . . . and they all come to you in

Here's the "key" to the situation

Your pet can opener is your personal key to square meals. How proudly you serve the modern canned foods that bring your table such good nutrition and such great variety! Literally, "everything from soup to nuts." Always so convenient to store, so ready and safe to use, so economical to buy—so good to eat!

Look what the "neighbors" brought in!

The modern cannery is generally located right in the neighborhood of farms that grow foods especially for canning. Within a matter of minutes almost, foods are picked, brought to the cannery, expertly prepared, popped into cans and cooked right in the can. Which means each can is really a miniature "pressure cooker" that captures natural flavors and precious nutrients.

he hadn't meant to betray Mr. Knoll by "furbishing" up the office. It was just that he liked things that way. But the list—that was something else.

"Damn her!" he whispered.

For it was true, he had to make money. He had to. He was too diminished otherwise. She diminished him. She began after that trip to England—oh, before, but steadily after that.

She gave Cass a mink coat for Christmas.

"Oh, mother, you shouldn't have been so extravagant!"

"It's not extravagance," Bertha said. "It's self-indulgence. Johnny may not mind that ratty-looking tweed you slop around in, but I do. And, after all, why shouldn't I manage a few little luxuries for you while Johnny is getting started?"

JOHNNY had loved buying clothes for Cass, bu Cass never seemed to want new things. She bought so quickly and carelessly and she always looked wonderful to Johnny, no matter what she wore. Bertha made him unjustly small by getting the coat. He hated the coat.

She had some people in for dinner and she got some extra help in to serve. "There's no reason you should bear the expense," she said, "and I'm probably too fussy about the amenities."

"You've hurt Ruby," Cass said.

"Sorry. When you have guests you can let her talk to them all you like, darling. I find it somewhat embarrassing. When there's a choice between efficiency and the garrulities of the 'old family servitor,' I'll take the efficiency!"

And then: "I'm going to take Cass on a trip, Johnny. You are so engrossed in business—but I think the child is thin."

Johnny said to Cass, "Don't go away, darling. You don't want to go, do you? I know we haven't had much fun lately, but ——"

"Yes, I think I'd like to go," she said.

She'd gone away. She'd really gone to Baltimore with her mother.

Ruby said, "Seems like the light goes out the house when Miss Cass goes."

"Yes," he said.

"Why don't you pack up your duds and go down there for over Sunday, Mr. Johnny? Don't seem natural you not being with her."

"No, it doesn't seem natural, but I'm not going, Ruby," he said.

Then there was that business with Laura Demming. Strange, but everything seemed easier, better, then, as if it bound him and Cass together. But afterward——

Johnny met Emily Gorham on the street and she said in her gay but false voice, "Hello, Johnny! What fun to run into you! Still living with the same woman, Johnny?" she asked, smiling her lazy smile at him. She had on a brown fur hat that made her red hair beautiful.

"Still," he said.

"Oh, really? I wondered. Bertha indicated that a crack-up was imminent. But then, Bertha was ever an alarmist."

"Nothing in it," he tried to say lightly. "Bertha has a passion for making trouble."

"Swell," Emily said. "Cass is very snooty to me, but I don't wish her hard luck. If she doesn't mind people taking poison all over the place for love of you, why should I worry? As a matter of fact, I think it's all quite romantic. Maybe it enhances your charms for her—it often works that way, doesn't it? Just because Bertha puts her down for a fool is no sign she is one, is it, Johnny?"

"Could we talk about something else?" Johnny said. "If you don't mind?"

"We could, but I hate to. Cass intrigues me—you and Cass both."

"Afraid I've got to run along, Emily."

"Oh? Fun to have seen you, Johnny! Love to Cass!"

They had the penthouse. He took Cass there and said, "It'll have sun, Cass. You need some sun."

Harper Center Simmer Burners are superior to all other top burners because each Harper burner is really 2 burners in 1. As shown in diagram, the big outer burner brings foods to a quick boil. Turn handle until it "clicks" and the big burner goes out, leaving only the small, efficient inner burner lit to finish the cooking.

Only the separate Harper Center Simmer gives you the controlled low heats you need to keep foods warm for serving . . . to eliminate pot watching and boiling dry... to allow cooking with little water, which saves time and gas and keeps the average kitchen 9 degrees cooler. Only the Harper separate Center Simmer can help you so much in your cooking.

Insist on Harper Burners!

Wilson's MOR is a "4-square" meat made of delicious sweet pork shoulder processed and seasoned the exclusive Wilson way. You'll say it's "First in Flavor." Sliced cold, fried, or baked like a whole ham, MOR makes a sure enough square meal for breakfast, lunch or dinner. There's always meat in the house when there's MOR in the pantry. room was quite so warm They tried. tried quite y and Cass But it was he same. They nvite the nicest , they could he room shine, was no good. y did was prove room can be ng or nothing, ding on the who live in it ve it life.

n Bertha began ing youngish here. Handsome oung men, all of men who made him. Johnny, feel small nwanted. He said to himself, I won't let intimidate me! It's I that Cass married. e'd wanted a football player she'd have 'ed one. But all the same, when these talked to him with a certain deference was based on scorn he hated them. He mall and futile. He knew, he knew it was een him and Bertha, the war, and yet was pulled into it, whether he would or He had never been jealous—he became us. He became unreasonable.

SENT her off to a party with Francis ny," Bertha would say. "She has such with him—you don't mind, do you?" Of course not," he would say, minding much indeed.

r: "He's amazing, young Welles. Really mazing man! You should like him—he's rudite. Odd, you always think of the lite ones as little dried up, fussy men, out any life in them."

r: "You and Ralph seemed to be having n fun this afternoon, Cass. I haven't heard laugh like that in years. He is a witty n!"

There never seemed to be a time when nny could say, "That was it. That was moment when I knew she didn't love me more." It was just that little by little didn't seem to be with him so much, she ln't laugh with him any more, she wasn't re forever close to his heart, under his skin. e wore her hair a different way. She some- nes even played bridge with her mother's ends. She bought more clothes. She said ngs sometimes in a new voice, laughing a new way too.

And Johnny knew it was happening and could not stop it. He made a good deal of money for a youngish man. He bought extravagant presents. He was known in his world and made entrances on first nights and the like.

At first he talked back to Bertha a little. He made sharp, malicious remarks to match sharp, malicious remarks. Then one day he heard himself make a remark like that to Cass, heard himself in amazement and fear. "Sometime, if you ever come out of your absorption in your mother complex long enough, you might ask the laundryman not to starch my collars so much," he said.

One day, one Sunday when Bertha had had a crowd in, he made a little list of the topics of conversation. He gave it to Bertha next morning—or left it by her plate at breakfast time. She rarely got up for breakfast with them.

"What's that?" Cass asked.

"A compilation of drivel."

She reached out a hand for it, slowly, but he took her wrist and drew her hand back.

"It's for Bertha," he said.

Bertha laughed about it that night, seemingly not angry, only amused. "Ah, but Johnny, dear, isn't it more fun to talk of trivial matters wittily than of the state of the world and men's souls with such deadly seriousness? Are you doing anything about the state of the world, may I ask?" she finished.

He wanted to say that yes, he was. He was trying to publish books that enlarged man's knowledge. But he thought of a book accepted that day, a book that enlarged no one, that only titillated the emotions, and falsely at that.

After that he didn't talk back much. But he hated her. He hated her so much that he tried not to be in the house any more than he could help while she was there. He went to a good many parties, sometimes with Cass, sometimes without her. He got in late for dinner often.

After Ruby went, it was worse. For he was ashamed to leave Cass alone there in the house with Bertha and the pretty, extremely efficient and hard maid who took Ruby's place. He felt guilty and yet he hardened his heart. She had chosen it that way, hadn't she? The truth was that she put her loyalty to Bertha above her loyalty to him. There was no evading that truth. She certainly knew that he loathed Bertha, but Bertha stayed. It was her spirit that dominated the house. It was the high-pitched, brittle conversation of her friends which was heard most often in the rooms that belonged to him—to him and Cass. And Cass let it happen.

But then he would be sitting at his desk and Cass' face would suddenly come before him as it had come to him out of the fog on the ferryboat, small and young and full of some love of life and yet almost afraid that that love would not be accepted, and his heart would stand still, as if an enormous burden had been thrust upon him. Or talking with Bud Gillian, a music critic he knew, he would abruptly remember Cass kissing Steppie and saying, "Don't come, Steppie." He would feel hurt and despair put fingers around his heart and squeeze. Then he would go home, leaving Bud Gillian without an apology or ado, hurry home, and the room would be full of the smoke of bridge players, still sitting avidly around the table. Perhaps Cass, too, would be playing. She quite often was now. When he came in, they would pay their debts, leave. As if his coming were a signal that the fun must cease.

Love is a kitten in the sun,
A tawny plaything for the heart,
We think, and, thinking, are undone.
It was enchantment from the start.
For love grows swiftly, growing strong
And supple in a little space,
Until, suspecting something wrong,
We look a leopard in the face.

Duck and Orange Salad and plenty of Real Mayonnaise

★ DIRECTIONS

Trick Good Cooks All Know

When soups, sauces spreads are talked of the house is handy with her Hellmann's (or Best Foods) Real Mayonnaise. Not just in salads, but in dozens of other ways like those mentioned above nothing matches the flavor of Real Mayonnaise.

Being real mayonnaise—not "salad dressing"—Hellmann's (or Best Foods) Real Mayonnaise contains no starchy filler. It's pure mayonnaise all mayonnaise: eggs freshly broken from the shell, added egg yolks, our own "Fresh-Press" salad oil, mild vinegar, and spices—all double-whipped to that famous smooth-as-silk texture. Hellmann's (or Best Foods) Real Mayonnaise passes every test for flavor and texture. It's so rich and pure—even when thinned with milk or fruit juice—it's still creamy smooth, still full of real mayonnaise flavor.

Then last Friday morning he came in to breakfast and Cass sat there, coffee poured in front of her, not waiting for him.

She looked up and said, "Johnny, though it's happened already, we might as well make it legal by a divorce, don't you think?"

"What's happened?" he said.

"We're divorced, aren't we?"

"I don't know what you mean," he said.

"It's not a time to pretend to be stupid, Johnny. You've never been that. It's over, that's all."

"Oh, you're ready for another one of your lives?" He asked it cruelly, and knew he did, but he couldn't help it. There was cruelty in this house and he had it in his veins now.

Then he saw her face get smaller and her eyes grow lost and like a child's who has been struck. "Yes," she said at last. "I'm quite ready for another."

XIV

MR. ELY woke. He was completely sane, quiet and still and sane. He felt strangely weak and had no desire to rise. Somewhere there was movement in the house. He heard the sound of dishes. Aggie Emerson sat by the window knitting. She wasn't looking at him. She has a very beautiful mouth, Aggie. Tender and humorous, he thought.

"How's Aunt Posy's leg?" he asked suddenly. That seemed to be the point where he could catch onto existence again.

Aggie thrust the knitting from her to the floor, came over quickly and stood by the bed. "In a cast," she said. "She had so many neighbors there, we were superfluous." She reached to the table, picked up the thermometer, unscrewed the cap on its case.

"Never mind," he said. "I haven't any temperature. Have I had one?"

"Yes," Aggie said. "You really do look much better."

"I'm fine," he said. "Just fine." He saw that he had bright blue pajamas, turned up at the cuff. "Where are my galloping horses?" he asked.

She grinned. "Liz thought you ought to have a change," she said.

"Liz? Do I know Liz?"

"She's a neighbor. A practical nurse. You've been a handful, Johnny. I couldn't seem to manage you alone."

"I'm sorry," he said.

"I should hope so! Hungry?"

"Yes, I think I am."

SHE went out and left him alone in the room. But he didn't think. He lay there, quiet, waited for her to come back. At last she came, with broth in a bowl on a tray. Barley broth. She set the tray down, propped pillows behind him. He felt a little dizzy at first, then the dizziness passed. He took all the broth. She sat and knitted and did not talk. She took the tray away, started to remove the extra pillows.

"No, I'll sit up awhile, Aggie, if you don't mind," he said. "I seem to have lost track of time. Is it Monday?"

"It's Thursday," Aggie said.

"Oh?" He smiled a little. "I wonder where I was from Monday to Thursday?"

Aggie laughed. "You certainly weren't here," she said.

"I'm terribly sorry, Aggie. To have been such a nuisance. Could I have a cigarette?"

She fished in the pocket of her slacks, pulled out a package and handed it to him with matches, brought an ash tray and put it on the bed at his hand.

"I don't suppose you should be smoking," she said.

"Probably not," he agreed, lighting the cigarette.

"I find it hard to talk to you in your right senses," Aggie said. "You were more amusing when you were off."

"Off? Yes, I've been off somewhere, Aggie, a long way off."

"To the mountains of the moon, I believe," Aggie said.

"Yes, that's where it was," he said seriously. "I remember now."

"Do you?"

"Yes, quite clearly. Aggie, would mind calling Cass and asking her to c up?"

Aggie looked at him soberly. "N wouldn't mind, Johnny. Though that's one thing that you've insisted on all wee that I shouldn't call Cass.

"I hadn't got back from the mount then. Call her now, will you, Aggie?"

HE heard her going down the stairs. W she came back she looked grave and a li troubled.

"Did you get her?" he asked.

"Yes."

"Is she coming?"

"I think so. I'm not sure, Johnny. was just starting somewhere on a trip."

"Oh. What did she say?"

"Just what you did—'Oh.' She—she did sound like Cass."

"She'll come," he said. He put his ci rette out, said, "I think I'll lie down agai

After a long time he said, "You and love each other a lot, don't you?"

She flushed. "Yes," she said. "Not t it's any of your business, Johnny."

"I read the play," he said.

"You told me."

"I did? I don't remember. It's rema ably good. But you know that."

"Oh, it is good, isn't it, Johnny? It's terribly good, it frightens me."

"It needn't. It's the legitimate produ of your love." He spoke quite gently a seriously.

She looked around from the window at hi and her eyes were a little surprised a moved. She looked away again and sa softly, "Yes. Yes, that's what it is, Johnny

He turned the covers back.

"What are you doin Johnny?"

"I was going to the batl room, if you don't mind.

She laughed and sai matter-of-factly, "War Liz to come and give yo a hand?"

"No, thanks. I'm fine, he said. But when he was in the bathroom he had to stand clinging to the washbowl few minutes. He felt extraordinarily weak i his knees. He looked in the glass and said "Good heavens!" When he got back into bed he said, "Is there a spare razor around?"

"Yes. But take it easy. You look all right Like Whistler. Was he the one with the silky little beard? Or am I thinking of somebody else?"

"I feel like Walt Whitman."

She laughed. "Well, you certainly can do a 'barbaric yawp,' Johnny! You'd be surprised at yourself when you're on the moon!"

"What time is it?"

"She can't possibly get here before the seven-twenty. Maybe not tonight at all, Johnny. It's five-thirty now."

"She'll get here," he said.

He slept a little while. He didn't seem to be thinking at all. It was as if he had done all his thinking and didn't need ever to do any again. As if all decisions were made, all complexities solved.

Liz Dietrich brought him supper. She was a big, buxom, hearty woman. "Well, young man, this is more like it," she said. "Guess we won't need six white horses after all."

"Oh, I never intended to die on your hands," Johnny said. "I just like to get a rest—with service -once in a while. What time is it?"

"Near half past six. Now eat that all up. There's nothing there'll hurt you!"

He ate his supper. Then he asked again for the razor. He shaved slowly and carefully. Then it was quarter after seven.

Aggie said, "Johnny, you mustn't be so sure she'll come."

"Why not? She will."

"She didn't have much time to catch this train—and she didn't seem sure about coming at all."

"She'll come," he repeated, as if he were unalterably sure of that one thing.

Then he lay there, not talking at all, just waiting. He even dozed a little. When he woke, she stood there in her mink coat by the bed.

"Hello, Cass," he said.

"Hello, Johnny," she answered.

Then for a moment, for longer than that, it seemed, they had nothing more to say to each other. She didn't touch him. He didn't touch her.

"I got your letter," she said then.

"What letter?"

"The letter you wrote me."

"Oh. I think I began one. I didn't get it finished."

"Aggie gave it to me."

Still she didn't touch him, just stood there beside the bed, looking down at him. Suddenly he smiled at her.

"You look so beautiful, darling. So very beautiful," he said. "I wish you had on your plaid suit—though it doesn't matter, you're still beautiful."

"It doesn't matter?" she said in an odd voice.

"No. I had a lot to say to you. I can't seem to think what it is."

"You can say it tomorrow."

"I talked it all over with the unicorn. I do remember that. I was going to tell you all he said to me. . . . There he is over there, darling. See him? Very calm he looks, doesn't he? He talks only after the lights are out."

She looked up at the tapestry, looked at it a long time, then she looked back at him and over her face went a little light, the light that used to be there when she and Steppie played the game of Snorecombe.

"He looks very intelligent," she said.

"Oh, he is! A pagan, but he quotes from the Bible a lot. 'Perfect love casteth out fear. . . . Be not afraid.' Something about branches being cut off—roots will sprout again. . . . You'd like Leo; he has an Oxford accent."

She gave a small chuckle of a laugh.

"Bertha still at the house?"

The laughter died. "Yes."

"I knew you'd come, I knew she wouldn't stop you. I suppose she tried, poor thing."

Her eyes widened, then seemed to grow very still. "Yes, she tried."

"I knew you'd come. You'd never quit one of your lives before it was done."

"I was just going away," she said stiffly.

"But you didn't."

"No. Aggie said you needed me."

"See? That's all there is to it. I needed you—you came. I never was afraid you wouldn't come. Be not afraid—that's all there is to it. That's all—that's all I had to tell you."

It seemed there was more, but he couldn't find the more. That was truly all. No fear that anything could come between them, no fear that Bertha or anyone could tarnish the bright love that was theirs, no fear that their hunger would not be fed, no fear that her love was not greater than her pity, no fear that he would not be tall and comely in her eyes forever and ever, no fear that he would ever love his hunger beyond his love again.

Then she put out her hand and rested it against his face, in the old way, in exactly the old way, but as if she were trying out a new love, a wonderful new love, so tenderly, so softly. And he drew her down and his face rested against the soft brown fur of her coat. And they didn't talk. He just rested there with her arms about him and felt still and light and happy.

Then from far off there came a sound, light yet clear, the laughter of the unicorn. Was he walking down a garden path with a lady all in blue coming toward him among the roses? Or was he on a snowy mountaintop looking arrogantly out over the world of men? Or was he high in the mountains of the moon?

"Did you hear that?" Mr. Ely asked. "That was the unicorn laughing."

Her cheek pressed down against his hair. "I heard him," she said. THE END t parts. In Holland, dock workers rdam were the first to come out in fight in defense of the Jews.

ory of that fight is a dramatic one. ened in February, 1941. Detach- f the Gestapo had come to the ghetto to arrest and deport Jews. y fighting kept up in the ghetto for eks, during which the Germans did eed in deporting a single Jew.
ebruary 22 a strong military force o aid the Gestapo, and 1100 young re arrested and held for deportation id. Three days later the workers of lam declared a general strike. All t and communication were sus- factories, shops and offices were nd workers paraded the streets with aring the inscription, "Release our Comrades." By midday a German force, equipped with machine guns illery, appeared in the streets and, warning, opened fire on the demon- s. When the carnage was over, 3500 men and women had given their lives of all defenses of the Jews against Nazi extermination took place. Hungary was an Axis partner, and an important one. The Hungarians are, as a rule, ardent nationalists, and they had a long tradition of a mild type of anti-Semitism. Yet this people put up one of the most spectacular fights for the Jews.

THE struggle reached its climax during the months of May to August. The Red Army was smashing across the plains of Rumania and Hungary to occupy Budapest, and the Nazis were putting up their fiercest resistance. While battles were being fought, the Nazis and Hungarian Fascists, known as "the Arrow Cross," were doing everything possible to kill off and deport as many Jews as possible before the Russians arrived. Budapest had a Jewish population of over 300,000, largest in Europe at that time.

In June, when the crisis was at its height, the Swedish government sent Rauel Wallenberg as a special diplomatic representative to Budapest. There he was able to give protection to 20,000 Jews, according to the official report of the American War Refugee Board. Mr. Wallenberg accomplished this chiefly by issuing thousands of Swedish passports, similar to the "protective passports" of the Vatican, to Hungarian Jews. The Nazis did not dare to arrest "Swedish Jews," armed with such passports, although they were aware of the spuriousness of the documents.

In addition, Mr. Wallenberg bought houses and other buildings which he converted into Swedish "consulates," filling them with Jews and thus giving them the extraterritorial rights of citizens of a neutral country. Alone, armed with a revolver, this brave man fought off a mob of Hungarian Fascists, attempting to attack the Jews in one of his "consulate" buildings.

Thus a vast accumulation of facts disproves the theory that the bulk of Christian Europe has succumbed to Hitler's anti-Semitism and has taken over his theories about and feeling toward the Jews. The facts show that Christian Europe did not entirely forsake the Jews. Individually and collectively, Christian people fought Nazi anti-Semitism with the same zeal and devotion as they fought the political tyranny of Nazism. The greatest mass murder of all times did not go unchallenged by the forces of decency and humanitarianism in the Christian world.

It is unfortunately true that these forces could not avert the larger Jewish tragedy in the death camps of Maidanek and Treblinka and the merciless extermination of more than five million people. Yet the Christian fight against this extermination cannot be described as a failure. Its mere existence was of incalculable moral value, irrespective of the results it accomplished. If this effort of an enslaved Europe in behalf of the weakest of its members was a failure, it was one of those glorious failures which have kept up the ascent of humanity from barbarism to civilization and have given whatever meaning there is to human life. It was a great manifestation of spiritual strength and faith which will affect humanity—Jews and non-Jews alike—for generations to come. THE END

United Jewish Appeal

WRAPPED in newspapers for lack of so much as a shirt or blanket, Jewish babies born in Displaced Persons' Camps in Europe first open their eyes to a world of starvation and barbed wire. Their families have less food for an entire day than an American family eats in a single meal. Brothers and sisters, twelve years old, wasted by malnutrition, look like children of six. Where can these youngsters look for aid except across the Atlantic? The United Jewish Appeal, one of the largest humanitarian efforts ever undertaken by a voluntary relief organization, is seeking $170,000,000 to provide them with relief and rehabilitation. Funds will go for urgently needed food, clothing and medical care in DP camps; for upbuilding and refugee settlement in Palestine; and for refugee placement in the United States. Contributions to the United Jewish Appeal should be sent to 342 Madison Avenue, New York 17, New York.

NOTHER event, similar, but on a larger le, occurred in Bulgaria in the summer of 43. Although the Bulgarian government s at that time part of the Axis, the people d never been anti-Semitic. When in 1943 government, under pressure of the Nazis, empted to deport the entire Jewish popation of Sofia—30,000 people—a street monstration broke out. HOW TO SEE A NATIONAL PARK

Planning a vacation in the parks system—this article is confined to the Rocky Mountain belt from Canada to the hot bright sands of New Mexico and Utah—you can let five major rules help you. You'll be a better traveler, and a happier one, if you go prepared, knowing what the system includes, what you can get from the trip, how much of a workout it will be for your pocketbook, what to bring and how to behave.

Since the Declaration of Independence, the National Park idea is grass-roots American. Yellowstone was created in 1872 after explorers, who had a legal and moral right to the land, forfeited that right so that all citizens—and not just a few—could enjoy and be inspired by its spectacular setting. Congress passed an act, defining the area, and the first National Park was established as part of our public heritage. Now there are 26 others.

Today the parks hold for you a promise of release from the tensions of modern living. They do not stress the latest in man-made diversion (tile-lined swimming pools, service pavilions, movies around the corner) but rather its antidote, untouched nature, the one hope that you may gain from it sanity and knowledge. As Thoreau said, "We can never have enough of nature. We must be refreshed by the sight of vast and titanic features—the wilderness with its living and decaying trees. We need to witness our own limits transgressed and some life of pasturing freely where we never wander." In national parks all birds and animals have sanctuary; learn to watch for them, for they will give you pleasure. The geologist finds records of the earth's past lying open for his understanding and the archaeologist can rebuild a bygone culture. Amid plants and trees, nourished by the land's green thumb, the botanist also has his day. Experts may call these features by their multisyllabled scientific names; but all that anyone needs to know is that their beauty is there to be seen.

How much you will spend in sampling the parks is something your pocketbook will have to answer. The National Park Service says that for $80 to $100 a family of four can have a two-week outing, occupying a housekeeping cabin, providing their own bedding and cooking utensils and preparing their own meals. One short cut to a low-budget vacation is living in a tent, for all the parks have free camping grounds. There are improved ones with fireplaces, tables, toilet and shower facilities, laundry tubs—and in some cases even free chopped wood. To insure maximum use by the greatest number of visitors, in most parks, rules limit camping to 30 days.

Time was when "tenting tonight" was the park visitor's theme song, but today's tourist is swinging more and more to cabins, lodges and hotels. In all of them prices will depend on the degree of roughing it that's in your vacation prospectus. In most parks, $1.50 (less in some places) a night per person will pay for a partially furnished tourist cabin, with the option of bringing or renting your kitchen equipment and linen. You'll have to use a communal shower, but your housekeeping facilities will include a kerosene or wood stove. One incentive to this version of the outdoor life is the 10 per cent discount (more in some cases) that you'll generally get after the first week. Or you can stay in cabins clustered around lodges, for $2 to $7 a night per person. For the de luxe traveler, there are rooms in the hotels and inns at from $7 a day up, meals included. You can generally get accommodations on either American or European plan. Most of the parks have bargain-priced cafeterias where you can eat a day's meals for $2, even a little less perhaps. But remember that these, as other park facilities, are open only in specified seasons. For full information on this, write the superintendents of the parks you intend to visit. They'll give you complete data on what's open when, and exactly how much it'll cost.

Your bread-and-butter budget is, of course, fundamental—but equally important are the pennies for playtime. Fortunately, your recreation bills get a break, because the park service provides one of the country's best free entertainment schedules. And the star performers are the West's fabled rangers, who've charmed thousands of tourists with their Paul Bunyan imaginations and their sympathy for the woes of the tenderfoot.

In every national park you'll find the rangers doubling in brass. By day they're free guides for hikers and horseback riders, using the backdrop of nature as the text for their informal lectures. By night they show movies in the park museums (where the neophyte can find out who's who and what's what in the region's history) as well as loosen up the tourists' tonsils when customers of the campfire gather for an evening to sing the old, sweet songs. They're masters of the steak fry—and minions to the small fry. Sometimes a ranger's wife has even turned baby sitter to free parents for her husband's special tours.

The dollar-and-cents department of your recreation is up to your own common sense. Prices will vary from park to park, but in general you can rent a horse for $5 a day, or less, take an overnight pack trip (with chow) for about $15, or join a three-day bus tour (all-expense) for approximately $45. Fishermen, who must get state licenses in every park except Glacier and Yellowstone, can rent an all-day boat for a $2 bill. And it's wise to save a bit for the purse-tempting souvenirs you'll see on display everywhere. In the Southwest, the Navaho Indians' pottery, baskets, blankets and silver are almost a must; while in the Rockies country, the men of the family will be lured by cowboy shirts and hats and leather boots, belts and fringed gloves.

FIRST WOMAN OVER NIAGARA

Going over Niagara Falls in a barrel was purely a masculine idea of daring, until Anna Edson Taylor tried it on October 24, 1901. Lashed tightly inside a 3x6-foot oaken cask, she was launched from the Canadian side of the falls and plunged unhurt over the 160-foot drop. Not only the first woman to ride the falls, she was the first person to live to tell about it. And she didn't get her iron nerve from being a professional daredevil. She was a schoolteacher.

Souvenirs are what you take back home with you, but don't neglect what you ought to bring. And particularly what brings you—your car: 98 per cent of the 9,800,000 visitors to the parks and monuments last year came by automobile, which makes information as to care of same a probable essential in your trip preparation. There's no special driving code for the parks—the rules of safe driving are universal. However, if you're planning to be in the high altitudes for longer than two weeks, it's wise to get your spark advanced a few notches to give your car more pep and better gasoline economy. The great distance between service stations in Western driving makes it advisable to travel on the top half of your gasoline tank; and every time you stop for gas, have your tires checked. Contrary to what many think, there's no magic formula for your tires except to keep their pressure within the manufacturer's specifications. Driving in either high altitudes or high temperatures increases the pressure slightly, but not enough to really matter. A wary eye for slow leaks is a bright idea, especially in the Southwest, where intense heat tends to melt soft tires; a spare (or two) is always good insurance, just as a tow rope is.

When rangers are asked why a tow rope, they tell the story of the motorist who didn't have one when he broke down on a desolate road. The next car showed up a day later—and it didn't have one either. And so this forgetful driver had to wait another day before a chain-equipped rescue truck arrived. Realizing the possibility of breakdowns, the rangers advise the practical motorist to carry a junior-size kitchen—in a slide-fastened bag. It's equipped with a miniature stove (either canned heat or heat tablets), a small covered saucepan, paper cups, knives and forks, and salt. You'll always be able to dish up a meal if you have dry packaged soup, cheese and crackers, canned beans and possibly fruit such as oranges or bananas. The picnic-inclined can stock up at breakfast-time with sandwiches—to be eaten under a shady tree at lunch. In the Southwest it's always wise to take water in canvas bags—canvas, because evaporation keeps the water fairly cool.

ALL the parks have improved automobile roads, but it's foot power that'll take you to the best of the scenery. And while you don't want to load your car with too much equipment (the park stores will sell or rent much of what you'll need), you may want to add a pup tent and sleeping bags to your supply; a hatchet's a handy item, too, as is a shovel in case you're called upon to fight a forest fire (park visitors are expected to help, when able). Sunglasses rate first place on a desert explorer's list, while sturdy low-heeled shoes are a hiker's necessity everywhere.

You can do the national parks on a one-suitcase wardrobe. See that it's ready for the mountain country by including a pair of frontier pants (corduroy or whipcord) and some hardy flannel shirts. In the Southland, seersucker dresses or light denim coveralls spell style for the knowledged traveler. But wherever you are, a sweater or light jacket is useful—with a warm coat imperative for night and early morning. And a party's no emergency anywhere if a print dress or becoming shantung is along to make you the life of it.

But the best-equipped tourist of all is the one who knows what manners to take to a park. You'll pass muster if you:

1. Don't try to do more than you should if you're seeing the parks on foot. Hikers' limits vary from two to twenty miles a day—but the man who goes farther than he can come back is a problem to park authorities. If, by chance, you should become lost or exhausted, don't panic. Use the ground as your bed for a night; it'll be perfectly safe.
2. Check in with the rangers before you s your mountain climbing—and also when return.
3. Get a written permit to build fires a from camping areas. And before you th away a match, break it—if it's still lit, can't.
4. Don't feed any of the animals—unless want to pay the fine that's waiting for
5. Don't pick the wild flowers.
6. Don't let your cats and dogs run loos
7. Let nature alone—and don't turn in Western-style billboard artist and do a b rock-writing.

EMERGENCIES

Americans, and each one of us is involved. Nor, in a democracy, is any citizen absolved from this duty. By word of mouth, by every means of communication, by the vote, every one of us must make his opinions known, for most of us want only peace, and common sense, and some degree of decency. Furthermore, we can begin tomorrow, and in the exact spot where we find ourselves: in a railway car, talking to a friend, wherever we may be.

Good citizenship and wise government, like charity, begin at home. Out of our mouths come tolerance and hope, or poison. Each of us lives in some locality, large or small. There are newspapers, there are committees, there are local politicians, there are scores of mediums through which we can express our opinions and desires. Our governments, local, state and national, will do what we want if they know clearly what it is. This is not surface thinking; it is the essence of democracy.

But first we must think, and then we must act, and not the other way about; for it is important to remember what Goethe said: "To act is easy; to think is hard." And yet every one of us thinks hard enough if a pistol is pointed at his head.

Today there are plenty of pistols pointed at our heads. This is indeed an emergency. But if emergencies are human emergencies, they are reducible to human terms that all can understand. Even the question of atomic fission can be settled in the same way that quarrels between neighbors can be settled. There is nothing human that cannot be settled in that fashion. THE END excess tic and prolonged sun tanning may give you a sunstroke or skin cancers!

FUN IN THE SUN

Lovely legs request a little attention before they go on public display. There are several cream or liquid defuzzing devices which you might use. One that will last long past your holidays is a wax depilatory. If you apply it yourself, be sure to test it on a small skin area first (on the back of your hand or around your ankles) to make sure it's heated to the right temperature. Then follow directions on the package. Carefully done, defuzzing by this method should last from six to eight weeks. Your feet, too, now on view, should look their best. Trim toenails (cut straight across, not curves), cuticle pushed back and a pretty bright polish to match your fingernail polish will do the trick.

Clear reds are acknowledged tanned-skin flatterers. But the summer fashion trend in cosmetics is pink-toned—so experiment with pink polishes and lipsticks and see what they do for you!

In choosing your bathing suit, remember to select one that favors your figure as well as your eye! Slim midriffs take to brief two-piece designs. Only superslim hips can get away with skirtless suits. One-piece suits, unadorned, afford the longest, slimmest lines. If you have your eye on something that calls for a flat midriff, here is an exercise that will help you:

In a sitting position, place your hands behind your ears, elbows bent, using a firm pressure. Keeping this position, bend one elbow down to knees; to floor at sides; as far around to the back as possible.

Here's another: Lie down flat with arms reaching to ceiling. Now try raising yourself to a sitting position, without arching your spine. If you feel the contraction, the exercise is doing your midriff good.

If your bathing suit shows off an upper-arm bulge, here's an effective remedy: Standing, put your arms out to your sides in a stiff, tense, long stretch. Now, with elbows and fists stiff, rotate your arms in tiny circles.

HERE is a royal-looking salad... for royal eating! Carnation Milk, heat-rehned and homogenized to super-creamy smoothness, imparts a velvet blend of cool and luscious perfection. The Carnation Mayonnaise is wonderful, too!

CARNATION ROYAL SALAD

1 tablespoon gelatin
¼ cup lemon juice
½ cup boiling water
½ cup sugar
¼ teaspoon salt
½ cup Carnation Milk, undiluted, chilled to ice-crystal stage for whipping
½ cup Carnation Mayonnaise
2 cups fruits for salad, drained

Soften gelatin in lemon juice, add boiling water, let stand till dissolved. Add sugar and salt. Whip Carnation Milk stiff. Fold in Carnation Mayonnaise (see below), gelatin mixture, and fruit. Pour into mold and chill. Unmold; serve on endive; top with Carnation Mayonnaise. Garnish with strawberry. Serves 6 to 8.

CARNATION EGGLESS MAYONNAISE

2 teaspoons sugar
1 teaspoon paprika
½ teaspoon salt
⅛ teaspoon white pepper
½ teaspoon dry mustard
½ cup Carnation Milk, undiluted
2½ tablespoons vinegar or lemon juice
1¼ to 1½ cups salad oil

Mix dry ingredients with Carnation Milk; beat in vinegar or lemon juice; add oil gradually, beating thoroughly. Makes 1 pint.

WRITE for the free 32 page "Velvet Blend Book" of milk-rich recipes, to Carnation Company, Dept. L 6, Milwaukee 2, Wis.

Straw hats help ward off "straw hair." Large, colorful hats worn on and off through the day will allow you to tan and protect your hair too. Silk or rayon bandannas are more protective than cotton ones. If you've had a good permanent a week or ten days before your vacation, your hair will stand frequent summer shampoos which are necessary to counteract the salt-watered look. There are some sun-tan oils which work overtime as hair softeners. Massage one into the lower half of your hair an hour before you shampoo.

If you don't wear a bathing cap, try working out a waterproof hair-do. One that won't fall to pieces at the sight of an ocean wave. Braids in various forms, or close-to-the-head coiffures, can be prettily done. There are also decorative rubber hair ornaments in flower shapes and summery colors that will stay put even after a high dive. A brush is a must in your beach bag to keep you from looking like sandy-locks. Brushing your hair in the sun encourages a natural golden glint in even the plainest-colored manes.

Summer evenings for the smoothly tanned girl require minimum make-up. But you might tone down that first-day reddish glow with a luminous, creamy base. Worn without powder, it gives you a fresh, young complexion. A light eye shadow produces a wide-eyed look in a tanned face. A tiny, summer-scented sachet hidden in the ruffles of an off-the-shoulder dress is a final fragrant thought.

FUN IN TOWN

disks, saturated with antiperspirant, which come in travel-worthy containers and are good for emergency moments.

Midday make-up can be rejuvenated by patting lightly over the surface of your face with a cotton pad dampened with a summer-cool skin freshener. It will remove traces of oiliness and city grime and make your face ready for a new powdering.

Dark, dark powders which try to imitate a tan often fail at the job! There are liquid skin tints for the face as well as the arms and legs (all in one bottle!) which, if applied lightly and carefully, can pose as a tan.

We know a city beauty who makes oatmeal bags and uses them as washcloths, when her skin is feeling especially dry. One spoon of uncooked oatmeal in a small cheesecloth square, dipped in warm water and applied to your face for several minutes, is her skin-softener idea.

One fresh flower pinned appealingly to your dress will outcharm the most imposing-looking artificial ones. Selected from a corner flower cart, it will set you back just a few cents.

Bright spots of rouge on your cheeks are never right. Summer skins use a minimum, if any, rouge—and then it is as unobtrusive as a pale, pink rose.

Were all the debates, the negotiations, the hard decisions of policy, not what they seemed at the time but in fact only a kind of commotion by which the result, as we see it now, came inevitably to pass? Was it, for example, written in the book of fate, which nothing could have changed, that the First World War should be followed by the rise of Hitler, that the rise of Hitler should be followed by the Second World War; that in the Second World War Russia and America should be neutral until the European continent was overrun by the Germans and only Britain continued to fight, that Germany should in the end be defeated by the two powers which, when the war started, were neither of them able or willing to fight?

Before we venture to prophesy about the chances of a Third World War, it is necessary to come clean and clear in our own minds as to whether the Second World War (or, in fact, any world war) must be regarded as predestined and inevitable. I do not believe that the Second World War was inevitable. I believe the Second World War need not have happened, and therefore I believe that a Third World War need not, and may not, happen. I do not believe in historical determinism, whether it comes from communists, from ex-communists, or from pedants, doctrinaires, ideologists, crusaders, fanatics, hysterics, from those who have read Marx, Lenin and Spengler, or have misread Toynbee.

I maintain that the Second World War was not inevitable, that it could have been prevented, and that it need not have taken the course it did. Consider only our own part in it. Was it inevitable that we remained disarmed after Japan seized Manchuria and Hitler came into power in Germany? Was it inevitable that from 1931 to 1939 we should remain unarmed, neutral and isolationist? Was it inevitable that we did nothing while almost the whole European continent was conquered by the Germans, and all the ports of China by the Japanese? Was it predestined

Here's a Tuna dish that husbands go for in a BIG way

He-man TUNA CUTLETS

1 7-oz. can tuna
2 tbsp. fat
4 tbsp. flour
½ cup milk
2 tbsp. chopped parsley or green pepper
1 tbsp. lemon juice
1 slightly beaten egg
1 tsp. salt
¼ tsp. white pepper
1½ cups soft white bread crumbs
1 slightly beaten egg
Cracker crumbs
Fat for frying

Separate tuna into flakes. Melt fat in saucepan. Add flour and blend. Add milk and cook until very thick, stirring constantly. Remove from heat. Add tuna and remaining ingredients. Mix well. Form mixture into cutlets. Refrigerate about 2 hours. Dip cutlets into egg and then cracker crumbs. Fry in hot fat until golden brown. Garnish with tiny tomatoes or tomato slices and lemon wedges. Serve with your favorite fish sauce, if desired. Serves 5.

It's a real he-man dish . . . a hearty meal for lusty appetites. Crisp and crunch-y on the outside . . . delicious all the way through. But, be sure you use these famous quality brands of tuna. Only the tender light meat is packed; your assurance that every tuna dish will be a culinary triumph! Like all foods, this tuna costs more today. But, not expensive . . . it's magical the way you can make a BIG dish out of a small can of these quality brands!

that when we were struck at Pearl Harbor in December, 1941, we should not be ready to fight back seriously until the end of 1943? If we were able to destroy the Japanese Empire in 1945, was it determined in advance that we could not have been powerful enough to check the Japanese Empire some years earlier?

Is there any doubt that history could have been different if we had done sooner what we did later? Nobody, it has been said, not even God, can change the past. But in the present men still have some say about the future, as they are wise or foolish, brave or timid, magnanimous or petty, believing or unbelieving. If that is not so, then democracy is a deception and the whole moral and religious conception of freedom, duty and righteousness a fraud. If there were choices in the past, then there are choices in the future. Another war, though it is possible, is not inevitable. A peace, though it is not certain, is possible.

Between a possible war and a possible peace, what, then, are the probabilities? The best way to go about answering this question is to imagine how Russia and America would go about fighting a world war. The more that question is studied by the professional strategists of the Kremlin and of the Pentagon, the more surely, I contend, they will come to see that while two nations can fight, two nations cannot fight a world war. The reason is that there will be too many neutrals.

There is no way in which the great masses of mankind can be aligned into two opposing coalitions, the one under Russian leadership and the other under American. It requires strong governments to mobilize nations for war. The people have to be conscripted, regimented and commanded in order to fight a war. Now, as we have already seen, the greater part of the world, as a result of the two wars, is no longer firmly and strongly governed. The disorganization of the European continent and of most of Asia, the destruction of the old states and the liquidation of old empires makes it difficult to organize peace. It also makes it difficult to organize a world war. It makes it difficult to organize anything.

Don't you a little bit wish you lived in a little house—and it was all sweet and tiny, and didn't take any thought or waste any time, and were rather poor—only with pocket money for books and toys—and no visitors—all friends living in the same street, and the street long and narrow and ending in the city wall, and the wall opening with a gate on to cornfields in the south, and the wild wood on the north—and no roadways anywhere—all friends and all one's world tied up in the little city—and no news to come—only rumors and gossips at the city gates, telling things a month old, and all wrong? —EDWARD BURNE-JONES.

I do not say that Russia or America cou not declare war, that the Red infantry cou not begin to march, our bombers begin bomb. But I do say that this could not b come an organized conflict between Co munist nations and anti-Communist nati the reason being that only organized natio can fight wars.

There are few, if any, nations whi could be organized by either Russia America to fight this war. Between Russ and America there would be not th respective allies but an immense region co taining many hundreds of millions of peop engaged not in international war, but in a va anarchy of many civil wars. Such a strugg could not be direct and controlled from t Kremlin and the Pent gon. It could not f ended by a military d cision. Even to su render, there must be government capable surrendering, and wh could surrender whom in a gener condition of anarch Organized society already so badly di organized—would, as the Dark Ages, dissol among the guerril bands, and blood feud and uprisings, the wa lords, local potentate the usurpers and pr tenders.

So, though I do not predict that a Russia American war cannot happen, I do predic that it would end not in the victory of eithe but in anarchy so general that it would b well-nigh universal. I am not, therefor opposed to discussing a Russian-America war.

The more we talk about this war, an where it would be fought, and with wha weapons, and by whom, and for wha strategic objectives, the more we shall arouse provoke, incite the peoples of Europe t bestir themselves, and to unite, and to si down hard upon the ideologists and th fanatics among them, and to rise up again a principals and powers in an internationa community. If they cannot think of an better reason for ending the ancient division of Europe, then perhaps they will be move by the terror and horror of becoming th battlefield of the two non-European powers.

So I am in favor of discussing this Third World War continually and exhaustively. For the more it is talked about, the more surely shall we talk ourselves and the Russians out of it.

SELF-CONFIDENCE

feel terribly awkward and puny. The memory of childhood's disappointments and resentments fades away, but for many there remains the undertone of that contrast of the child's weakness pitted against adult strength. Reverberating down the years come the echoes of infantile experience: "You cannot achieve. You are not strong. You are little, insignificant, powerless." And for many men and women the whole rest of life is the vain attempt to compensate for these insecurities of their early years. They have not accepted the fact that life has objectively changed and that from a realistic standpoint they are no longer justified in their feelings of inadequacy.

I made this point not long ago to an outstanding professional man whose life was being undermined by a corroding sense of inferiority. "You know," I said to him, "the amazing paradox is that no one sees you in quite such a melancholy light as you see yourself. In actuality you are quite successful. You have done well in fashioning a tolerable human existence out of the raw materials at your disposal. You have a home, work, a good reputation. There are those who both love and honor you for what you really are. The trouble is that you foolishly imagine other people to be clairvoyant and to see in you the inferior little boy that you once were. You have lived so long obsessed with your childhood self that you have failed to notice how really competent in the world of men your grown self has become. If all people like you who felt themselves failures really were failures, then the work of the world would never get done. Take off your dark-colored glasses and see yourself as you really are: a peer in the adult world with strength quite adequate to meet the problems of that world; a person far abler and more creative than you have ever given yourself credit for being."

Sometimes our lack of self-confidence springs from our overestimation of the capabilities and virtues of others. Only the other day there came to my attention a pathetic case of a young girl, suffering from deep inferiority feelings, who attributed all manner of perfection to her older sister. There was, in her judgment, literally no talent or virtue that the older sister did not possess. This young woman's soul was a sieve through which poured all the ripe grain of affection for others, with not a kernel remaining to nourish herself.

What could be done to give her self-confidence? First and foremost, she had to be helped to a new perspective on her own very generous gifts of personality and character. These, it is true, had been overshadowed by the more brilliant accomplishments of the older sister. But I succeeded in showing this girl that she had fundamentally misread the Book of Life. Her reading difficulty was this: she had seen in capital letters many things in her sister's life that just were not there; and, secondly, she had relegated to small type—footnotes, as it were—her own qualities. Equipped with the lens of new self-confidence, she was better able to interpret both the similarities and the differences between her sister and herself.

It is a truism that there are facets of failure in every person's make-up. But there are also elements of success. No one of us escapes limitations. We all are sometimes angry, petty, lazy—but also we are kindly, generous, creative. Some people are gifted with their hands; some in the realm of art or music; some in the realm of abstract ideas. Almost no one is gifted in all three. We are all limited, and we must accept ourselves with our limitations, recognizing that we can do what others cannot do, that we can contribute where others cannot.

In this connection the idea of growth is of prime importance. Growth, not perfection, is the test of our maturity—the touchstone of our success as an adult man or woman.

Though I appear a sort of wanderer, the married state has not a sincerer friend than I am. It is the harbor of human life, and is, with respect to the things of this world, what the next world is to this. It is home: and that one word conveys more than any other word can express. —THOMAS PAINE.

Genius is rare; mediocrity is a portion of almost all of us. But in some way peculiar to ourselves, each of us can contribute from the storehouse of our increasing skills and maturing love to the enrichment of life.

This conception of growth is particularly important for parents, for it is in the circle of the home that self-confidence is either bred or destroyed in children. Much human misery and self-destruction (in the form of alcoholism, promiscuity, despair) stems from the fact that parents often give their children only counterfeit love. Why? Possibly because when they were children they, too, received such counterfeit coins from their fathers and mothers. In many families this vicious circle is carried on from generation to generation, so that children who were deprived of security and affection become parents who unconsciously revenge their early frustrations upon their offspring. We have all seen mothers and fathers who have been stern, overdemanding, overpossessive, overindulgent—all masquerades of love rather than love itself. Many parents, without knowing it, make their children scapegoats for their own failures, or shadows of their own pitiful lack of self-confidence. It is of utmost importance, therefore, both for our own happiness and for the future well-being of our children, that we root out of our lives every tendency that springs from self-hate.

Karen Horney, the eminent psychoanalyst, insists that much human cruelty derives from our sense of insufficiency and a lack of belief-in-self—and states that we are often vicious to others because we wish to bring them down to our own level of futility and emptiness. Thus, when we gossip, bear false witness, tear to shreds the reputations of our neighbors, we are in truth revealing to the world our own tattered garments of self-deprecation and self-disdain. The truly confident, self-loving person never indulges in backbiting, character assassination and spiritual homicide. Having gained a sense of self-toleration about himself and his own

Ultimately the genuine and wise self-love that breeds self-confidence is the ability to look at oneself with a kind of detachment and a friendly interest in one's potentialities and limitations. A person knows how to love himself properly when he recognizes that he is a frail and fallible mortal whose life goal should be growth, not perfection. He has attained true self-regard when he has achieved the mellow maturity that is tolerant of the many moods good, bad and indifferent—that chase across the firmament of one's soul like shifting clouds on a summer day; when, in the reassuring knowledge that we are all of us peculiar in one degree or another, he has become wise enough to be forgiving, not only of the foibles of others, but of the occasional eccentricities and peculiarities of himself.

A man or a woman has learned at last how to love himself or herself properly when he lives by the golden mean between extremes; when he has attained a kind of equilibrium, with room in his life for work and play and laughter and friendship; and when, like a philosopher, he anticipates both the peaks and the valleys, the summits of achievement and the lowlands of failure and depression. And when, having anticipated them, he accepts them, as part of the price of human growth and fulfillment. THE END

SCHOOLTEACHER AND MOTHER ANALYZES "THE HELLER"

Woburn, Massachusetts

Dear Bruce and Beatrice Gould: The Heller, a perfect illustration of what ails modern youth, was printed to help parents understand and solve the delinquency problem. Unfortunately, many parents read these stories and shrug them off with, "Thank goodness our kids aren't like that!" They have no idea how to solve youth problems, and while many illustrations of present conditions are furnished them, few articles deal with actual causes and remedies. Here is my analysis of Anne's "lacks," based on my observations as a teacher in public school, Sunday school and the N. Y. State Reformatory, and as a mother.

Anne is typical only of one social stratum, a semislummish environment. Her life was full of spiritual lack. Her mother, not sufficiently companionable, failed to gain her confidence, and instead of counseling and guiding Anne from early childhood, scolded her. Anne lacked a suitable social life. Modest parties and teas at home where her parents could meet her friends would have meant more self-respect and social graces. Sunday mornings her family should have attended church together; and Anne should have co-operated during the week in promoting church youth activities to develop her spiritual obligation. Her teacher and parents should have encouraged any personal talents she possessed, to provide wholesome hobbies.

Since our lives consist of habits we have formed, good or bad, all habit-forming training must begin in earliest youth, continuing steadily but tactfully through adolescence. Every action is preceded consciously or subconsciously by thought. Thus the habit of sifting the "wheat from the chaff" in our thinking must be acquired early. "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he" is a fundamental truism in child training.

The power of wholesome influence, good examples and worthy aims upon young, impressionable minds is incalculable. All this Anne lacked. Parents have a definite duty to their children, spiritually and mentally, that they tend to minimize. Youth, to combat evil temptations, must be equipped with adequate ammunition - a helpful philosophy of life.

There was an unwholesome undertone of immoral thinking in Anne's school environment. Her companions were "off the same piece." Youth follows the mob instinct, and a new bad apple contaminate the whole barrel. Had Anne's parents removed her to a better environment or gained the co-operation of other parents in organizing suitable youth activities to utilize their abundant energies, Anne and her comrades would have been busy with constructive interests and had no time for less wholesome thoughts. In pioneer days, the strenuous exigencies of life—hunting, farming, spinning, cooking—left no surplus of strength to be wasted upon devitalizing amusements. Today, an outlet must be found for this vast dynamic reserve of energy, else "the lid is bound to blow off" in undesirable activities. It is far less expensive to finance social youth clubs and classes than to maintain reformatories.

Anne is also an example of the complete lack of inhibitions and self-control prevalent today. For four thousand years civilization has built up a system of standards intended to raise us above animalism. Self-control is a vitally essential quality that grows stronger with use. Constructive self-expression is salutary, but can be carried to destructive extremes. Only worth-while ideas should be expressed in action - which reverts again to right thoughts preceding. Anne expressed what her life had provided her mind. Her inherent kindness, her desire for unselfish expression, was finally demonstrated in her devotion to Betsy. In club work Anne would have blossomed into a useful woman.

Anne was not a typical girl. She belonged to a segment of unfortunate children for whom society has done little, and does not represent the many children who have had adequate home and social opportunities.

Many young folks excuse their immoral acts on the grounds that they are establishing new customs. Old codes of ethics are outmoded, they tell us. Church and organized leadership should explain, and reaffirm widely, definite codes of conduct and religious ethics—and make real explanations and decisions to meet the questions and needs of modern youth.

Concerted action of churches, schools, and fraternal and social organizations can eliminate the sources of evil that menace our children.

The JOURNAL is to be congratulated upon the high standards it maintains in literature and advertising.

ASK the average adult why he doesn't swim and he'll undoubtedly answer something like this: "Why, I don't know. I like the water, but I've been afraid of it ever since I was a kid. Guess I've missed a lot of fun."

Down at St. Petersburg, Florida, they've solved the problem by teaching babes to swim before they develop fear of the water.

Results are little short of phenomenal. Tots of two, three, four, five and six put on a water carnival which, for sheer perfection of swimming and diving technique, would shame the average adult who fancies he can put on a creditable show in the water. Ordinarily any public program of teaching swimming is limited to children over nine or ten years of age. By this age, say swimming instructors at St. Petersburg, children have developed that fear of the water which takes all the joy out of swimming.

All to the good, too, from the standpoint of St. Petersburg parents, is the record of no swimming fatalities among children since the program started. Considering that the city is situated virtually on an island, with at least ten months of swimming weather every year, during which beaches are crowded every day, it is plain that teaching water-safety methods is of paramount importance to parents.

Two years ago the city recreation department, under direction of Pierce V. Gahan, feeling the need of a more generalized summer recreational (Continued on Page 196) program for city youngsters, instituted city-wide projects of supervised play.

Among the projects sponsored was a program of free swimming lessons at the municipal pool. No age limits were set. Parents came and brought their children, and younger ones entered the wading pool.

More than three hundred children under ten years of age learned to swim during the summer vacation period from June to September last year.

Tots of two to ten are started in the wading pool. They learn first to hold their faces under water without breathing. Soon they are floating, and when they have learned the rudiments of arm and leg motions they are graduated to the three-to-four-foot pool.

Here they perfect their swimming strokes, and learn all the tricks of water safety. Usually within a period of a few weeks they are competent to enter the deep pool, where they are taught diving and water carries.

Swimming instructors say the only requirements for teaching the babes are patience, a genuine liking for children, and an occasional candy bar as a reward for good performance. In view of national records which show that nearly three thousand children under fifteen are drowned each year, these swimming babes of St. Petersburg are good news for the entire nation.

Webster Improved Automatic Valve Company, of Atchison, Ohio, that she go to Philadelphia and open up the new sales office with Mr. Dipple. Her mother had died shortly before, and Susan was ready and anxious for a change.

She and her mother had lived with her brother George and his wife, and Susan had never been unaware of how her sister-in-law had felt about the two of them living with her, or of her patient endurance of two extra women in her house, "because it's your mother, darling." That attitude made a wonderful impression on George and was good for getting Grace anything she wanted, but Susan was determined that she was not going to be taken with patient endurance, nor was she going to be used as domestic blackmail over her brother. So a change was imminent, and when Webster Valve offered one that would put several hundred miles between her and Grace, Susan never hesitated in accepting, particularly when they whispered the magic words, "And we can get you an apartment."

Then there had been the fun and excitement of furnishing the apartment—not that there was much to furnish, for her entire apartment consisted of the long front parlor and the back parlor, made into a kitchen and bath—and exploring the city with its historic buildings, its theaters and department stores.

She had not been lonely at all until a week before, when there had been one of those deceptive springlike Saturdays that come in March and serve no useful purpose other than to make you open your coat and catch cold, or spend much more than you can afford for a spring hat, or feel wistful when you see nice young men meeting attractive young women for Saturday lunch. Susan on that Saturday had made the mistake of wandering through the department store which seemed to be the favorite rendezvous for these nice young men and attractive young women. They met either at the head or the feet of a very large bird in the center of the store, and Susan, watching them, had found herself wishing that there was someone to say, "Meet me at the Eagle." Susan even felt wistful over the matronly women and the men who, she knew, must rush each night for a suburban train, because there had been other meetings at the Eagle, when Tommy's tonsils or a coat for Nancy was not uppermost in their thoughts. She wished that day with all her heart that someone was waiting for her.

conversation was making less and

"Telephone company," said the voice. "What has the telephone company got to do with it? I want Randy McNeal."

Susan said "Oh," rather flatly. "I'm afraid you have the wrong number."

"It doesn't sound like the wrong number to me," said the voice, whereupon Susan hung up the phone.

She was instantly sorry. After all, it had been someone to talk to; but when the phone rang a second time and it was the same voice, she was annoyed.

"This is the wrong number," she said. "Will you please consult the directory. This"—she had to look at the telephone to find out her own number—"this is Belshaw [illegible]"

"And that," said the voice, "is Randy McNeal's number."

"And that," said Susan, "is not Randy McNeal's number. That is my number."

By noontime she was not so certain that Belshaw 2-5431 was her number, for she had had to stop the chores that are synonymous with Saturday morning and a working girl to explain (a) to Mr. Barraclone, the tailor, that she could not tell him when Mr. McNeal would want his new tweeds fitted: she didn't know any Mr. McNeal; (b) to the manager of the University Club that she did not know whether Mr. McNeal was coming to dinner on the twenty-eighth: she did not know Mr. McNeal; (c) to the professional at Hidden Hollow Golf Club that she could not tell him what to do with Mr. McNeal's irons: she did not know Mr. McNeal; (d) to several unidentified voices that she did not know whether Mr. McNeal would want to play handball on Monday, squash on Thursday and tennis on Saturday: she did not know Mr. McNeal.

They were all polite at first, then insistent, then incredulous, then argumentative.

Susan said wearily to the Hidden Hollow Golf Club, "You have the wrong number."

"Oh, no," said the professional. "That's Mr. McNeal's number. He's lived there for years, and he wrote me to telephone him about his clubs."

"Well," said Susan, "Annie doesn't live here any more," and, banging down the phone, went back to see Mrs. Bishop. "Who," she demanded, "is Randy McNeal who lived here?"

Mrs. Bishop shook her head. "There's never been anyone in the building by that name, and I've been here seven years." Mrs. Bishop put her finger to her cheek. "Now let me see. There was a Mr. Bircher, and a Miss Bell who had a brother. No. No Mr. McNeal."

"Well," Susan began her story, "I've just gotten my telephone and everyone is calling for Mr. McNeal."

"Oh, dear," said Mrs. Bishop, shaking her head. "That's bad. Now sometimes burglars telephone an apartment first to see who lives there and who's home. What now!"

What now, indeed? thought Susan, back in her own apartment; and after four more calls, all feminine, apparently purely social, since they accepted Susan's "Wrong number" docilely, and one who argued in a voice like melted butter, "Mr. Randy said I was to call today sure, nuff, and see if I was to start cleanin' next week," she grabbed her coat and left the apartment. Someone undoubtedly was playing a joke on someone, but the only one the joke seemed to be on was she—and who would play it?

She walked up the street aimlessly. She had nowhere to go, and if she could think of somewhere, there was no one with whom to go. She was conscious of the smartly dressed girls hurrying to Saturday luncheons and of her own shabby polo coat over her work dress, and when she saw a beauty parlor she was relieved. There was one place a woman could always spend a Saturday afternoon alone, and not be alone.

She walked in boldly and said, "I want everything."

She came home with a new page-boy hair-do, reshaped eyebrows, and a manicure that would be wrecked as soon as she sat down at the typewriter, but she had to admit that the beauty parlor had really done things for her. Looking in the mirror above the table in the living room, she thought, If only I had somewhere to go. And then the phone rang.

The flat feminine "Oh" in response to Susan's "Hello" sounded just the way Susan felt. But the girl on the other end of the line apparently gathered her reserves. "I," she rather gulped, "I would like to speak to Mr. McNeal."

"You have the wrong number," Susan said firmly. "This is Belshaw 2-5431, and there is no Randy McNeal here."

"Oh, isn't there?" said the girl. "Then how do you know his name is Randy?" And this time the caller beat Susan to the hang-up.

Susan shrugged her shoulders, and added to the mental picture she had of Mr. McNeal the fact that he also knew one disagreeable young lady. She threw herself face down on the day bed where she could reach out for the telephone when it rang, as she knew it would, and thought about Mr. McNeal; and then, because it was that hour between the daylight and the dusk, when the street lights had first begun to blossom and were casting a blue-white light over the city—a cold lonesome light, instead of the warm gold light they would show later—she thought about herself.

About Mr. McNeal, she thought, He must be young, for the man who seemed to know him so well and the girls who had called were obviously, from their voices, [illegible] He must be successful. The tailor who was one of the best in the city, she kne[w] someone had given his name to Mr. [illegible] and Mr. Dipple had said, "He's too [illegible] sive for me." Mr. McNeal had gone t[o] good college, for he belonged to the U[niver]sity Club, where a half dozen of the l[ead]colleges had headquarters. He must [illegible] letic, for he played golf and handball, [illegible] and tennis.

About herself she thought, What's g[oing to] become of me? I'm twenty-two, and th[e] men in my life have been Herby Whi[te] Freddy Masters. Herby White had es[corted] her to all school affairs when she was i[n] school, before his family had moved t[o] fornia. Herby's hair had always gro[wn] the style the Government had later [made] common, and he had had an Adam's [apple] Freddy Masters had been her beau [through] the Army had started to take 4F's. F[inally] had married an[other] lish girl.

Why did I [spend] money to go ha[ve my] hair done? [she] asked herself. I should forget a[ll] nonsense. I'll j[ust] here alone unt[il I'm] old and lined an[d] like Miss Par[ker] the second floo[r] no one will ever [look] or care.

Then the [phone] rang and a lau[ghing] masculine voice [said] "Look, is thi[s] wrong number?

Susan stiff[ened] and hastily col[lected] her dignity. I [knew] the voice from [the] first call of the [morn]ing. "I beg you a[par]don," she said.

The laughing [voice] went on, "You [know], the little wrong [num]ber who is raisin[g Cain] with Randy McL[ean's] life."

Susan said [icily] "Oh. It's you. [What] do you want?"

"Not that [way]," said the voice. "I [just] liked your mo[rning] voice much bett[er]. It had charm and a [ring]. I can unders[tand] Lida's being up[set]."

"And who," [asked] Susan, "is Lida[, and] who are you?"

"Lida," said the voice, "is the girl R[andy] is—or was—going to marry, and I'm [Lida] Armstrong. I was going to be the best m[an] the wedding before Tad Thomas told his [wife] a girl answered Randy's phone when he [called] about tennis. She and a few other fe[llows] verified it and told Lida about the g[irl in] Randy's apartment. And unless some [body] can explain your being there, there just [isn't] goin' ta be no weddin'."

Susan gasped. "I'm in my own apartm[ent]. How dare you insinuate ——"

"Look, my precious, you have been [answ]ering Randy's phone all day. Ran[dy's] supposed to be back from Texas today [or] morrow ——"

"I'm in my own apartment," said Su[san]. Her dignity was now a shield and buc[kler]. "If you don't believe me, go look in [Mr.] Randy's apartment and find out for y[our]self." Her voice ended in a gulp.

"That wouldn't be sporting," prote[sted] the voice.

"Well, call the police." Susan's [voice] cracked perilously on the last word.

"Oh, please," the voice pleaded. "[Let's] talk this thing over. I'm out in Ches[ter] Hill, but I can be in in a half hour an[d we] can have dinner together."

Mountain Range

By Catherine Haydon Jacobs

Here wait the patient creditors of time,
Ancient and steady arbiters of space,
Where spendthrift seasons, borrowing pace on pace,
Lavish their beauties in successive prime:
The green of spring tardy in upward climb,
Lush-foliaged summer, hoping to outtrace
The red of autumn and her savage grace.
Lastly, dark winter, the too flattering mime.

Only the changeless granite on the bleak,
Untimbered heights no season can invade,
Only the deathless ice upon the peak
Stand witness to a debt so long unpaid.
While without heed time flaunts new years below,
Man's life lies forfeit in unending snow.

For the first time – MEAT – with its complete, high-quality proteins specially prepared for your baby!

Swift & Company presents:

Strained Meats for Babies
Diced Meats for Juniors

Proteins are rightly called the "building-blocks of the body." And babies especially need lots of proteins because they grow so fast. Actually, your baby needs 3 to 4 times more protein, proportionately, than you do! Meat is one of our finest sources of complete, high-quality proteins (containing all the essential amino acids). Meat also furnishes important natural B vitamins and iron, often inadequate in the young baby's diet. Now you can give your baby highly nourishing meat earlier in life—meat, specially prepared for him by Swift & Company. There's a variety of six appetizing meats to choose from—in either strained form for young babies or diced form for older babies: beef, lamb, pork, veal, liver and heart. So convenient, too—no scraping, sieving or cooking! Swift's Meats for Babies and Juniors are all ready to heat and serve!

Ask your doctor when it's time to start your baby on Swift's Strained or Swift's Diced Meats. Your neighborhood food store has them now.

Just as she was falling asleep, it started to ring again. Mr. McNeal, thought Susan, is too darn popular, and let it ring itself into silence. Her last conscious thought was that Mr. McNeal was probably terribly conceited, and she wouldn't like him.

The telephone woke her the next morning, and she answered it almost automatically. When a cheery masculine voice said, "Good morning, Wrong Number," she hung up.

This, she thought, has got to stop. I'll have the phone taken out. I'll —— She gasped aloud at her own stupidity. She should have reported it before to the telephone company.

She quickly dialed the operator and finally got a supervisor to whom she told her story. The official, impersonal voice said, "I'm sorry. The business office is closed and there is nothing we can do about it today, but we will check on the matter the first thing in the morning." Then the voice quickened and became warm and personal like Atchison, Ohio, voices. "But, gee, that's awful. I'll tell you what I can do. I can report your phone out of order, but then you won't be able to get any of your own calls."

DR. BARBARA BIBER, CONSULTANT

More often than we realize, children start out with the best of intentions—and end up on the receiving end of a tongue-lashing. It's only human to be irritated when a child tries to be helpful by washing out daddy's best pipe with scouring powder, or by adding a soupçon of chocolate sirup to the beef stew to make it really tasty. But you can take actions like those in better spirit if you remind yourself that the child's motives are good ones—it's just his lack of experience with pipes and stews that gets him into trouble. Scolding a child for the results of such activities may stifle his best impulses. It's better to let him know you appreciate his good intentions, and to give him a few plain cues on what he can really do to help you.

"Hit them in all the way—or daddy will have trouble walking."

she put the phone back on the table, she shut her lips tightly and nodded her head. That for Randy McNeal. She jumped out of bed. It was a beautiful day. She would go to church and then to the zoo. God was in His heaven, all was right with the world, and she had no telephone. It was wonderful.

Wonderful, that is, until Mr. Dipple said the next morning, "Where under the sun were you over the week end, Susan? Stopped at the apartment on Saturday. You weren't home. Your neighbor gave me your telephone number. Tried to get you a half dozen times. Tried again Sunday. Out of order, they said. I tell you these utilities —— Stopped on Sunday. Weren't home. Mrs. Dipple's nephew was here for the week end ——"

He stopped in amazement as Susan said in a very small voice, "Oh, no, Mr. Dipple. Not that."

"Not what?" Mr. Dipple barked. "Nothing wrong with the lad. Elvira says he looks like this What's-his-name in the movies."

Susan hadn't even a small voice left to answer that one, and when Mr. Dipple said, "Better report your phone," she reached obediently for the instrument in front of her and called the telephone company.

They were most apologetic but most certain that a telephone formerly listed under Belshaw 2-5431 in the name of Mr. Randolph P. McNeal had been disconnected four months ago, and equally positive that there was nothing they could do about people who did not know this and called Mr. McNeal's number. Of course, Mr. McNeal was still listed in the old directories, but the new ones were being delivered that week, which should eliminate much of the annoyance to Miss Norman.

Susan was convinced until about lunchtime, when she tried to reconcile telephone calls from a fiancée, a best man, a cleaning woman and a few other assorted persons, with a disconnected telephone, and could not do it. She called the telephone company again, but they were polite and apologetic, firm and apologetic and, Susan thought, quite certain I don't know what I am talking about, but quite apologetic.

HER telephone was ringing as she opened the apartment door that evening. She wasn't going to answer it, but then she remembered Mr. Dipple and the nephew who looked like What's-his-name in the movies.

It was a nice masculine voice. A new one this time, Susan thought as he asked, "Is this Belshaw 2-5431?" Susan said "Yes" and stifled an impulse to add "and I wish it wasn't."

"This," said the new voice, "is Randy McNeal"; and hardly giving Susan time to gasp, he said, "We seem to have a mix-up on our telephones."

"Not yours," Susan corrected. "Mine. You don't have one. It has been disconnected."

"Oh, no," said Randy McNeal, as firmly as the telephone company. "It was temporarily disconnected while I was in Texas. I'm going to have it connected tomorrow."

"You are!" said Susan, glad that her voice was equal parts sarcasm and incredulity. "How nice. Then you can decide for yourself whether you will play tennis or squash, and when your cleaning woman will come."

"Oh, now, please, Miss—Miss ——"

"Turner," said Susan sweetly. "Lana Turner," and hung up the phone.

She coped with the situation for the rest of the evening by curling up on the day bed with a book; and whenever the phone rang, she picked it up and laid it on the table until the person at the other end wearied of saying "Hello." Then she replaced it in its cradle. By the time she was ready for bed, she felt very smug about Mr. Randy McNeal. She had finished him off with polish.

The smooth smugness lasted all through her orange juice and cereal, her walk to the office, opening the mail, and through the first three telephone calls of the morning. But it didn't prepare her for the fourth and the tone of humble apology with which Mr. Randy McNeal said:

Susan said, "Oh, that's all right. I "

He was still humble. "The telephone com-

I'll explain to people who call."

Mr. McNeal's voice brightened. "Would ou?" he asked. "Would it be asking too nuch of you just to make a note of any calls ntil I get my telephone? I can call you then nd ——"

Susan thought, Well, Sue, you would be small-town, and look what it's gotten you into. But she said, "I'll be glad to, Mr. McNeal."

So Susan spent that evening curled up on the day bed with a book, a pad and pencil, and when he called her at eleven, he was so charming that she was really sorry that there had been only one message for her to take. He was not only charming, but even more humble than he had been in the morning, which Susan thought, after she had hung up, should have warned her.

"Miss Norman," he said, "I have another favor to ask of you. Miss Ogden Lida—my fiancée . . . that is, would you have dinner with us tomorrow night? Miss Ogden is a little upset about this—this mix-up. People have been calling her, you know."

Susan thought she didn't know, but she kept quiet and he went on:

"I think if she met you—saw you, it might —— Will you meet us for dinner at the Perry?"

She intended to say "No" with great dignity, but Atchison, Ohio, got in her way again and she said "Yes."

At seven the next evening she walked into the Perry feeling very sure of herself. She had spent the afternoon and the greater part of her spring clothes budget on a new black taffeta suit and a wisp of a hat that was a twist of straw and two feathers, and showed off to advantage her hair, which was now curled on top of her head. She had told herself all afternoon that she was a silly for making an occasion of something that couldn't possibly be of any importance to her which was, in fact, all for another girl but there was an inner compulsion which drove her through shopping and the hairdresser. The result she saw in her mirror justified the effort. She caught her breath. If only —— She started to think. If only Randy McNeal were waiting for her. She turned away from the mirror resolutely.

Randy McNeal had told her he and Lida would stand in front of the florist's shop, so that she would recognize them, but she was surprised to note hurriedly in crossing the lobby that there were two men and a girl. The tall, blond man with the broad shoulders and the serious face would, of course, be Randy McNeal, and the dark, elfin-looking girl laughing up at him would be his Lida, while the other man, who was not so tall and not so blond, and not at all so attractive, could be most anybody. Probably, Susan thought, the house detective.

Susan hesitated for only a moment, and then said quietly, her eyes on the tall man, "I'm Susan Norman."

She liked his smile as he took her hand, and said, "So you're Susan Norman," and she was very glad he held tightly to her hand, when the elfin creature stamped her foot and said, "So this is the middle-aged secretary with the vinegar voice you wanted me to meet," and started at a half run, half walk across the lobby, the unknown man in close pursuit.

Susan tried to withdraw her hand as she said hesitatingly, "Shouldn't you go after her?"

But he tucked her hand firmly under his arm and said, "Randy will handle her—he's had practice."

Susan said "Oh"; and then, when the blond man did nothing but continue to smile down at her, she swallowed hard and tried again to withdraw her hand. "I think I should go. Mr. McNeal asked me to meet them ——"

"That," the blond man interrupted, tightening his hold on her hand, "was not his idea. That was my idea."

Susan said "Oh" again, and was silent for a moment. "Miss Ogden is quite perturbed. Perhaps I should ——"

The blond man shook his head. "Lida is like that. I knew she would storm off and Randy would have to go after her. Actually I made the dinner reservation for just the two of us."

He looked down at her in such a way that Susan's knees began to do foolish things and she was glad he was tucking her hand more firmly under his arm.

"It was the only way," he said, "I could think of to meet you."

It seemed to be Susan's turn to say "Oh" again, which she did. Then even before he said, "I'm Phil Armstrong and I knew that wasn't a wrong number," she knew that her telephone was going to ring a lot from then on.

Mrs. Bishop might say you just never knew what was going to happen, but there are times when any girl knows exactly what is going to happen next. THE END modern baby need not suffer from colic. In most cases rearranging s diet, or "burping" him after meals, will eliminate colicky seizures.

THE COLICKY BABY

BY DR. HERMAN N. BUNDESEN

President, Chicago Board of Health

OSE of us who are now entering the grandparent" class can well remember but a short generation ago, olic was accepted as something unfore but unalterable, like bad weather. babies, including my own six youngwere colicky in early infancy, but ers usually didn't do much about it, t lose sleep, and in a few months the subsided.

t with our improved knowledge of tion today, we recognize colic as a ite digestive disorder, the cause of n can almost always be found and nated. Instead of letting the baby ay after day as colicky seizures occur, tting the entire household, the wise ier—with the aid of her doctor—determines why her baby is suffering, and does something about it.

Colic occurs more often in early than in late infancy, three months being the age at which it is most prevalent. It is characterized by painful, spasmodic contractions of the intestine.

Unless the colic accompanies a definite disease, the pains ordinarily come on some time after the baby is fed, usually appearing in the late afternoon or at night, when there is little food in the stomach. The pains may last only ten or fifteen minutes, or they may continue intermittently for hours. In severe colic, the baby's abdomen becomes rigid; his knees are drawn up high, then kicked out sharply in repeated efforts to relieve the uncomfortable pressure.

While it is true that a few cases of colic may be caused by allergy, or toxic reaction to some specific substance in the food, the most frequent causes of colic are overfeeding and excessive sugar in the diet. This is very important for the mother with a young baby to know. Undigested sugar ferments in the intestine, releasing the pain-producing gas. In babies who are underfed, colic sometimes results from swallowed air.

SINCE all these causes of colic have to do with the kind and amount of food the baby eats, correction must be sought through adjustment of the diet. This may take several days, or even weeks. While a satisfactory diet is being worked out, therefore, mother should know how to give the baby relief during a painful seizure. Often, gently applying heat to the abdomen will be quickly effective. Taking care that the hot-water bottle is covered with a bath towel, or that the heating pad is not so hot that it might burn the tender skin, mother should lay the baby face downward, with the heat directly under the abdomen.

In more persistent cases, an enema will help expel the gas from the intestine and bring relief. However, enemas should not be given except with the doctor's explicit approval. In some instances, he may prefer to use drugs to quiet the baby and help expel the gas.

If the baby is bottle-fed, the first step to be taken toward the elimination of colic is to reduce the amount of sugar in the formula. This simple procedure alone is often sufficient. If it does not eliminate the colic, but seems to diminish its severity, mother can experiment, taking away a little more sugar, or perhaps reducing the amount of the feedings, and observing the results for a few days. When this is done, it is wise not to rely on memory to tell whether the baby is faring better this week than last. Instead, make a note of the number and severity and duration of colicky spells every day; then you will be sure what progress is being made. However, these experiments with the formula should be carried on only under the doctor's supervision. It will not do to relieve the baby's colic at the expense of an adequate diet; the doctor will know what the limits of safety are.

Alas for the man who has not in his inmost heart some secret which may not be told, because it cannot be spoken, and because if it were spoken it could not be understood.

—PAUL SABATIER.
Life of St. Francis of Assisi
(Charles Scribner's Sons).

Underfed babies are more inclined to swallow air, with resulting colic, than those who are getting the right amount of food. Dietary adjustments are needed for underfed infants, of course, but in any case mother should see that swallowed air is brought up promptly after each feeding. This is done by "burping" the baby—holding him in a sitting position on the lap or upright against the breast and patting his back gently until the air is regurgitated. Often this takes several minutes, but mothers who persist are invariably rewarded in time with a loud, satisfying "burp"—evidence that baby had swallowed some air which might have caused discomfort.

When the colicky baby is breast-fed, the sugar in his food cannot be reduced, of course, but what the doctor usually does in such cases is to alter the proportions of the various food constituents by supplementing each feeding with about an ounce of boiled skim milk. This should be given just be the breast feeding.

Colic in breast-fed babies sometime found to be the result of psychologic or e tional factors affecting the mother. E cially in the evening, after a full day of ca for the baby to whom she is not yet f accustomed, the new mother is subject fatigue and emotional upsets which may fluence the quantity or quality of her m supply and affect the baby unfavorably. best way to prevent this from happenin for mother to plan the day's routine carefu to include ample periods of rest and rela tion. If need be, the doctor should be c sulted to make certain is getting enough re often a frank talk w him about these emotio problems will itself br the added mental p that is needed.

In a very few cas colic proves to be intr table, persisting in spite every effort to regulate food and the daily sch ule; then the cause likely to be an allergy. By testing baby's reaction to various ingredients in diet, the doctor may eventually unco the substance to which baby is sensiti this must be ruled out. No matter w the offending food is, an adequate sub tute can probably be found. Even bab who react unfavorably to milk are gett along nicely today on emulsions made fr soybeans.

As nutritional knowledge advances, c will unquestionably become even easier deal with than it is today. Meanwhile, p ents of babies whose colic does not respo quickly to today's treatment methods take heart from the knowledge that the c dition rarely lasts very long. When the ba is three or four months of age, or soon the after, the delicate digestive organs beco sturdier and manage to take care of the fo which caused upsets in early infancy.

If this silly, screaming creature kicking on the floor would just stop being a Party-Spoiler, its mother and father would love it a lot more. This Party-Spoiler was all through its supper, had its bath and was ready for bed when it found out its parents were going out. It is going to sleep anyway, but screams and yells because its mother and father don't stay home. Why doesn't it kiss them good-by nicely and say, "Have a good time"? Then it would not be a Party-Spoiler.

PARKING DOUBLE

The families Stone prove that "two can live cheaper" on the G. I. Bill of Rights.

BY HILDEGARDE DOLSON

IT'S a piece of today's crazy-quilt housing pattern that Nan and Charles Stone started out to find a two-room, furnished, $40-a-month apartment near Lehigh University, and wound up as the uneasy owners of an eight-room farmhouse and eight acres of land, plus a barn, tool and milk sheds, a huge chicken house and a two-car garage. They bought it with that reckless feeling of "anything for a roof," but as soon as they'd signed the deed, it began to seem like an awful lot of roof for a G. I. back-to-school budget.

The time was June, 1946, with the gently curved hills of Bucks County, in Eastern Pennsylvania, swelling into summer. Twenty-four-year-old ex-Army captain Charles Stone was already back at Lehigh, which overlooks the grimy, steel-booming city of Bethlehem, and he had two more years of an accelerated course in industrial engineering. Nan's baby was due that August. At war's end, the two had felt well set up. Both had worked hard and saved harder, their first two years of marriage, looking forward to the day when Charles could shed his uniform and Nan her job. What they wanted was a stable bank account and solid

They shared a roof to settle down to a home and education.

"The dawn comes up like frenzy on our little acres." In one hour flat, Stones combine operations to manage the care and feeding of a furnace, a baby, 12 chickens and their four selves. Settling back for an extra cup of coffee, Nan remembers quieter days, devoted to studying French and shorthand. "But then, I guess this marriage makes sense," she says. "Charles and I fell in love at a circus and we've had one ever since."

Higher mathematics, henhouse style: the Stone chickens live up to their owners' slightly zany reputation by laying 23½ eggs apiece every month. Aid and comfort to poultry project is supplied by John Dieterly, a seasoned farmer-neighbor—"our personal Department of Agriculture."

Pursuing "higher education on ground-floor incomes," George and Charles are right in style, for 80% of their fellow students at Lehigh University are veterans doing just that. The boys will have engineering degrees by spring of '48, take jobs "wherever there is a job and no holds barred."

"Every Day in Every Way"

(Continued from Page 211) side on the window sill above the sink. The kitchen is the lively center of doubled-up living, a many-windowed, rambling room with Chip's bathinet and chest of drawers looking surprisingly at home in an alcove. The Stones eat all their meals in the kitchen, the boys often study there, and Chip's play pen sits companionably near the sink. Even debates on major policy moves, such as whether to get a cat to cope with the oversupply of mice, are carried out in the kitchen. Jane hates cats, but she acceded politely to majority rule.

Breakfast, in the Stone household, resembles one of those movie reels run off at double time. Nan gets up first, to feed Chip, and puts on the coffee. By 7:22, Stones are popping all over the kitchen, and by 7:45 George, Charles and Jane are in the car, on their way to Lehigh, eight miles away. Jane always rides in with the men, works from 8 to 12 as secretary to the head of the industrial-engineering department, and is often in such a rush mornings that she puts on her lipstick in the car. On the days the men get home for lunch, there's a fat casserole of macaroni, or soup and sandwiches. Dinners are apt to be any time from 5:30, on the nights George and Charles want to get in a lot of studying, to 7:30. As Nan murmurs thoughtfully, "We ate nearer midnight the time I forgot to put in the roast."

When Jane cooks meat, she always gets George to tell her if it's done. She explains, "He's got the divining-rod eye or something." When you look at the sensitive-faced, dark-haired George, with his high, scholar's-bulge forehead, you're surprised to hear this. Charles, who resembles Hollywood type casting of Young British Scion, can make dandy pancakes and lamb ragout. Nan says, "He gets so carried away when he cooks that he's apt to put in anything he sees." All four Stones have lusty appetites, but the men present a united brotherly front on refusing to eat fish. There was also one loud difference of opinion last fall, during hunting season. Charles told Nan happily that he'd shoot some pheasant and bring them home as a dinner delicacy. Nan, who loathes the idea of killing anything, was furious; her eyes, usually the gray of silver birch, got storm-colored. "If you go out with a gun after those poor little birds," she told him, "I'll run ahead of you pounding a hammer on a tin dishpan, to warn them to fly for cover." The Stones had pheasant for dinner. Charles admits, grinning, that he had to do all the plucking. "But Nan finally cooked them and ate her share," he adds with a gentlemanly leer.

During the first few weeks of co-operative living, the two wives vied with each other to turn out fancier meals, especially desserts. Jane says, "The boys kept egging us on to compete, because they figured they'd get better meals that way." The night Nan made a spectacular chocolate-chip pie, George praised it passionately, whereupon Jane sat up half the night brooding over cookbooks, determined to prove that she, too, could be worthy of his praise. When she retaliated with a mocha layer cake, Charles used up enough adjectives to launch a movie trailer. After a month of this cross-play, the girls had almost knocked themselves out. At that point, they made a pact to serve simple meals and "easy stuff like chocolate pudding for dessert." Nobody looks pinched with hunger, and Chip bulges rosily. Nan tries to be a casual modern mother by saying, "Chip isn't much to look at now, but maybe he'll improve with age." This kind of talk fools nobody, least of all Chip. When he sits on Nan's lap eating dinner, and favoring her with a toothless, spinach-streaked smile, he knows who's beautiful, all right. Jane is a doting aunt, but says earnestly, "I never pick him up unless Nan gives me permission. With four of us around, there'd be too much danger of spoiling him."

After Chip is bedded down and the dishes done, the Stones have what they blithely call "a wee spot of gracious living." This consists of playing one rubber of bridge while they drink their coffee. The G. Stones are always pitted against the C. Stones, and scores run neck and neck, although George complains that Nan is too good a bluffer. When the men settle down to study, the girls sew, write letters or do a bit of light reading. The radio-phonograph is playing a symphonic program, or perhaps a Prokofieff album from Nan and Charles' small

"He knows who's beautiful, all right." The household schedule on the kitchen wall lists Nan's full-time baby and Jane's part-time job as "activity extracurricular." But both admit, "when Chip's feeling social, we polish his apple—the silver can wait."

"Corner cutting's our community hobby." And the Stones know it's paid off. Both couples save $15 monthly on double bookkeeping, hold family food bills down to $100. Chip is budgeted as "luxury," and bulges rosily on the grand total of $2.50 a week.

"A wee spot of gracious living." When Chip's bedded down and the dishes are done, the G. Stones battle the C. Stones at "one rubber, no more" of bridge. Then, it's books for the boys and gossip for the girls. "Our idea of a big night is an early movie."

"Tonight is Ours"

White ties came out of moth balls—and it was dream dust for four when the Stones waltzed at the Chi Psi fraternity spring formal. Going from diapers to dancing sometimes makes Nan muse, "We're just in-betweens, I guess—in between the awkward age and middle age." With more than 500 married students at Lehigh, babies' bassinets are at home on the campus. Chip's special date for his first prom was the chapter cook's wife, baby-sitter preferred when veteran papas catch up on the fun they missed in war.

record collection. Nan is apt to be studying a fashion magazine raptly, in the spirit of window-shopping. She's a whiz at making smart clothes for her tall, made-to-order figure, but right now the budget doesn't encourage much more than overalls for Chip. Both Nan and Jane are still wearing their trousseau outfits, with the emphasis on suits.

Occasionally another college couple comes in for bridge, but guests are usually members of the Stones' families who come for week ends and holidays, bringing a whole ham and other strictly-for-hunger hostess gifts. On Saturday nights, Nan and Charles often go to the farmers' market auctions near Bethlehem. (Originally, they had the happy notion they'd pick up antiques there, for a dollar or so apiece. They soon discovered that the Broadway playwrights who are summer settlers in Bucks County have had a wildly bullish effect on the price of even an old milking stool.) The favorite diversion of all four Stones is skiing. Last winter, Nan and Charles splurged on one skiing week end in the near-by Poconos. George and Jane spent a week between semesters at Stowe, Vermont. George came back with his leg in a cast, but as he and Jane explained radiantly, "It wasn't broken until our last afternoon there."

Charles and George are members of Chi Psi fraternity, and the Stones' most festive binges are dances at the Chi Psi house that looms handsomely on the hill overlooking the campus. For the formal dance this spring, George and Charles yanked their white-tie-and-tails out of storage bags for the first time in years. Jane wore a trousseau pink chiffon with a beaded Empire bodice and long black gloves. The day before the dance, Nan went frenziedly to work making a long-sleeved black dinner dress. Charles points out now that Nan always procrastinates, and that she could have started the dress weeks before. Nan counters with, "But I always work best under pressure, and Charlie was such a lamb about pinning up the hem for me." The results of this joint dressmaking effort didn't look at all like a husband-pinned job.

Even at a fraternity dance these days, the contrast to prewar college life is sometimes startling to an outsider. Of the men students at Lehigh, 80% are veterans, and 22% of those veterans are married. The pretty little singer with the college band is the wife of a veteran and works in the same office as Jane. She's expecting a baby this summer, yet at the spring dance she stood before the microphone with charming unself-consciousness and sang in a rich, creamy, blues voice. Two of the most sought-out people at the dance were Charles' and George's fraternity brother, Bill Clark, and his red-haired wife, Ann. The Clarks were putting up a prefabricated (Continued on Page 240)

"You never tasted a better cake —or saw a sulkier cook!"

"My beee-u-tiful, sparkling white coconut cake tasted every bit as good as it looked! It was so light and tender—and yummy rich! All because I made a simple—but huge—discovery.

"It was simple; I just used Crisco and a new Crisco Success Cake recipe. Why, the combination's positively magic. You get better cakes on every count—richer, lighter, tenderer, moister. Crisco, you see, gives you cakes such as no other type of shortening can, because Crisco has a baking secret. And the new Crisco Success Cake recipes were worked out to take special advantage of that secret.

"Quick as a wink, too. It takes only 4½ minutes to mix a cake with a new Success Cake recipe. And what a cake! Better than any you ever made the old-fashioned way. Of course, pure, all-vegetable Crisco is ideal cake shortening with any recipe, but wait'll you try Crisco plus the Success Cake method!

"Do you wonder I sulked? Here I've had Crisco in the kitchen all along. I've always depended on it for frying. 9 out of 10 doctors, you know, say Crisco's digestible. And yet I'd never even tried it for a cake before. Gee, am I glad I've learned at last to depend on Crisco for everything—cakes, pies and fried foods—Crisco improves all 3."

Delectable and a cinch to make with Crisco's quick new Success Cake recipe. But we can't promise success unless you use pure, all-vegetable Crisco —the shortening with the baking secret.

You'll get better cakes on every count—lighter, richer, moister, finer-textured —with Crisco and new Crisco recipes like this. Measure ingredients exactly—follow the simple directions carefully –be sure to use Crisco.

COCONUT LAYER CAKE

Measure into mixing bowl (All Measurements Level):

2 cups cake flour (sifted before measuring)
1⅓ cups sugar • ½ cup Crisco
1 tsp. salt • ⅔ cup milk

Blend vigorously by hand or with mixer (medium speed) 2 minutes. Now stir in (yes, all by itself);

3 tsps. baking powder*

Now add: 4 egg yolks (unbeaten)*
⅓ cup milk • ½ tsp. lemon extract

Blend by hand or in mixer (medium speed) for 2 minutes. Pour into two 9" layer pans (9" by 1½" deep) which have been rubbed with Crisco and lined with waxed paper. Bake in moderate oven (375°F.) 25-30 minutes. Frost with your favorite white icing. Sprinkle top and sides of cake with shredded coconut.

Double-action or phosphate type baking powder (Calumet, Davis, Rumford, Clabber Girl, KC, etc.). With tartrate type (Royal, etc.), use 4 tsps.*

May use 2 whole eggs and 2 yolks, reserving whites for icing.

HOW MUCH DISCIPLINE FOR BABY

BY LESLIE B. HOHMAN, M. D.
Professor of Psychiatry, Duke University

"CHIP" STONE, age 9 months, who lives on top of a hill in a country house near Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, with his 24-year-old G. I. (ex-Army cap'ain) blond father, Charles, and his very attractive mother, Nan, has demonstrated that he has more shrewdness than his well-educated parents. Even though his father is finishing college training in engineering at Lehigh University, Chip knows more about accomplishing his ends than his grown-up parents.

Let me prove my judgment about his intelligence. Chip has arranged his feeding schedule to suit himself completely. He wants his early breakfast at 7 o'clock in the morning, his late breakfast at 10:30, his lunch at 2:30, and his supper at 6. He plans a long night of sleep and does not want any more food for 13 hours. His mother planned a 4-hour schedule for his meals because she thought Chip should be fed like other babies, but Chip showed her he was too intelligent to be treated like a child, and, therefore, arranged his feedings to suit himself. He's only 9 months old, but he said, "Of course I can go thirteen hours without food if it suits my purposes, but it doesn't always suit me to go four hours in the daytime. If you don't feed me and play with me when I want, I'll scream until you're so upset that you'll see who is the master and who runs this show."

Now don't be misled about Chip's knowing what he wants. He is very certain about the times of the 24 hours he is willing to sleep. Thirteen hours at night is all right, but he has said definitely and in no uncertain screaming that he does not want to sleep in the afternoon. If Nan puts him in his buggy on the porch in the afternoon, he begins to shout and scream until she brings him in. If she becomes a little hardheaded and refuses to listen to his commands, he shows her who is the master by spitting up his food until she has to bring him in to change his clothes. Chip knows she'll find out about his "spitting" because she comes out frequently to see if he's warm or if his clothes are wet or soiled by the spitting. You must know that Chip is very wise and knowing about his food intake, and takes no risks about his weight. He has always eaten plenty to keep his weight above normal for his age, so he can afford to spit up a little without any danger to his health. His doctor says his body, including his stomach, is functioning perfectly.

CHIP'S father has become convinced that Chip is smarter, and agrees with Chip's mother that they no longer need to be convinced about his intelligence. Chip's father would like to turn him into a member of the family who co-operates better with the family purposes. Charles and his brother, another G. I. who lives in the same house, have to study to become at least as smart as Chip, and it's hard to do when a young man of 9 months screams when there should be quiet for work.

Chip's mother agrees about the need for quiet and talks it over with Chip very open-mindedly. She asks him if he would rather come indoors or stay out. They also discuss play—whether he would prefer to play before or after or during meals. Chip is pretty headstrong and refuses to decide. Sometimes he wants to play before, and sometimes afterward, and sometimes he himself gets a little mixed up and cries even while he's eating.

Of course Chip and his mother and father all love one another very much, and the only time Chip really is willing to let the family make the decisions is when they're all together and Chip has the focus attention of both his father and mother and his grandmother if she happens to be visiting the house on the hill in the country.

Now don't be misled into thinking that Chip's mother is not intelligently trying to help him. She has read a lot of books about babies and has learned, or tried to learn, about the ways to make babies healthy and happy. The books do not agree about routine and regulations. Some say feed at regular intervals, some say feed the baby whenever he wants feeding or you think he wants feeding; some say pick the baby up when he wants to be picked up because he needs affection to give him security feelings; some say play with him when the chores of caring for the baby make it feasible (during bathing, for example), or when he's normally awake between feedings. To Chip's mother it is all pretty puzzling and mixed up. The upshot of the matter in Chip's case is that a lot of the waking hours of Chip's life go to screaming, and vomiting, and to the confusion and irritation of his father and mother.

If I have succeeded in making Charles and Nan's handling of their perfectly normal baby sound preposterous, then perhaps readers who have tiny babies of their own may see themselves in Charles and Nan, and be ready to help themselves and their babies to better happiness.

It would seem self-evident that a screaming, tearful and frequently angry baby is not a happy person. I would like to point out that it is hard to give real affection (the kind that psychologists regard as so necessary to normal emotional development) to a baby or a young child who is constantly and unreasonably irritable, fretful and angry. Does anyone believe that the baby is being loved when the parent is irritated and upset by constant screaming? Of course if the baby is sick or in pain, all the loving sympathy in the world flows out; but as soon as the parent has it borne in on him that there is nothing wrong with the baby, does he or she stay loving? If you're honest with yourself, the best you can do is to ignore the screaming. In fact, most of the parents I know get irritated and find themselves incapable of loving the screaming child.

It is told of my own infancy that I screamed at night so continuously that my father, after walking with me half the night, would throw me on the bed and wish that he and my mother and I were all dead. A wise practical nurse entered our family circle and gave some excellent advice to my parents. She said, "Put him to bed and let him scream it out." At the end of the third night, when my father returned from a business trip, my mother informed him that the night-walking of the baby was over and I would sleep soundly through the night.

I would like to pass a rule on to Nan:

1. Don't pick up baby when he screams if you know he is not sick or in pain.

If you do pick him up when he screams, then your intelligent baby will learn that he t attention and affection by scream-

'l will continue to scream because he ttention and affection. Now Nan says ows this rule and has carried it out. The owever, run against her. Charles says no remembrance of the rule's being out two days in succession. She does occasionally, but then the screaming her because she feels it's wrong to have aming baby when the husbands are to study. She, therefore, does not the rule, but heeds the baby's scream-picking him up and bringing him s.

refore, I want to lay down a second r Nan:

2 Don't fool yourself that you are following this rule of not rewarding screaming when you are always finding excuses to break the rule.

u must remember that if screaming desired results every other or third then the baby does not learn easily ffection that he obtains by screaming.

as been clear in the study of the feeding ants that the 4-hour feeding schedule not be invariably the wisest schedule.
infants need shorter feeding intervals n weight most effectively. On the other it is clear that there is no sound reason tting the baby decide upon a whimsichosen feeding schedule. Look at the in-ls between Chip's feedings: 13 hours, ours, 4 hours and 3½ hours. Certainly er pains are not making this odd schedr else how could he go for 13 hours daily out feeding? Nan has permitted the 's screams to set the feeding time inof regular selected intervals.

ay down a third rule:

Use a regular feeding schedule, preferably 4-hour intervals unless the doctor advises shorter ones.

n't it a pity that Chip has to be unhappy uch of the time about food? If Nan did yield to screaming about food, Chip l enjoy a much longer period of sleep or . Now he must be unhappy to meet his feeding schedule.

an has made other serious mistakes about 's sleeping. There is no reason why this nths-old baby should not have the fit of an afternoon nap. Nan thinks she ving him a chance by putting him in the air on the porch. But she "checks" about every half hour to see that (a) he t cold, (b) he is not wet, (c) he has not up his food and needs changing. How anybody who wants attention have a nce to sleep if his mother disturbs him stantly? If Nan would put him in a room re he couldn't get too cold, and would re his pants and his dress, Chip might a chance to sleep. Instead, Chip gets a nce to demand attention every half hour.
fourth rule should be:

4. Don't disturb the infant's sleep by giving him a chance to demand attention.

Nan violates another rule about training children for emotional happiness. She pays an exaggerated amount of attention to imagined illness when there is no reason for it. She has taken the baby to the doctor, who says his spitting up food is not due to any physical cause. Common sense would demonstrate this to Nan herself. Chip has always been overweight. I suspect he gets overfed and spits up the excess. At any rate, Nan is so concerned about his spitting that the baby can always get attention by a little vomiting.

It's hard for Nan to believe that a baby can learn to spit up to get attention, but that is because she underestimates the infant's capacity to learn.

A well-behaved baby I know got a lot of attention during a cold with cough. Now, several months after his recovery, he uses the cough to notify his mother that he wants attention.

A fifth rule, then, is:

5. Don't let the child fool you into giving attention to a physical symptom when he is not sick.

Finally, I would like to analyze Nan's behavior toward Chip's playing time. She has tried playing with him before eating, after eating and during his feeding period. Chip has been allowed to determine when he wants to play. He will either scream or spit up, depending upon whether the particular time pleases him or not. The result is that he now cries even when he's being fed and being played with. Isn't it a pity that so much of Chip's playtime has to be connected with crying and unhappiness? If Nan would select a proper and convenient time, she could train him easily to expect play when it is due and not cry when it is not due.

Rule 6, therefore, will be:

6. Schedule playtime and attention-giving time regularly for the mother's and the baby's convenience, and thereby make it an expected happy period.

As it stands with Chip and many other babies, they get attention only when they show unhappiness, and not when they have a right to expect it—after peaceful feeding, or bathing, or sleep.

I would like to summarize my rules for Nan under a seventh general rule:

7. Let good things (affection, feeding and attention) follow good behavior, not bad.

Parents should realize that babies are intelligent, and too often are much smarter than their parents, because parents underestimate their children's intelligence. If parents could only realize that actions speak louder than words, they would realize that babies do not have to understand talking, but can and do understand action. I make a plea for happiness for babies, and would like every parent to realize that fretful, crying, screaming babies are not happy. They can be made happy if you do not reward unhappiness.

"Childhood Constipation"

...give Fletcher's Castoria!

"It's the laxative made especially for infants and children."

WHEN your child is cross and that crankiness comes from "Childhood Constipation"... the wise thing to do is this:

Give her Fletcher's Castoria. It's so gentle and safe, yet it works thoroughly and effectively. It won't upset her sensitive digestive system.

Unlike adult laxatives—which may be too harsh — Fletcher's Castoria is especially made for children. It contains no harsh drugs, and will not cause griping or discomfort.

And Fletcher's Castoria has such a pleasing taste that children really love it. They take it gladly, without forcing. Caution: Use only as directed.

House Rules for TWO-IN-ONE LIVING

A ticklish business, two wives in one house? Perhaps in some houses, but the Stones have made it mean less work, less money spent and more fun! Forty-eight dollars a month now, per couple, for food, compared with sixty dollars or more a month when they lived à deux. Everything's for it, nothing agin it in the Stones' case, for they live up to the rules they made themselves, and they don't mind each other's private business! Here's how it works. . . .

By Judy Barry

YOU'VE often heard the old, old saw, "No house is big enough for two women!" Probably you've thought about it and worried a good deal, if you've found yourself faced with the possibility. There's undoubtedly a germ of truth in it, as there is in most of the time-honored adages. But during the past several years, when we've all had to re-evaluate some of our pet prewar convictions, we've found that many such so-called solemn truths have turned out to be just old-wives' tales! Nowadays hundreds of houses are having to stretch to fit two or even more women, else one of the women would have to set up her solitary castle on the traditional park bench. And some of the houses (not all, we admit) are enjoying their stretch and doing it gracefully!

Nan and Jane Stone are young married women, and "in-laws" to boot, another condition sometimes considered as two strikes against an amicable relationship. Yet they have been sharing the same house for several months, happily and with mutual benefit.

The chief reason, of course, is that both the girls are intelligent rational beings and compatible. They're the same age, have similar backgrounds, although they're fr different parts of the country and kn each other only casually until they beg their double-harness living.

Neither of them had a long-establish pattern of a way of life; they're both n phytes at housekeeping and apt to giggle each other's struggles and mistakes rath than become impatient as an older, expe enced woman might do with a beginne bungling.

Then, too, the men in their lives a friends as well as brothers, have simi tastes in food and fun and living. Th naturally, colors the relationship of th wives. We've all known girls who were b friends in their single days, sharing livi quarters and clothes and dates in perfe harmony, who became tense strangers aft marriage, because their husbands didn take kindly to each other.

All four Stones, however, feel that t biggest reason their two-in-one living h worked out so well is that they didn't lea it to chance that it would.

Before they began to live it, th talked it all out at a long and lively b session, weighing pros and cons and wa weekly rotation of chores I work out best for them, they decided, to avoid monotony and to give each of a chance to try out her personal ies on each piece in the pattern of design for living. After all, if you n't ever cooked, but feel that you're l to any challenge, it's no fun to be anently relegated to the post of dish- er, with never a chance to concoct imagined curry, just because a more rienced hand has arbitrarily decided the cookery would be her department. refore, every week there's a complete ge of personnel in the Stone kitchen.

he cook of the week plans the us, does the shopping, keeps the stove refrigerator clean, polishes the table r, washes the dishes and tidies the hen. The other half of the act dries and s away the dishes, sets the table, dusts, dry mops and freshens up the rest of the house daily, cleans the bathroom daily, and each day does one once-a-week job such as rug cleaning, polishing silver hollow ware, brushing down the stairs, and so on. She also washes the kitchen floor once a week.

Each girl takes care of her own bedroom, each does her own washing and ironing. They have a washing machine which Jane uses once a week, Nan two or three times. (Chip's clothes and diapers!) Two or three afternoons a week they iron together, since each of them has her own board and iron. And very pleasant afternoons they are, with the boards set up companionably close in the huge sun-flooded kitchen, Chip gurgling in his play pen in the corner, a fine opportunity for "girl talk," and once in a while a pause for tea or a glass of milk.

This companionship is one of the dividends of two-in-one living, to many women a good point that more than makes up for some of its possible irritations. We talked to several other two-wives-in-one-house teams in addition to Jane and Nan, found (Continued on Page 261)

TWENTY-FOUR-HOUR ROOM

BY HENRIETTA MURDOCK

Interior Decoration Editor of the Journal

"HOW can we expand the use of our first floor without more remodeling than we can afford?" This was the problem confronting the Stones in their newly acquired country house. There were a tiny, crowded living room, a big hall and a long, built-on plywood bedroom. As do all of us, Nan Stone dreamed of taking down partitions and redividing the space to get a spacious living room. Such remodeling is expensive and not altogether practical, as removing partitions in old houses often weakens the entire structure.

So we decided to swap bedroom and living room and double the function of each. The color photograph shows how we planned the plywood built-on for the desired spacious living room, complete with a fold-away bed as part of the regular furnishings. There is a desk for study, and lots of places for books and magazines.

Then, into the small obsolete living room went the standing bed, comfortable chairs and a table desk, so that either room is now a complete unit with

OH, MY ACHING FEET!

For every one man who requires professional help for his feet, ten women need help • BY DAWN CROWELL

Beauty Editor of the Journal

FOR the past eight years Nan Stone's foot trouble had been diagnosed as "fallen metatarsal arches." Imagine her surprise when, barefooted and hopeful in Dr. Dudley J. Morton's New York office, she was told by this foot specialist, "There are no metatarsal arches!" Nan's pain, however, is not like that of the little girl who went crying to her mother because "someone almost stepped on my toe." It is real. Sometimes agonizingly so. In fact, a pained facial expression, a bad temper, poor posture and even a tired back can be traced to aching, ill-treated feet!

Doctor Morton, an associate professor at the College of Physicians and Surgeons at Columbia University, explains his revolutionary theory thus:

"The most common foot pain is in the metatarsal area just behind the two middle toes on the bottom of the foot. This pain is caused by the improper distribution of weight on the feet, which results in inflammation of the joints and irritation of the nerves. For example: in ideal weight distribution, when a woman who weighs one hundred and twenty pounds is standing, she distributes sixty pounds to each foot. Of these sixty pounds, thirty pounds are supported by the heel and the other thirty are divided into shares for each one of the five slender metatarsal bones which lie behind the toes. Because the bone lying behind the big toe is twice the size in diameter of the others, it takes ten pounds. Each of the other four takes five pounds. In this ideal foot the first and second metatarsal bones extend forward the same distance, and the three following shorten in length just as your toes shorten—the last bone behind the small toe, the shortest. Since each one of the metatarsal bones bears weight and therefore has normal contact with the ground, the concept of a metatarsal arch, with the front ends of the middle bones in an elevated position, is obviously erroneous! And since these bones are in contact with the ground, they cannot drop any lower unless the ground gives way beneath them!"

Now that you know down to the last pound where your weight should be distributed on your feet, it is easy to understand that if any one of these metatarsal bones is too short or too loose (particularly the first large one), the brunt of your weight shifts to the smaller bones and they become strained and weak with their overburden. There are about 40 per cent of us with this particular foot fault!

HERE's an example so that you can see for yourself how it works: Keeping your fingers stiff, place your hand flat upon a table. Now raise it so your hand and fingers form a forty-five-degree angle with the table surface. As you do this you can see the longest finger, which is the middle one, alone retains contact with the table. Therefore it carries the full weight of your hand. This happens in feet where the first metatarsal, behind the big toe, is too short; it may throw on the slender second metatarsal a harmful overload of sixty or more pounds. But if you are lucky enough not to have a short first metatarsal and still have painful feet, remember there are (Continued on Page 230)

[3] Sponge Jelly Roll

easy-to-make cake belongs to nge and angel cake family. After you've baked a successful sponge roll you'll be brave enough to try your hand at angel food made with the whites of eggs. A jelly roll, as well as a true sponge-cake, uses the whole egg.

Sift ¾ cup cake flour. Combine 4 eggs, ½ teaspoon salt and ½ teaspoon baking powder in a bowl. Set this bowl over a smaller bowl containing hot water. Don't let the upper bowl quite touch the water. Beat the eggs with a rotary beater or your electric mixer beater, if it's detachable, until eggs are foamy. Measure ¾ cup sugar and begin adding the sugar gradually, a tablespoonful or so at a time. Keep beating in between additions so sugar will dissolve. When all the sugar is in, the mixture should look very spongy, fluffy and golden. It should be stiff enough to pile up in the bowl. Now remove the bowl from over hot water. Sift the flour over the eggs, only part at a time. Fold in the flour. A wire whisk is good for this job, but a spoon will do. To fold means just what it sounds like—to incorporate the flour with a down, up and over motion of the spoon or flat wire whisk as gently as possible. If you stirred rather than folded flour, your cake would be tough and heavy. You've beaten air into the egg mixture. The idea is to keep it there so your cake will be light and fluffy. When the flour is all added, flavor with 1 teaspoon vanilla. Turn batter into a shallow jelly-roll pan, 15 x 10 inches, that has been greased, lined with wax paper and greased again. Spread the batter evenly. It is wisest to prepare your pan as well as preheat your oven before you start the mixing. Bake just 13 minutes in a hot oven, 400° F. Remove from the oven. Cut off crisp edges of cake with a sharp knife. Use a sawing motion to prevent tearing the cake. Invert the pan onto a clean dish towel that has been sprinkled with confectioners' sugar. Coax the cake out carefully. Tear off paper at once while cake is hot. Handle gently. Beat a glass of jelly slightly with a fork and spread on cake. Now you're ready to roll. Turn in one short edge of cake about 1 inch. Lift the cloth with one hand—guiding the cake with the other hand as you roll up the cake. Wrap cloth around cake and cool on a rack. It must be rolled while warm. When you're ready to serve, slice with a sawing motion.

MANY HAPPY RETURNS

Early beginnings. Early this and early that. The gardens are going strong, and I hope those who have gardens will have June peas. I hear a lot of talk about June peas. Can it be that the gossip concerns the peas you pick on the Fourth of July? Or have I got one of those cynical minds we hear about?

Anyway, things are early, and let's keep them that way. So for our early beginnings on our June table, why not a jellied cucumber soup? Why not, indeed? And here it is, pale green and—shall I say it?—as cool as a cucumber. Excuse it, please, and read on.

JELLIED CUCUMBER SOUP

Chill 4 cups of clear chicken broth and take off the fat—if any. Heat to the boiling point and add 4 teaspoons of unflavored gelatin softened in ¼ cup of cold water. Add ¼ cup of lemon juice and a little green coloring to give it a color that dreams of cucumber. Season quite well with salt and pepper. Cool the jelly until it is thick but not set. Peel a large cucumber. Cut in half lengthwise and remove and discard the center. Now chop the rest. There should be 1½ cups. Add to gelatin. If there isn't enough salt and pepper after tasting it, add more. That's easy—no work at all. Chill until set. To serve, break it up with a silver fork and serve garnished with lemon.

This may be news. Everyone knows about stuffing chickens and turkeys and pork chops and artichokes. (I'll tell you more about that one of these days. Very Italian, very delicious.) We stuff eggplant and crown roasts and peppers. In fact, almost everything that has an inside capable of holding or clamping together on a stuffing can and might as well be stuffed. It's a worthy idea. And makes things go farther. And taste better too.

But has it been left to us to stuff sweetbreads? In any event if you listen to me it will be done often. And may I now present the pièce de résistance of our meal—the stuffed sweetbreads?

STUFFED SWEETBREADS

Select 6 pairs of very fresh calves' sweetbreads. And be sure they are fresh. A stale sweetbread is staler than last election's campaign promises. So watch it. Now put them in ice water for an hour. Take out and wipe. Put them in cold water to cover and parboil for twenty minutes or so, until tender. Take out and put them again in ice water to stay until very firm. Cut off all the fat and muscle, and peel off all the membranes. (You know sweetbreads come in a sort of caul. It peels off with a sharp knife. It must come off—or else.) Split the sweetbreads lengthwise.

Get to work on about ¾ pound of fine, firm white mushrooms. Peel them. The stems must be washed and dried and go into the chopping bowl or grinder with the caps. Have them very fine. But very. Sauté with 1 large or 2 small cloves of garlic, finely minced, in 3 tablespoons of butter, margarine or salad oil until quite brown. Add a little cream and simmer with salt and pepper and a little marjoram until the cream reduces.

Stuff the split sweetbreads with this mixture. Hold together with toothpicks. Place them in an open shallow pan. Pour a little melted butter or margarine over each sweetbread. Sprinkle with salt and pepper. Bake in a moderately hot oven, 375° F., about thirty minutes or until nicely browned. Baste frequently with seasoned butter or margarine.

In the same pan in which you browned the mushrooms make a sauce like this: Mix 3 tablespoons of flour with 3 tablespoons of butter or margarine. Let it bubble up and brown just a little. Add 1 cup of chicken broth or stock and 1 cup of cream. Cook until it is like heavy cream. And stir all the while. Season with salt and pepper. Remove the toothpicks from the sweetbreads. Pour the strained sauce over them. Serve very hot. Garnish with a purée of peas and sautéed peach halves.

Daisy, Daisy. Speaking of other days, I'll bet a lot of you remember the old songs. And I hear that the younger people are scouring the out-of-circulation-records shops and sheet-music places for the songs we thought were about the last word when we were a little younger than we are today. Among them one comes to my mind and I can sing it now words and music. (So far I have signed no contract with any radio station, but opportunity knocks once. I have my ear to the keyhole.)

This is dedicated to Daisy. But this song, which was really the inspiration of our anniversary cake, was well, three guesses. No, wrong. It was A Bicycle Built for Two. Remember how it goes or went? Oh, I wish you could hear it. "Daisy, Daisy, give me your answer true. I'm half crazy, all for the love of you. It won't be a stylish marriage, I can't afford a carriage, but you'll look sweet upon the seat of a bicycle built for two." Pretty good memory, what?

DAISY CAKE

Let 1⅓ cups of egg whites stand in a bowl until they are of room temperature. (And don't neglect the baby while you watch the thermometer, either.) Beat with a flat wire whisk until frothy. (An egg beater will do it, too, but don't beat too stiff—just frothy.) Beat in 1⅓ teaspoons of cream of tartar and ¼ teaspoon of salt. Continue beating until the egg whites will stand up in peaks. Like frosting, you know. Sift 1½ cups of sugar twice. (Once and once again—that makes twice, doesn't it?) Gradually add 1 cup of the sugar to the egg whites, beating and folding after each addition. Sift 1 cup of flour with the remaining ½ cup of sugar. Gradually sift the flour-sugar mixture over the egg-white meringue carefully, folding in after each addition. Divide the mixture in half. Beat 1 egg yolks until very light and thick. Fold into ½ of the meringue mixture. Fold into this 2 tablespoons of flour and 1 teaspoon of lemon extract. Now fold 1 teaspoon of vanilla into the other half. Drop gently by spoonfuls into ungreased angel-cake pan, alternating the white and yellow batters. Bake in moderately slow oven, 325° F., sixty to sixty-five minutes. Remove from the oven. Turn the pan bottom up on a wire rack. Let stand for about an hour until it is thoroughly cool. Frost with a cooked icing tinted pale yellow.

ICING

Lor She Loves Me, She Loves Me Not.

Mix 1½ cups of sugar with ½ cup of water and a pinch of cream of tartar in a heavy pan. Stir well. Cover tightly and bring to a boil, slowly. Cook until the sirup spins double threads, or to temperature of 250° F. (thermometers are handy things). Remove from the heat and pour the sirup gradually over 3 egg whites beaten stiff—beating thoroughly as you add it. Add a pinch of salt and 1 teaspoon of vanilla. Beat until the mixture is very glossy and stands up in fluffy peaks and will not run. Tint delicately with yellow vegetable coloring. Frost the cake and decorate with blanched almonds split in half lengthwise, arranging them like daisy petals. Leave a space in the center. Put a rosebud of deeper-yellow butter icing—the old-fashioned kind, made with confectioners' sugar—in the center of each daisy. Put candles in each daisy center. And blow all the candles out at one fell breath—or you may not get your wish.

How it works out. We deal with remembrance. And bring it right into the dining room and on the table and have fun. Not one of us but has some anniversaries, and none of us is without something to build a memory on.

We like to celebrate. So why not? Life isn't so gay that it can't stand a little more gaiety. Are you with me? Many happy returns!

OH, MY ACHING FEET!

other defects which might, through faulty weight distribution, be causing similar trouble.

Doctor Morton describes his remedy for this as follows: "Suppose one of the four legs of a table is shorter than the other three. Is it better to put a pedestal under the center of the table and raise all the legs from the floor for an even balance, or is it better to take a small block of wood or cardboard and place it under the one short leg?"

Naturally, the latter solution is more effective, and one we tinker with every so often to keep our food from falling in our laps.

Similarly, Doctor Morton taboos exaggerated foot devices which support the whole foot and do not allow the well parts of your feet to help themselves. Instead, he suggests that the first step toward proper help for painful feet is an X ray. Because by showing the differences in the development of individual bones, the X ray is the only practical and reliable means of finding out the amount of weight each bone of the foot is accustomed to carry. Then, without resort to artificial supports, a light leather insole can be designed which restores normal function by correcting any fault in weight distribution. It should make underworked bones carry their normal share of body weight, and remove from overloaded bones the damaging strains and pressures which make feet painful. Hurting feet are rarely broken-down feet; they can be as comfortable and useful as other feet if they have a chance to carry body weight in a normal manner. The calluses which are so commonly present in the metatarsal region are definite signs of this internal trouble. When faulty weight distribution is eliminated, the calluses will progressively subside, and in time disappear. This method of treatment is like the prescription of eyeglasses after a competent eye examination. And just as you don't buy your glasses at a store counter, neither should you take it upon yourself to prescribe your own insole. Professional help is necessary.

How high is a heel? "The lower, the better," says Doctor Morton. As a heel progresses in height, the possibility of foo comfort rises too. This is because whe heel is raised, more weight is automati thrown forward to the metatarsal bon man's flat shoes allow his heel bone to share of work. In addition, a man's sho low three eighths of an inch leeway for expansion when he's walking.

"A woman who wears high heels," Doctor Morton, "is constantly wal downhill." There is no place for her fo slide, because her shoes are so closely fi Toes become cramped in this too s area. With constant use of high heels, t is a shortening of calf muscles. Wom feet become misshapen—and foot mi follows!

Now that the fashion for flat shoes from saddle shoes to silver sandals, woman's feet can look pretty—and feel way too. But for the woman who dressed up only when her shoes are s degree higher than flat heels or for woman who wants to give the illusio being taller, higher-heeled shoes can be w with comfort. But their use should be stricted as much as possible, since for m people the lower the heel the more c fortable the shoe. Here is the way Do Morton suggests shoes be selected for foot-harried person:

1. Make a penciled tracing of your stockin foot on a piece of paper, with your foot b ing down on the paper. Study the shape see—and keep that shape in mind when buy. A woman who has square feet is ask for trouble if she tries to squeeze them i pointed toes.
2. Always have your shoe salesman meas your feet while you're standing. Your f naturally expands when your weight is or
3. Select your shoes according to the w they do. High heels are fine if you sel them for occasions when your feet are lik to be crossed under a bridge table, or danci But for shoes that are going to house y feet while you push a baby carriage (o mop!) or rush around on the job, cho low-heeled and comfortable ones.

CAREERS AT HOME • BY EVELYN SAGER RINGOLD

SUCCESS AT SIXTY

JELLY is Mabel Burlingham's bread and butter.

At sixty, Mrs. Burlingham, of Syracuse, New York, a widow, mother and grandmother, has created a new food delicacy—cinnamon-tanged jelly—and marketed it profitably in forty-eight states, Puerto Rico and Hawaii. She has more than 10,000 glasses of jelly now on order, but can fill the backlog only as quickly as she can secure hard-to-get sugar.

Mrs. Burlingham, like many other women who have found profit in their kitchens, did not go into business: she grew into it. When her husband died several years ago, she was in a depressed, do-nothing state. On one of her empty afternoons, Mrs. Burlingham—a fine, imaginative cook—experimented with a newspaper recipe for cinnamon-flavored jelly. The first batch of jelly was clear, ruby-red, lovely to look at, delightful to taste. But the flavor did not last. There were dozens of trial batches before Mrs. Burlingham arrived triumphantly at an extract which held the cinnamon flavor surely and deliciously.

Her first order sold to a de luxe food shop in New York City, and won rave reviews from the New York Times food columnist. A friend introduced the jelly into a Boston shop. Business was under way; orders gained momentum. Mrs. Burlingham's kitchen was turned into a factory for eight and ten hours a day. Each batch of jelly was tended with perfectionist attention as it progressed from the huge kettles to shining glasses.

Although Mrs. Burlingham modestly urges a lion's share of credit on her daughter, on the friends and business people who had faith in her project, this mild-mannered, energetic woman of sixty found she had untapped resources and a Yankee birthright: ingenuity and horse sense. With little business experience behind her, she secured a loan from her bank, organized her kitchen on a time-and-step-saving basis, learned to write a pulling sales letter. Each month she met her bills and her loan installments on the dot.

"Was that a struggle!" Mrs. Burlingham recalls. "But I established credit and made good friends. Since then I've realized that much good business is based on good will."

Jelly is more than an income to Mrs. Burlingham. "I've lived and dreamed this jelly for six years. I've found myself—and a tremendous sense of accomplishment. It's the doing that counts, not the money. I have been able to make something of a life apparently finished."

Tired feet should rest, not exercise, says Doctor Morton. If your feet are weary, why overwork them further? The only exercises he recommends for aching feet are ones to stimulate the circulation of fresh blood. Here's one complete foot treatment:

First, soak your feet in comfortably hot water for ten or fifteen minutes. This allows the heat to go through the feet, opening the blood vessels and letting fresh blood through. Then dry your feet thoroughly. You can follow this with a soothing hand lotion or cream applied in easy strokes. Then cross one knee over the other. Spend one half minute opening and shutting toes of crossed foot. Stretch them. The next half minute is devoted to a slow, circular ankle rotation going in one direction. Repeat toe exercise another half minute. Follow with ankle exercise, reversing direction. Cross other knee and repeat exercise for other foot. The exercise takes only four minutes! Follow this with a full half-hour rest period on a couch with feet in a position horizontal to your hips.

Hot and cold plunges are another means of increasing circulation. Use two pails, one filled with water as hot as you can comfortably stand it, the other with cold water. Take the plunges alternately, keeping your feet in the hot water one and a half minutes, then switching them for a half minute to the cold. Repeat five times and follow with rest period.

Persistent and excessive swelling of feet, ankles and legs might indicate some constitutional disorder (such as circulatory disturbance, heart or kidney trouble) and should be put into the hands of a competent physician.

Young feet can be cared for from the time your baby first begins to toddle. Your baby doctor has firsthand information, and you should take advantage of it on your regular checkup visits to him. The most prevalent cause for a youngster's foot trouble is short shoes, which often lead to bunions. Shoes handed down from one child to the next is a good old family custom only when each youngster has shoes that fit. Because a child's bones are soft and flexible, foot trouble is not likely to make itself known in early years; a child almost never complains of "tight shoes." Money saved in this "hand-down" manner is comfort lost in later years. Saddle shoes and moccasins are on the top of Doctor Morton's list for young people's shoes. Shoes that are too large will not irritate feet or cause corns, as was once thought.

Feet usually attain their full size at the age of twenty. But if your activities are increased (job, housework, motherhood, and so on), your feet are likely to grow as much as two sizes! Most women begin complaining of foot trouble when they're in their early thirties, because by this time their feet have become burdened with new chores, without simultaneously having had care and correct shoes.

Flat feet (low-arched feet), which are subject to jokes on a moment's notice and have caused women to dig sand holes in the beach to bury them, are actually as healthy as high-arched feet, often healthier. Doctor Morton tells of a marathon runner who had "feet as flat as the road he ran on, but the healthiest feet I've ever seen! As for their looks, is a woman with a high-arched nose any prettier than a woman with a medium or low-arched nose? By ancient standards, yes, but not necessarily today. And the same thing goes for your feet!"

Doctor Morton adds that the average painful foot is not a case of "fallen arches," but is a foot in which there is an element of painful strain; and this applies regardless of the height of the arch. Men who were discharged from the army because of "flat feet" had such an element of painful strain, but low-arched feet in themselves are not troublesome.

Blisters, corns and calluses should be cared for under the most sanitary conditions. If you break a blister yourself or remove a callus, be sure you use sterile implements. Paint the area first with one-half strength of iodine and follow with a dressing and bandage. Severe troubles of this kind should be cared for by a doctor. THE END

Have your Baby-and be a Beauty too!
Glamorous Esther Rains tells how young mothers can be slim and lovely

So many women say, "I put on weight after my baby came." But Esther Rains, 21, of Bastrop, Louisiana, says, "You can have your baby and, with the help of the DuBarry Success Course, be a beauty, too!"

Inclined to be plump, she put on pounds after her baby was born until she weighed 158. "My hair and complexion," she says, "had been impaired. I was self-conscious about my appearance. The Success Course was just what I needed. It showed me how to lose 31 pounds, improve my skin, style my hair, make up skillfully. The result has been incredible. Friends are amazed by the change and my husband is very proud of me."

Be the woman you want to be!

How about you? Unhappy about some things? The DuBarry Success Course is ready to help you. It helps thousands each year. Shows you how to lose weight, remodel your figure, care for your skin, style your hair becomingly, use make-up for glamour—be the woman or girl you want to be.

Results come surprisingly soon. In as little as six weeks, many women and girls completely make themselves over. Then the rewards can be wonderful: compliments such as you haven't had in years... the excitement of wearing smart, slender styles...a new, satisfying loveliness you know how to keep! You follow at home the same methods taught by Ann Delafield at the famous Richard Hudnut Salon on Fifth Avenue, New York.

I reminded him of the spell as we walked along, and he pulled me over to a stationery store and said, half smiling, half serious, "Knock on wood, sweetie, knock on wood."

A fat woman going by with a dirty little dog looked at us curiously, and I made a face at her. "Oh, Sam, you fool," I laughed. "What in the world is there for us to be scared of? Look." I ticked off on my fingers. "We've got each other. We've got my apartment to live in. You sold two paintings last week and you've got commissions for four more. My mother made me learn to cook. My father had a maiden aunt who left her all to me."

"It's not the things you have, Susie," he said, soberly, "that make the score add up. Sometimes it's the things you haven't."

"What do you mean, Sam," I said, "the things I haven't?"

"Never mind, invincible," he said. "I think that's one of the things I like best about you. You're so sure. Forget it, because down the street is a store that should have a posy for you."

So I went right along in my spangled daze, thinking that in one more week we'd be married, in one more hour we'd be in my apartment and I'd be cooking supper for us. Because I really am a very fine cook. And after supper we'd listen to the Brahms Fourth he'd just bought me and argue about what color the curtains should be in the living room.

"Here we are," Sam said, stopping in front of Bigelow's.

Sometimes I've wondered how things would have worked out if I'd gone right in with Sam instead of standing outside, looking at the flowers. Because the spell I'd been so proud of suddenly broke into a thousand pieces, brittle and wicked as splinters of glass. It broke when I was trying to decide between violets to wear and a white cyclamen, and I looked up and saw her coming toward Sam, looking a little frightened, but smiling, and with her hand out to him and his name moving on her lips as if it hurt them.

She was small with the fresh, clean face of a little girl. Not exactly beautiful, not really pretty, but with a delicate, clear look to her that was better than beauty or prettiness. Her gray eyes were staring at Sam and her soft, pale hair, blown by the wind, was sweeping back from her face in long, curling feathers. She made me feel too large, too dark and handsome with overbig bones. Even though she wore a loose fur coat, I could see she was pregnant as she came closer to us, walking gently and carefully.

Looking at Sam's face, suddenly grown pinched and bleak in the bright, floating light of the florist's window, I thought, This is the one. This is Elizabeth.

OF course he had told me about her when we had begun to know each other well. But he had never mentioned her again and I had simply and stupidly put it down as one of those unhappy love affairs everyone has and gets over. Even when he had described how much he had loved her and how he had built his life about her in the separation during the war, I hadn't been too much concerned. Actually, I hadn't given it much thought, knowing most people think they're in love not once but several times before they decide to marry. I, myself, had thought I was in love a dozen times before I met Sam, and since my love for him was so much more exciting than those loves had been, I'd thought his for me was more important than any he had known.

Now, seeing her, I remembered ve clearly all he had told me. I remembere how scornfully I had judged her when told me that her letters, at first bright ar cheerful, had, after the months slipped b become sadder, full of a loneliness and frustration that frightened her.

"Fiddlesticks," I'd said. "Any girl wort her salt should have been able to take Lots of people I knew did."

"I know, I know," he had said sadl "That's what I thought. But she made t mistake, I guess, of loving me too muc taking it too hard and shutting herself awa from anything that might come between us.

ELIZABETH, he had explained, always like being with people, meeting new ones, havin fun, not because she was party-happy, bu because she enjoyed living, liked makin others happy. For two years she didn't d anything she'd been used to—going ou dancing. She had worked hard running nursery school and at night wrote to hin Then she began telling him she had starte going to this party and that, seeing othe men because everyone told her it was un natural and morbid to live in a vacuum.

"Why, of course," I'd told him. "Sh should have done that in the beginning. lot of my friends wh were engaged had fine time and it didn' seem to do any harm.

"I told her to g ahead too," he'd said "I didn't want her get ting moldy and miser able. But little by lit tle, his name started coming in more an more. Paul was so nice he made her laugh, h took such good car of her and he knew al about me. Gradually I could see she was be ginning to fill her life with him, uncon sciously relying on him So I began getting broody. The Aleutians are no place for a happy outlook. I used to think, 'Why is this Paul stationed at Ninety Church Street while I'm shoved off into a fog on a Godforsaken island?'

"There were others like me, having trou ble with their girls. We got pretty bitter talking it over. We tried to figure out differ ent ways of hanging onto them. Finally, I couldn't take it, thinking of them together. So I thought I'd make her jealous, give her a shock so she'd realize what was happening to us. Like a fool I wrote her a crazy letter, telling her I'd been with other women. That there was one nurse in particular. I told her I thought we'd better go easy about marrying when I got back. That we both might have changed a lot. That it was a good idea to call off the engagement. Period. It was supposed to be a psychological trick to make her try to get me back, and I didn't write again for several months. Then, I heard she'd married him."

And now here she was, looking up at Sam, telling him he was looking well and how surprising it was meeting him like this because she'd been wondering if he was in town. All the time Sam just stared at her. It was I who had to make our manners and step forward so he'd remember I was there too.

I kept thinking, This is just a shock of surprise for him. It's like seeing a ghost. I thought, Let us all be natural, take deep breaths and I'll conjure our spell back again.

When she realized I was with Sam, not an innocent bystander, the color swept up in her face and she smiled at me. Sam came to and introduced us, and I began talking in my bustly voice that comes when I'm trying to manage a situation. I said how do you do and we were just going to have tea and wouldn't she come along because I knew she was an old friend of Sam's and there was a place just around the corner on Park and wasn't it amazing how you always met everyone you knew in New York. So I got us all moving along and into this place.

He sat across the little table from us both, the old and the new loves. That's what I thought in the beginning. But it didn't last long. Not when I saw his eyes that would start looking at her casually, but keep on looking so hungrily that he would practically have to blink them away to see his tea or his cigarette or me. She was his old love and his love forever. Elizabeth. An ordinary name, the name of a million women, I suppose. But its sound for us all, I knew, seeing them together, would always be the sound of passion and gaiety and sorrow, a lusting and a gentleness, a terrible excitement and a peace, a never-ending longing. And I, Susan Nichols, was just someone he knew and liked a lot and would have to marry in a week.

You can't fool yourself about things like that. I'd seen that same look in other men's faces when they looked at me. But I'd never seen it in Sam's. Not until he looked at Elizabeth. It seems strange that I hadn't missed it. But I guess I was too full of my own love for him and thought the lack of it was part of his quiet, his reserve.

All the time we talked so brightly about his show, which she had read about, and how she and Paul were now living in town because he had gone back to his law firm. There were no words spoken about the things we were really saying to one another. He never heard me crying out, Oh, Sam, why was I so stupid? Why didn't I realize how much you loved her? How can I marry you now, knowing what your love for a woman can be, knowing I won't have it like that? And she never heard him saying, My darling, my darling—what did I do to you? Why did I lose you? And her words, spoken only with her eyes as they moved quietly over him: Are you well, are you all right without me, Sam? This child I am carrying might have been yours, and now we will always be lost to each other because we hurt each other too much.

I kept wondering if Sam would tell her about us. I wanted to see how she would react. It didn't seem fair, somehow, for me to know so much about her when she knew so little of me. I kept waiting for him to bring it up.

But it was Elizabeth who said, "I heard, Sam, that you—that you were going to be married." And then, turning to me, she said, so shyly, with such grave sweetness and courtesy, "I hope it's you," that my heart jumped up and kicked out my hate for her.

I'd been trying to find fault with her, trying to think her a shallow, immature sort of person who hadn't had the strength to hang onto what she loved. Now I knew that if I had met her under any other circumstances I would have loved and had her as a good friend. In a strange way, I was grieved that I probably never would. Because Elizabeth, I admitted fully, was one of those women you love instinctively for their quickness, their tenderness, their honesty. I couldn't blame Sam for feeling as he did about her and I never will. So for a few minutes I felt generous and noble as we all went through the motions of drinking to our future happiness.

I thought, Susie, you're a good girl. You've learned a lesson you never had before: how to respect and like a rival.

But that didn't last long either. I could admire her all I liked. The main fact, the important thing, was that Sam still loved her. I lurched back into my misery and made up my mind to tell Sam our marriage wouldn't work out. I had to have a whole man for my husband, a whole love equal to mine—as strong, as passionate. Certainly not a man in love with another girl.

We said good-by to her finally and both of us watched her walk toward the corner. There she stopped and turned, raising her hand to us as if she were trying to caress us or comfort us.

-ah! my Absorbine

She's a very good person," I said. "I 't blame you for still loving her so much."

Yes," said Sam, not noticing the last of what I'd said, "she is."

. was night now, and much colder and world was not even an etching for me. It a bad photograph, taken by an amateur, red and out of focus. This was the other of love I knew nothing about, the sterile, oty aching, the jealousy, the seeking for ape. Well, I would escape. I would say d night to Sam and then I would write a letter. Planning what I'd say, as we ked down the block to my apartment, I an thinking hysterically, The greatest in- ument of torture is the pen. It can twist and ch the heart, cut the spirit and flay the brain.

'You never got your posy," Sam said ldenly. "I'm sorry. Shall we go back and it?"

'No," I said thinly. "No, Sam. It's too now. We can't go back now. There's no d for it."

He looked at me in concern and cried, usie—you're upset, aren't you, sweetie? n't be. I—you mean a lot to me. Look, sie—there's nothing wrong between us, is re?"

"No," I said. "I'm just tired, Sam. Would u mind very much if we didn't have din- r? I think I'm going to have a headache."

I kept on walking quickly so I wouldn't ow up all over the street. When we got to e apartment door, he took my hands and ssed one of them and said, "I'm sorry, sie. I haven't been very bright. Seeing izabeth like that was a surprise. Please derstand."

"Oh, I understand," I id. "I understand per- ctly. It's just that I el like being alone."

"All right," he said. Sometimes it's a good ing to be alone. But n't be alone too long, ill you? It's—it's not od for people. It's the orst thing that can hap- en to them. Will you call e later?"

"Maybe," I said. "You on't have to worry about me," I told him.

"Will I see you tomorrow?"

"I'll let you know," I said and turned way, keeping my head up high to keep the ears from falling out of my eyes. When I vent into the elevator, I turned and saw im, still standing out on the pavement, ooking down at it.

The apartment was warm and cheerful when I came into it. But I stood in the mid- dle of the living room, shivering, and began crying so hard that I couldn't stand up and sat down on the floor with my hat and coat still on. Nothing like this had ever happened to me before. My head felt like a lake of liquid fire with scraps of memories floating in it. Things about Sam. How he held his thumbs tucked under his fingers when he wasn't using his hands. The way his hair grew curly on the back of his head. The way he hummed to himself when he was thinking about something. All the good and pleasant things we'd done together. All the wonderful crazy happiness I had known. And now it was all over, done with.

I THOUGHT of them together. I thought of a lot of very strange things, hurting myself the way a woman does when she feels cheated and has only self-pity left. I kept telling myself no woman could live with a man when she knows he loves someone else. I'd never be content; I was no one to share, to pick up crumbs.

I thought of calling someone up. But I couldn't stand having anyone see me like this. At least I have that much pride, I told myself. No one would ever see Susie Nichols like a split shad.

But I couldn't just sit on the floor crying like a baby. I wondered what other women did when they felt like this. Some got drunk, I supposed. Some took a sleeping pill. I remembered an old nurse of mine saying that whenever she got a misery she cleaned the kitchen floor three times. But I didn't want to get drunk or take a pill or clean anything.

I began talking to myself as if I were a child.

"Get up, Susie," I said. "Wash your face like a good girl. Fix yourself some hot milk and take a bath and get in bed. Then you can write him that letter."

So I got up and took off my hat and coat. I went into the bathroom and put my face back in shape. I went into the kitchen and opened the refrigerator to get the milk and then I saw the chicken I was going to cook for Sam. And now he wouldn't eat it. I stood there staring at it and wondered what he would eat for his supper. Probably nothing. I knew well enough that when he was upset food didn't matter to him. And he was too thin. Even though he'd put on five pounds since I'd been making him eat regularly, he was too thin.

IT was then I began thinking. Who would make him eat when I wasn't around? Who would make him take his vitamins so he wouldn't get his colds? Who would keep after the cleaning woman who left his studio in a worse mess than when she went into it? Who would check his laundry and see he got all his white shirts back? He used to laugh at me the way I took charge of him and say, "Susie, Susie—what a wife you'll make."

Pinching the chicken's fat little breast that should have been so brown and juicy for Sam, I suddenly found all my jealousy and hurt erased by an aching pity for him. He couldn't eat the chicken, he couldn't have Elizabeth, and he wouldn't have me to take care of him any more. Maybe a woman's mind does work in a silly way, mixing up chickens and lost loves. But it's better to have it work that way than to go off howling.

I thought, What if he did look at her in a way I'll never know? He always looked at me with comfort and happiness. He took security and confidence from me. You're a fool, I thought. If you find passion and excitement through him, do you have to insist he find them through you? Elizabeth is his source for all that. Just because you give a lot doesn't mean you have the right to ask for what you want. And because you don't get what you want, do you have to hurt him, spoil things for him a second time? That's probably what Sam meant, I thought, when he said it's the things you haven't that make up the score. All right, put them down, the things you don't have. But put down, too, the things you will have. You can hear him talk and help him plan. You can keep his house and care for him. You can hold him at night and bear his children. You can be with him the rest of his life. No matter what you or anybody else feels or thinks or says about passion and longing, what you'll have should be a good enough score for any woman who really loves a man.

I looked at the clock over the stove. I'd already left him alone and unhappy for one hour and five minutes. I threw the chicken into a pan with some butter. I put on the water for the peas and even put salt into it. Then I ran into the bedroom and, stumbling, fell across the bed and grabbed the telephone. It rang and rang and my palms got wet. I couldn't stand it if he wasn't there. No one should ever hurt someone she loves for five minutes, let alone an hour and five. I was learning the difference between being in love and loving very fast.

Then, suddenly, his receiver clicked and I heard his voice. "Sam," I said. "Oh, Sam—an hour and five minutes is too long, darling. Hurry, hurry, the chicken's browning." I laughed. "It was the chicken, Sam—that made me come to. Will you paint me a picture of a chicken for a wedding present?"

"Susie," he said, "what's the matter with you? Are you all right?"

"Of course I am," I shouted. "For the first time in my life, I'm all right. Hurry up."

THE END

William James said that an educated person knows a good man when he sees one. There are standards and a style for every type of activity: manual, athletic, intellectual or artistic; and the educated man should be one who can tell sound from shoddy work in a field outside his own.

KNOX GELATINE

FRUIT COCKTAIL SALAD MOLD

(Serves 6; uses 1 pkg.)

1 envelope Knox Gelatine
½ cup lemon juice
½ cup hot fruit-cocktail juice
¼ teaspoon salt
½ cup diced green pepper
½ cup diced celery
1½ cups fruit cocktail drained (one no. 2 can)

Soften gelatine in lemon juice. Dissolve in hot fruit-cocktail juice. Add salt; chill. When it starts to thicken, fold in green pepper, celery, and drained fruit cocktail. Pour into square pan that has been rinsed in cold water (or into individual molds). Chill until firm. Cut in squares. Serve with mayonnaise.

STRAWBERRY CHIFFON PIE

(Filling for one 9-inch pie; uses ¼ pkg.)

1 envelope Knox Gelatine
¼ cup cold water
3 eggs
½ cup sugar
½ teaspoon salt
1 tablespoon lemon juice
1 cup strawberry juice and pulp
Red vegetable coloring

Soften gelatine in cold water. Cook egg yolks, slightly beaten, ½ cup sugar, lemon juice, and salt, in top of double boiler until of custard consistency, stirring constantly. Add softened gelatine; stir until dissolved; add strawberries and coloring. Cool. When it begins to thicken, fold in egg whites stiffly beaten with ¼ cup sugar. Pile in baked pie shell; chill until firm. Just before serving, top with sweetened whipped cream and strawberries, if desired.

Knox Gelatine makes meals easier and more varied...gives you treats with real fruit flavor and vitamins...and adds nutrition to every dish, because Knox is a supplementary protein.

QUICK AND EASYS for two

BY LOUELLA G. SHOUER

ON hot summer evenings a simple little meal on a tray, eaten on a porch or in the garden, can be more pleasurable than a several-course dinner at the dining table. You choose different restaurants when you dine out. Why eat all your meals at the same dinner table year in and year out? With a meal on a tray you can dine wherever you wish and change the tune of your daily dining. Not everything in your repertoire is possible for a tray menu. After all, there is just so much space and no more. Choose desserts that wait, foods that carry. Here are some suggestions:

Tray Trio

Eggs Soubise
Wilted Lettuce
Dark Rye Bread
Fresh Pineapple Wedges
Coffee

Make it a three-dish meal when you're planning tray service. This time we'll have individual casseroles for the eggs soubise—as they keep hot and won't take up much room on the tray—and we'll serve the wilted lettuce (or a green salad with French dressing if you prefer) in little wooden salad bowls. The fresh pineapple wedges are easy to eat à la tray and just as easy to prepare. Do this first so pineapple will have time to chill.

FRESH PINEAPPLE WEDGES

With a long sharp knife cut a ripe fresh pineapple in half lengthwise, leaving the top spiny leaves on. Put half the pineapple away for another day. Cut the other half in half again, making 2 wedges. On each wedge there will be a strip of core. Slice that off. Now cut down and around between the fruit and the rind—not too closely, or some of the eyes of the pineapple will remain on the fruit. Take your knife and slice the pineapple, perpendicular to the rind, into thin slivers. Leave in the shell. Sprinkle with powdered sugar and chill. It really takes less time to do than it does to tell you about it.

EGGS SOUBISE

Sauté ½ pound onions, sliced, in 3 tablespoons butter or margarine until golden. Push onions to one side of pan and blend 2 tablespoons flour into the fat. Add 1½ cups rich milk. Cook until thickened, stirring constantly. Season well with salt and pepper. Add 4 hard-cooked eggs, peeled and sliced. Divide mixture into 2 individual casseroles. Sprinkle with cheese and bake in hot oven, 450° F., until brown and bubbly, or put them under low broiler heat for the same results.

WILTED LETTUCE

Garden leaf lettuce tastes best, but unless you have a garden patch you'll have to forgo this treat, as most shops do not sell it. Any lettuce will do. Fry 2 slices bacon crisp. Remove it from pan and crumble it. Add 2 tablespoons vinegar to the drippings. Sprinkle lettuce with 1 small onion, chopped, the crumbled bacon, ½ teaspoon sugar, salt and pepper. Heat vinegar and bacon fat good and hot and pour over lettuce. Toss together and serve.

Trowel to Tray

Southern Stuffed Tomato Salad
Celery Hearts
Toasted Corn Muffins
Iced-Coffee Float
Chocolate Wafers

These are busy days in the garden, whether your aim is to grow peas or petunias. Maybe you're just a twilight gardener and try to get a little spade-work in after you get home from the office. In any case, when the time comes to throw down the trowel you're hungry, and it's into the kitchen for you. You're tired and don't feel like fussing with a hot meal. A salad and a cold refreshing drink are what you want. Take your trays to the porch where you can look out over your creative labors and gloat, if you will. The next-door neighbor's garden isn't nearly as far ahead as yours—or is it?

SOUTHERN STUFFED TOMATO SALAD

Peel and scoop out the centers of 2 tomatoes. Blend 1 tablespoon ham spread with 1 tablespoon mayonnaise and 1 teaspoon prepared mustard. Spread this on inside shell of the omatoes. Season ¼ pound cottage cheese with 1 teaspoon grated onion, salt, pepper and a dash of cayenne pepper. Slice 2 radishes and add with ¼ cup chopped water cress to the cottage cheese. If the cottage cheese isn't creamy, add a little cream. Fill tomatoes with the cottage-cheese mixture. Serve on a bed of cress or other salad greens.

Instead of a simple pudding or fruit dessert tonight, why not drink your dessert? Pour hot strong coffee over ice cubes. When chilled enough, remove the ice and put a big spoonful of ice cream in each glass. You won't need sugar. Now that the warm months are beginning, you'll find it a good idea to keep one tray of your refrigerator ice compartment filled perpetually with ice cream from the drugstore. Buy a pint or quart at a time, then you'll always have it when you want it. Coffee ice cream is wonderful in iced coffee too. So is chocolate.

Cooked to Order

Wild Rice With Chicken Livers
Peas With Fresh Mint Rolls
Marinated Tomatoes
Fruit Compote
Demitasse

You have a friend who has a luxurious turn of mind when it comes to food. He's fond of both wild rice and chicken livers. So you evolve a wonderfully good dish that calls for both of them all in one swoop. You plan a simple meal, easy to serve on a tray, ending with his favorite dessert—fruit compote—and invite him to dinner. The livers will cost you only about fifty cents. You'll have your meal on trays in the living room because you haven't a dining room and you think he'll like the novelty. Then, too, there's the coffee table handy.

WILD RICE WITH CHICKEN LIVERS

Cook ¾ cup wild rice in 1 quart boiling salted water until tender. In the meantime, sauté ½ pound chicken livers in ¼ cup butter or margarine with 1 onion, chopped, a pinch of thyme and one of marjoram. These two herbs do just the right thing for this dish. Drain the rice in a colander. Add to the chicken livers. Toss together well and serve.

Storm Warning

Quick Corn Chowder
Crusty French Bread
Avocado,
Black Cherry and Pineapple
Salad—Blue Cheese Dressing
Iced Tea

You hurried home tonight. The radio predicted a heavy rainstorm. You planned to stop on your way home for a steak, vegetable, and so on, but you don't feel like having wet feet if you can avoid it. So you decide to have a pickup dinner tonight of what you have in the house. Your shelf produces canned sliced pineapple, cherries, condensed mushroom soup and corn. Of course, you have the breakfast usuals which include the ubiquitous bacon. The salad pan offers an avocado and greens and you keep a jar of French dressing on hand at all times. Apron-pocket note: If you don't you should. You'll find it an ace in the hole many a time. You like blue cheese and crackers frequently for midnight snacks, so you have them on hand too. Looking over the situation, you decide you can easily concoct a filling main-dish soup from the table of contents, plus a very good salad. For the salad, slice the avocado and drain 2 slices of pineapple and about 6 canned black cherries apiece. Arrange all three fruits on lettuce and pour over the salads a blue-cheese dressing, which is nothing more or less than your favorite French dressing with blue or Roquefort cheese crumbled into it. The recipe for the soup follows:

QUICK CORN CHOWDER

Snip 2 slices bacon into small pieces and fry. In the fat, sauté 1 onion and ½ green pepper, minced. Add 1 can condensed cream of mushroom soup, 1⅓ cups milk and 1 cup cream-style corn (whole-kernel corn will be O.K. if you haven't the cream style, but we think the cream-style corn is better for this whole-meal soup because of its consistency). Heat all together and season with salt and pepper. Serve in chowder bowls. This is a meal on trays, so no tipping, please.

Lazy Supper

Hot Crab on Toast
Scallions and Radishes
Whole Strawberries
Iced Tea

You're going to prepare just one dish tonight. Hot crab on toast is a nomination. Everything else is to be eaten au naturel. There's nothing like cold radishes, so crisp they crackle when you bite into them, or tender young green-topped scallions to bring the zest of the garden to your supper tray, even if you haven't a garden. The strawberries, too, you're going to enjoy eating right out loud—washed, of course, but just as they are, without even a whisper of cream or sugar. Leave the stems on for handles. This is the home-grown season for the big strawberry beauties, and if you've ever picked strawberries—dead ripe and warm from the sun—you know how sweet and delicious a warm strawberry can taste. We usually chill strawberries, but if they are good berries to begin with they really taste better at room temperature. And now, here's the recipe for the crab dish:

HOT CRAB ON TOAST

Remove bones from a ½ pound can crab meat—or if you can buy fresh crab meat, so much the better. Combine the picked-over crab meat with 1 cup medium cream sauce. Season with ¼ teaspoon curry powder, ½ teaspoon Worcestershire sauce, salt and pepper to taste. Add a little grated onion and, if you like it, 2 tablespoons finely minced green pepper. Heat up well. Serve on slices of freshly made toast. Another way is to put a slice of toast in each of two shallow shirred-egg dishes. Pour crab mixture over toast. Sprinkle with grated Italian cheese. Run the whole business under the broiler for a few minutes to brown the top.

AH, YESTERDAY...

1902—VIVACIOUS CLARA BLOODGOOD was delighting Broadway with her acting. New Yorkers also spoke admiringly of a certain Irishman and tea merchant, Sir Thomas Lipton.

The lovely Clara was known for her playing of the stage part, "Jinny" Austin. Sir Thomas . . . for his exquisite blend of tea, grown in his own Ceylon gardens—brisk-flavored Lipton's!

1947—BARBARA STANWYCK is one of today's top favorites. She is starred in Erich Maria Remarque's "THE OTHER LOVE," an Enterprise Production.

BARBARA SAYS, "What a delightful tea Sir Thomas gave us! So fresh . . . so spirited . . . so different!"

Lipton's pleases you, Barbara, because it's brisk. Brisk means richer flavor—the pleasing result of Lipton's own way of blending as many as 33 different teas, each chosen for its special character.

Of course, there's a delightful difference that makes Lipton's America's favorite. Try it.

TWENTY-FOUR-HOUR ROOM

double use and the ever-desirable privacy so hard to manage in the average household.

Remodeling single rooms into apartment-like units solves many living problems. Even with the cost of building materials high, the change can be made without a shocking total. If you can do the work yourself you will be ahead; but in any case, there is no construction in this room beyond the skill of the average handy man who can handle a hammer and saw.

In case you are wondering about the room itself, a plywood room can be built onto any house, upstairs or down. If you already have a room to do over and it is plastered, make the shelves and radiator covers of plywood anyway, and carry out the rest of the scheme along the line of our suggestions. The effect will be practically the same and you will have made use of that which you already have. Radiator covers are loose and can be lifted away from the heating unit. In a rented house, make your shelves free of the wall and just screw them fast, top and bottom or at sides, so you can take them along if you move.

Bookshelves. Use ¼-inch plywood and make simple right-angle construction, just as if you were making a box. Shelves do not need to have backing. If you want backing for color or other reasons, wallboard will do nicely. Make each stack a separate unit so you can move them when you like.

Radiator covers. Use ½-inch plywood with the most simple right-angle joints. These are again boxes with one side and the bottom left out. When constructing them, don't think of fitting the radiators, so much as making agreeable use of the space around them as a disguise. Bring the tops to table or sill height and make them appear a part of the furniture.

The desk. We made the desk out of both fir and pine to show you that mixing wood does not matter; but if you prefer, buy a desk secondhand. You can remove the varnish and stain the wood to match your other furniture. The kind of desk shown is easily made out of an old table. Add shelves at one end and the job is done. The making and fitting of drawers are hard for the amateur and expensive in a custom job, so if you want drawer space, it is better to buy a secondhand desk that already has them. Pick up an old-style chiffonier or a music cabinet and make it into a file to hold stationery, letters and work materials.

The tables. The tables are ¾-inch pine with plywood tops, stained to match the other wood. The end tables are just sawbuck style, as taught in manual training; and if you want the same effect without too much work, get natural-wood luggage racks and fit them with plywood tray tops which you make yourself.

The sofa-bed. Today's hideaway beds open up at the touch of a hand, are fitted with standard-quality mattress and springs, and by day look like any well-styled sofa. Try to place your bed so that you do not have to move furniture before extending it for use.

You can, when you buy your sofa-bed, have a choice of coverings that takes care of any color scheme.

The decoration scheme. When wood is aggressive in color or grain, it is better to use with it a solid color rather than a print. The exception is an all-over print in the wood's own coloring. Yellow, peacock, autumn tones and greens go best with stained or natural woods. If you want your room to have a decorated look, even though you use second-hands or home-styled pieces, use color as a "uniform" in order to have things match rather than contrast. Bits of bright accent color can be introduced in bouquets, pottery and accessories.

Watch your lamps particularly, for the wrong size and style of lamps date a room quickly. The new lamps are larger than ever before, have drum shades with almost straight sides, colored opaque shades. Think in terms of making lamps for your room rather than trying to find them already made. In every town there is someone who can fit the base for you.

You can make wonderful lamps for a room of the type photographed out of old stone jars, big pottery vases, oil or chemical bottles, tea canisters and even big square oil cans.

Just to prove it, our own lamps are made of two plain wood boxes with homemade molding top and bottom. The wood was given two coats of black paint and a Chinese tea-canister design was traced on and painted, amateur style. You can buy similar authentic decals in tea-canister designs almost anywhere. Try making your own lamp bases—you will have fun.

Big shades in light colors can be bought in many chain stores for as little as $2.98, and you can paint them yourself. Use regular oil paint, thin enough to be smooth and don't work them over too much. If you know a painter who has a spray gun, take along your sample color and you may induce him to do the job. Spraying gives a velvety finish.

For rugs, use whatever is attractive and available. Hooked rugs are charming. Squares of plain carpet, faced back, look extremely well. Old carpets rewoven are tops for an economy room. An old hooked rug of inadequate size can be made important by edging it with felt, as we did in the photograph.

You can buy really good chairs secondhand. Be sure they are structurally sound, and if their contours are difficult, have them upholstered professionally. The labor cost for simple repair and covering of a club chair is about $35. If lines are straight, you can make slip covers yourself without previous experience, as there are many helpful booklets to show you how.

The Sound of Summer

By Louise Darcy

The sound of summer is a quiet sound,
With voices hushed and peacefulness around,
And footsteps walking slowly down the street
With leisure gait because of shimmering heat.
The noise of summer is a muted noise
The pizzicato season warm employs
Before the rush and bustle of the fall,
When playing boys and girls rush by and call.
The sound of summer is a darkened room
Where roses in a crystal rose bowl bloom
And coolness is an indoor pool to keep
The drowsy sleeper bathed in summer sleep,
While pigeons cooing faintly from the eaves
Deepen the lingering spell that summer weaves.

have her six bridesmaids carry red rosebuds, but had to settle on poinsettias as a wartime substitute. When the bridesmaids arrived at the church, all six were so loaded with poinsettias they looked like walking bushes, and had to be trimmed down in a hurry. Nan reports proudly that this time Charles' knees didn't shake one bit.

With no time for a honeymoon, the young Stones went right to Columbus and the one-room apartment Charles had already rented, at $45 a month. He was training flight engineers at the air base near town, and got home almost every night for dinner. The first meal Nan fixed was fried chicken. She says, "At the butcher's, I couldn't tell one kind of meat from another, and I hated to sound ignorant, so I asked for chicken." She'd never cooked one before, but it turned out fine.

During that year in Columbus, Nan worked mornings as a volunteer Nurses' Aide, and spent most of her afternoons playing bridge with officers' wives. She explains half apologetically, "Whenever the wife of a major or colonel in Charlie's outfit invited me to play bridge, I thought I'd better accept." The most serious quarrel they ever had came as a result. Nan got home very late from one of the colonel's-lady games and found Charles sitting on the steps locked out and livid-mad. Telling about it now, Nan adds cheerfully, "Of course, he'd already been locked out several times before, and maybe he'd reached the end of his patience." When Charles started to bawl her out, Nan made a haughty exit and went to the little park across the street, where she walked in circles for an hour, thinking, "This is the end. I'll get a divorce." When she got back to the apartment, Charles was sitting there in the dark, still furious. Nan went into the clothes closet and wept. She says it's hard for either of them to apologize, but somehow they came to it. Oddly enough, the thing she seems to admire most in Charles is that "he knows when to be firm with me. If a man were too meek, I'm the kind who would walk all over him."

At the end of 1944, the Stones were transferred to Denver. By then, Charles was a first lieutenant, working on ground maintenance of B-17's. Nan had a secretarial job at the Colorado Woman's College, and with her $35 salary and Charles' pay, they were saving at least $100 a month. The one drawback was that Nan was always tired and touchy by the time she came home to cook dinner, and she and Charles wrangled a lot. She thinks these quarrels were entirely her fault, and says she doesn't understand how wives with full-time office jobs manage to run a house and get meals. Things got much better the last few months of their Denver stay, when the Stones managed to sublet a small house just outside the city, worth every cent of the rent hike from $45 to $65. After two years in tiny makeshift apartments, the house seemed so wonderful that Nan couldn't even feel tired and snappish when she came back to it after work. As Charles' Army-discharge date came closer, they talked a lot about the years-from-now future. Both agreed they didn't want what Nan calls "a glib society life." They thought Denver or some near part of the West would be an ideal place to settle someday. Both decided they wanted three children. Nan remembers that one night Charles said, "By the time our kids go to Sunday school, I hope they'll be taught more about all kinds of religion, and told the reasons behind different faiths and rituals—Presbyterian, Jewish, Quaker, Catholic, any kind. Make the kids understand that even if people worship in different ways, they're all just as good."

Soon after his promotion to captain, in November of 1945, Charles got terminal leave, and the Stones went east to visit their families. In February of 1946, just after his final discharge, Charles started back at Lehigh. He lived at the Chi Psi house, spent his spare time apartment hunting, and his week ends at Rye, where Nan was staying with her parents. Both he and Nan wanted terribly to be settled someplace before the baby came. When Charles phoned her to Flavor-fresh compliments for yesterday's corned beef!

I laughed up my sleeve when persnickety Tim raved about my cooking. He never dreamed he was eating leftovers . . . they were so delicious, flavor-saved with Cut-Rite!

I keep him fooled by wrapping everything in extra-heavy Cut-Rite the minute I clear the table. Those few celery stalks, extra meat, left-over limas don't get a chance to lose their flavor. Cut-Rite protects fresh food goodness, keeps out flavor-robbing air!

Waxed-through Cut-Rite will send your reputation as a cook sky-high! Try my recipe for Corned Beef Rarebit as a starter. It's easy to be a good Cut-Rite cook!

THE BOX WITH THE FAMOUS CUTTING EDGE . . .

CORNED BEEF RAREBIT Flavor-saved by Cut-Rite

4 tablespoons butter or margarine
4 tablespoons flour
½ teaspoon salt
Few grains pepper
2 cups milk
1 cup grated American cheddar cheese
1 teaspoon prepared mustard
1 cup chopped corned beef

Melt butter or margarine; blend in flour, salt and pepper; gradually add milk. Cook over boiling water, stirring constantly, until thickened. Cook 5 minutes, stirring occasionally. Add cheese; cook until melted. Add mustard and corned beef that has been flavor-saved by Cut-Rite. Heat and serve on toast. Serves 4.

come down on the next train to look at the farmhouse, it seemed their only chance.

They moved into it in July, with their hastily assembled furniture piled on a borrowed truck. A fraternity brother who saw their entry into Bethlehem commented, "You look like the Grapes of Wrath." The house was still a scramble of boxes and barrels when, on August 11, Nan went to the hospital at Portchester, near Rye, to have her baby. The only afterbirth complication is that Nan says indignantly her feet have grown a full size longer since she had Chip, and now she can't wear her best alligator pumps.

Button-nosed Chip was six weeks old when he and his mother came home to the place that still didn't seem like home. Nan says that for the first few hectic days after her return, she kept thinking, "Oh, what's the use?" After that, things began to straighten out. Charles found a good pediatrician in Bethlehem, and the baby thrived. Nan made billowy organdy curtains for the four upstairs rooms, the back bedroom downstairs, and for the little ex-parlor to the right of the large, waste-space hall. If the house ever had the charm that comes from age, the previous owners had carefully removed all traces, by yanking up wide old floor boards, putting in "varnished yaller" hardwood floors and staircase, and covering the lower half of the kitchen walls in imitation black-and-white tiling. Nan wants to yank off the fake tiles and paint the kitchen a deep Dutc blue. Charles is making a long trestle tabl for eating, rubbing the knotty-pine woo with linseed oil.

Even if they had the money to do a drasti remodeling job, there wouldn't be muc sense in it. Charles expects to finish at L high by June of 1948, as does George, an they'll sell the house then. Allowing for thudding drop in real-estate prices, Charl still hopes to get at least $4000, to pay ba the sum he borrowed from his mother to he finance the pu chase. After he a George get their d grees, they'd bo like jobs as consul ant engineers production contr with "Any go medium-sized co pany." Both a making a steady average; their j hopes are hard just wishful thin ing.

And some nig five or ten ye from now, when t G. Stones and t C. Stones get gether, they'll pr ably have a quar of "Do you reme ber?" . . . " you remember the time the mouse got el trocuted under the stove and the transform blew out and we talked Jane into letting get a cat, and then she came tearing dow stairs howling, 'Satan's sleeping on my b with his dirty whiskers'?"

They'll have fun remembering. As for way they feel right now, maybe Char summed it up when he said, "All I can h for Chip is that he'll have as good a life ours. How could he want a better one?"

"I Had Cancer—

LETTERS TO JOAN

attractive woman to keep herself for the man who is to be her husband and the father of her children, and these are qualities an intelligent man wants in his wife and the mother of his children.

I'll never forget the remark of a quite well-known man I once knew who, though married, was in love with an extremely attractive girl, much younger than himself. He refused to consummate the affair, however, on the ground that she was a virgin, though she was more than willing to make the sacrifice.

He said to me, "I love ——, but I have no intention of breaking up my home. I know that she will want to marry someday, and a man who is anything will want to feel that he doesn't have to watch his wife all the time."

And now what does a girl gain today by ceasing to be a virgin? Experience, first of all. She knows "what it is all about." I am not going to tell you, as some people would, that an appetite for sex would be created which would probably end in promiscuity. I don't think that necessarily follows. But I consider sex experience at best a rather dubious asset for a young, unmarried girl.

Second, a subtle barrier is removed; a girl becomes more attractive to a certain type of man and might be more sought after. You must always remember, however, that the men who would pursue you because you were known to be pregnable will also pursue any other female, not too unattractive, who possesses a similar attraction.

Third, she will no longer be sexually frustrated—and how the wolves you will encounter will worry about you on that score, and long to help you out! Alas, however, wolves are not very dependable, even in matters of this kind, for they are ever off to new hunting grounds. A girl without a man she can really call her own is then faced with the alternative of either becoming promiscuous, which everyone agrees is a tragic thing, or being sexually frustrated all over again.

I honestly cannot think of any more ar ments to justify girls like you in ceasing be virgins, at least as long as you have ho of making good marriages. Perhaps you going to retort that virtuous, fine wom lose their men to designing and none-t spotless characters. That happens. But one case like that I could cite you doz where the opposite has been true.

And now I am going to be personal a sentimental—Joan, you will just have to give me. A couple of months ago, when and I dined at the Brevoort in New Yo you may not have been aware, as I was, t the famous singer at the next table k turning his head to look at you. There w girls and women in the room far m glamorous, sophisticated and strikin dressed, but I knew why you caught his tention, and I was proud to be your moth For you looked just as every right-min person loves to see a young girl look—sw fresh, unspoiled, spiritually immaculate, you'll pardon a slightly florid touch. To m of sensibility there is no more appeal quality. A woman does not lose it if she gi herself in love to a man who loves her. H she doesn't keep it long after she starts t ting around, playing the game of sex a taking the knocks that come in consequen That, believe me, is the reason why parents hope you will keep your virginity men who will love and cherish and want marry you—because we know that pain a disillusionment so often accompany a other course.

Goodness, what a long letter! Long enou without starting on the question of bal without legal fathers, so I'll leave that another time. Do let me have all the b talk, Joan, from the ideas on virginity I have lots more where these came from—r life cases too. Just dare me to trot them o

Are you in the know?

How would you refuse a date?

- ☐ Brush him off
- ☐ Invent an excuse
- ☐ Say you'll be busy

Ever trip yourself up on your own tall story, after turning down a bid? When refusing a date no fancy excuses needed. Just say you'll be busy; then you're in the clear. Never "no" a date merely because it's "that" time of the month. Keep going —comfortably— with Kotex, and the lasting softness Kotex gives you. It's softness that stays faithfully yours — for Kotex is the sanitary napkin made to stay soft while you wear it. So date away, any day, in comfort!

Does this make sense on certain days?

- ☐ Yes
- ☐ No
- ☐ Could be

Gals in-the-know take certain days in stride, but —"fierce fun" doesn't make sense. Why jolt your innards? (There's always the merry-go-round!) Choosing milder amusements is playing safe. Like choosing Kotex. You see, you get extra protection from that exclusive safety center of Kotex. And that comfortable Kotex Wonderform Belt lets you bend freely because it's elastic—snug-fitting—non-binding. For confidence that's positively supersonic, try Kotex and Kotex Belts!

Can Tiny Tess look taller if she—

- ☐ Makes like a zebra
- ☐ Wears vertical lines
- ☐ Prefers peplums

Tired of being "a cute trick"? Wee widgets who'd like to come up in the world should wear clothes that add height. Stripes are smart, but shy away from the zebra type (shown here). Vertical lines make you look taller. Don't give a second thought to the "lines" that plague you on problem days. Choose Kotex . . . for those special flat pressed ends of Kotex prevent revealing outlines. And remember, only Kotex comes in 3 sizes for different girls, different days!

ANGELA WAS EIGHTEEN

He hadn't said. He was so casual about things like that.

Resolutely she put this fear from her. It was just too gruesome to contemplate.

Back in front of her dressing table, she ran her comb through waves of honey-colored hair. That last permanent had been super. And she was quite pleased with the way her eyes shone. Not even her mother could say they looked tired today.

She slipped into an old pink cotton from last year, and ran downstairs, ready to work.

"Happy birthday, dear!"

Her mother was sweet, Angela thought impulsively, and resolved determinedly that she wouldn't allow herself to be annoyed by a single thing her mother did or said all day—no matter what.

She had difficulty holding on to this resolution an hour later, when her mother kept pressing her as to whether Bill would be there for lunch. She didn't know! Heavens! She wished she did. It made her quite nervous not to know. Couldn't her mother see this?

And not satisfied with merely wondering about lunch, her mother now began implying that there was something lacking in a person who wasn't specific about time of arrival, and so forth.

Parents were so critical of dates. It was terribly upsetting, when you needed so to be sure. They were so illogical, always filling you with doubts and fears, and then wondering why you weren't more sure of yourself, "with all your advantages."

Like the time when she had been in despair about ever getting married, with nobody but the silliest, most juvenile boys around; and then when she had found Russell, with his brilliant, mature mind, and had begun to think thrillingly that perhaps he was the one, and then her mother saying in that casual, speculative way, "My, but he's round-shouldered."

As though you could think of anything else for a long time. How could parents slap down your sense of security that way? Didn't they realize what it did to your marks at school? How could you care about such things as math and French, when you were so desperately unhappy and anxious about everything that really mattered in life? After all, you had to have some idea where you were going in life, to give some point to the math and the French.

To quiet her mother now, she said that she was sure there would be a letter from Bill in the morning mail, saying when he would come.

But she wasn't sure! Not at all! She wished desperately she were back at college, where the girls would understand. Bill's type were never particular about little things, like meeting you at stations, and being specific about times of meeting, or anything like that. They just couldn't be, with so much on their minds. In fact, the girls all agreed that that strong, masculine type believed in "treating girls rough." You

GINGIVITIS

A Wicked Enemy of Firm Gums and Handsome Teeth!

4 OUT OF 5 May Be Victims—Even Young Folks . . .

Handsome, healthy teeth need firm gums. So if your gums are tender or bleed even a tiny bit when you brush your teeth—watch out!

These are often some of the first signs of Gingivitis—a mild gum inflammation BUT if prompt attention isn't paid—it often leads to Pyorrhea with its soft, receding gums and loosening teeth, which only your dentist can help. See him every 3 months.

Then at home be sure to do this. Massage your gums and brush your teeth twice daily with Forhan's Toothpaste.

Helps Gums Be Firmer—Teeth Naturally Bright

Forhan's Toothpaste—that remarkable formula of Dr. R. J. Forhan—is the first and original toothpaste for BOTH massaging gums to be firmer—better able to ward off infection—and for polishing teeth to their natural brilliant lustre. Forhan's is made especially for this.

Even after the first trial with Forhan's and massage—notice how stimulated your gums feel—how your teeth fairly gleam with radiant cleanliness. Used and recommended for years by many Dentists—yet Forhan's costs no more than ordinary toothpastes.

had to expect it—but they were so darling, you didn't mind.

Very few parents understood this, but all the girls did. You just couldn't pin that important type down too much. She never said this to her mother, because she knew her mother would just flare up and say, "Then I'd let him go." Or some such preposterously silly thing as that.

She had written Bill three times, asking him to be sure to let her know what time he would arrive, so they could meet him at the station (at least that made a good excuse to make him name a time); and each time she had enclosed a timetable, but with no results.

There were times—and this was one of them, right now, as she polished silver—when she wished that Bill had just the tiniest bit of Russell's preciseness about meetings; not to the split second, of course, the way Russell was so fussy, but anyhow within the hour.

But at least she was much older and wiser about such things than she had been a year ago. Heavens, it seemed many years ago when she had been so naïve as to think you could have everything in one man. You just couldn't!

Take the matter of letters, for instance. Russell's letters had been masterpieces. His letters at school last fall would always be an exquisite memory. Each one had been a poem, breathing passion and tenderness. The girls had been crazy about them. Whereas Bill's letters were mostly of athletic events. All very thrilling, but she always skimmed through on the first reading, the way you did on reading tests for speed, her eyes peeled for the important parts. Sometimes he could read to the girls.

Here her mother's voice broke in goodnaturedly. "For heaven's sake, child, you've been polishing that same piece for ten minutes."

Angela laughed and seized another candlestick, bringing herself back firmly to the moment; because, after all, she wouldn't go back to that time of Russell's letters, for that would mean going back to Russell—no, not for anything in the world!

She still thought poetry important. And at least Bill didn't poke fun at it the way Harold did. He just didn't know about it.

Sometime after they were married, on winter's evening, they would sit by a dream fire in their modernistic living room (she h seen just the right furniture in Pollit's wi dow) and she would take up a book of poetr very masculine poetry, and read some alou and he couldn't help but come under i spell.

Just then she heard her mother's footste approaching, and she quickly seized anoth candlestick, but did not interrupt h thoughts.

Something told her not to try the poet on Bill until after they were safely marrie and that wouldn't be for some time. H would have to finish college and get a job.

But she didn't mind waiting. In fact, sh had moments of anxious wondering if an thing in marriage could be as exciting as th breathless high moment each day when th mail was due. The sharp plunge to th depths when there was no letter, but soo dispelled, because already it was time to loo forward to the high moment of the next da That utterly blissful feeling when the fami iar writing fairly jumped at you from out all the inconsequential mail received eac day by your parents.

Her mother's attitude toward mail d pressed her. She couldn't bear to think sh would ever be like that. And yet she sup posed marriage could do that to you. Wh her mother would let hours go by, after ma time, without even bothering to look in th mailbox. How horrible not to care abou letters!

Just then the postman's whistle made he start nervously. She ran to the door an seized the mail, riffling through it with tren bling fingers. She couldn't say she was ex actly disappointed to find no letter from Bil because she hadn't really expected it. It wa just her mother who had made her even sa that one might come.

Her mother hung anxiously over the bar ister now. "Well is it there?"

"No!" Angela's voice rose. "But don say a word not one word."

It was some relief that her mother turned and went upstairs, but her very back wa eloquent.

Angela darted back to the silver an seized the coffeepot, as the largest article sh could attack. A large tear fell on the M, the middle letter of her mother's monogram, and she brushed it angrily away.

How could her mother be so concerned about a silly little lunch when the horrible fear was growing in her that he might not get there for the buffet supper? She wished violently that she had not planned the supper, because then it wouldn't have made any difference what time Bill came. Well, all she knew now was that if he didn't come soon, or telephone, or something, she would be positively haggard by the time he arrived, her mother making such an issue of the whole thing, and all.

Luchtime came and went. Her mother didn't cook the mock-chicken business she'd mixed up, but finally they sat down in the breakfast nook with sandwiches and milk.

Her mother chatted foolishly about whether to plant zinnias or asters in that back flower bed. And as though she actually cared! But at least Angela was grateful that she stayed off the subject; and then suddenly, well—she guessed her mother just couldn't help being the way she was—she said the worst possible thing. And in that casual, speculative way Angela dreaded:

"Darling, I was just wondering—does Bill know it's your birthday?"

"Of course!" Angela said violently. She jumped up from the table and said abruptly, "What do you want me to do next?"

"Well, the good dessert plates should be washed," her mother said. "They get so grimy when they're not used. And I want to start the ham now."

Angela climbed on the kitchen stool and took down the dishes from the top pantry shelf, and started washing them.

How ghastly! For her mother to have said that. That was one thing she hadn't thought of. True, Bill wasn't the type to inquire about birthdays, the way Russell had, without a bit of prompting. But she had taken care of that.

Some time ago she had just told him when her birthday was. You had to with that type. And Bill had taken out a little notebook, and written in the date, April 17, saying, "I mustn't forget that."

When she had invited him for today, she had underscored April 17, just to remind him.

And he had written saying sure he would come and signed it with "Until the Big Day, all love, Bill."

Surely that was what he meant. Or did he?

FOR one awful moment she wished that it were Russell the day had been planned around, and not Bill. His very obviousness about everything, which had gotten boring, looked now pretty awfully desirable, in the face of this gnawing uncertainty. But of course she didn't mean that.

She had only to conjure up that dreadful picture of Russell on the ski week end in the Christmas holidays. His strained, white face as he had mulishly refused to put on "the things," as he called them. The way he had looked so scared right there before all the girls! She had never been so mortified. And everybody else skiing happily all day in couples. All that dreadful day she had struggled so to hang on to the illusion of love because it would be so ghastly not to be in love, not to have anybody.

As though there were such a thing as mental telepathy, her mother appeared in the doorway, and in that voice so falsely casual said, "I was just wondering; whatever happened between you and Russell?"

"Oh—several things." Angela was cautious. "You know that ski week end. Well—he accepted, all agog, and then, up there, I found he'd never been on skis."

Her mother laughed and said, "But I wouldn't think, just because a boy couldn't ski —— He was so lovely to you!"

"Well—there were other things." Angela stopped.

She couldn't tell her mother about that evening when they had followed the crowd to the hotel to dance, and the headwaiter had quite unmistakably looked Russell over, then said, "Sorry, all tables reserved." And Russell had turned meekly away and led her to a small room where the tantalizing strains of the orchestra had been barely audible. That had been the end! Possible, a man who couldn't ski, but never a man who quailed visibly before headwaiters. That was terribly important. All the girls thought so, but parents didn't understand things like that.

Anyway, what was all this talk about Russell, when she had Bill now? Her mother wasn't trying to make hateful comparisons—or was she?

Of course she was! Angela swung her mind violently to the picture of Bill. She deliberately lived over the proud moments of the Sports Carnival, and so recovered her happy sense of anticipation.

Now that her mother was no longer pressing about the lunch, and with three whole hours before the supper, any minute of which Bill might arrive, her spirits once more soared.

At that moment, Harold came banging into the house from baseball practice, and when he saw her in the same old dress, arranging flowers, he shrilled, "What's the matter? Hasn't that guy come yet?"

It was a very discordant note, just when she had succeeded in getting back her cheerfulness.

It made her look at the clock, which she had determined not to do. It was after four. She began calculating. The trains ran only once an hour on Saturday afternoons. They arrived on the hour. This meant there were only two trains now that he could be on, if he were to get here for the supper at seven.

That horrid little fear clutched at her again, but she struck it down. She wouldn't be able to meet the six-o'clock, what with dressing, and the last-minute preparations and all. The five-o'clock was the only one she could meet.

She turned to her mother. "I'm going to meet the five-o'clock. I'm sure he'll be on it," she said firmly.

And just saying it that way made her suddenly sure. Of course! She could see his grinning face emerging from the train now, and she would forget to scold him for not letting her know. And everything would be so wonderful and she would be so proud tonight.

Her mother said, "O.K., everything's coming fine. We have plenty of time."

Even with all she had on her mind, she reflected for a moment on why her mother always said things like that so calmly, a few hours before a party, when the last hour was always such chaos, with her mother going completely to pieces. She always got so excited and it was so unnecessary and foolish, because everything was always all right and everything did always get done on time, but her mother was like that. She supposed she couldn't help it.

She didn't feel guilty running out now, because she'd be back by the crucial hour and could pitch in, and even Bill could be pressed into service. She ran upstairs and put on her blue gabardine suit, and on her way through the hall seized a bright flower from a bowl, and fastened it in her hair.

The five-o'clock pulled in, and let off a few stragglers, and Angela scanned each one with desperate hope, but Bill was not among them. She watched the heartless train pull out and go on its uncaring way. For five minutes she sat very still. A nightmarish thought had so turned her stomach upside down that she thought she was going to be sick.

Suppose he didn't come at all! She remembered now that some girl had told her she had seen Bill at a dance with another girl—and pretty attentive. She had asked him about it, and he had laughed it off—said it was a girl from home, visiting her brother there. He'd known her all his life. And it was after that he had written that for the first time in his life he couldn't pass a jeweler's window without stopping to look at diamonds. So she had completely dismissed it. But now—she wondered. Just being a girl from home didn't mean she couldn't mean anything to him.

At this moment the telephone rang harply. Angela flew to it, her trembling ingers seizing the instrument.

"Hello!"

The voice of the operator on the other end—then a pause.

"It's long distance"—her voice rose—'it's Bill!"

The relief was so intense, she could scarcely control her voice. Obviously he wouldn't be in time for the supper. He'd probably been held up somewhere. But he would be coming. It wasn't the end! She didn't care about anything else. She didn't even mind her mother and Harold standing so tense and practically on top of her, straining to hear.

Then the dear, familiar voice. "Angela!" And the so unnecessary, "This is Bill." So close were her mother and Harold that they could hear him say, "Gosh, I'm sorry, but I can't make it tonight. Some other time."

"But, Bill"—Angela's voice was a thin squeak—"today is—oh, don't you remember?"

"Remember what?" Bill's voice was cheerful.

"Never mind," Angela managed. "Good by."

So it was the end! The end of everything! The end of her world! Angela turned blindly to the wall, burying her head in her arms, and burst into a storm of uncontrollable weeping.

HER mother came and gathered her into her arms and held her close for several minutes without speaking. Then she said quietly, "You'll have to stop now, Angela. It's time to get dressed. You have to go on with the party, you know."

"I can't! I simply can't! I can't!"

"Darling, we have to do lots of things in his life that we simply can't. This is one of them."

She did understand. A wave of fierce love for her mother swept over her. She wasn't trying to make light of it. She was just telling her what Angela knew in her heart. She would have to go on. Even in the midst of this tragedy—and surely nothing in her whole life could ever be worse than this Angela remembered those lines about "the show must go on." She stopped crying and tried to force her mind to practical considerations.

"But I simply can't go to the dance without a partner."

Harold slipped quickly into the next room.

Her mother said faintly, "You wouldn't—you wouldn't want to call Russell?"

Russell! Suddenly Angela felt that Russell had the most desirable quality that any man could possibly have. Dependability! And had he not said, that last time, rather pitifully, "I will wait for you. Any time, no matter when, that you ever want me back, I'll be waiting. Just call me!"?

Angela picked up the receiver and put in the call. Russell lived only ten miles away. If he hurried, he could be there even for the supper.

His mother answered and rather coldly, Angela thought, said that Russell was in the Army now, and was stationed out in California. That was that!

"You'll just have to take Harold," her mother said firmly.

"Not Harold," Angela wailed. Why, the girls had practically wheeled him in his perambulator. "I can't. Everybody'd die!" But even as she said it, she knew there was no other answer.

The supper went off better than she could possibly have hoped. There were no raised eyebrows or sly questions. She had said simply that at the last minute Bill couldn't come. And the girls, seeing her eyes, had known instantly, and rallied to her support They were sweet! After all, it was wonderful having such loyal friends. And the boys, understanding, closed in, too, to make her feel important and admired.

Her heart was broken, but it was all warming.

At two A.M., Angela's mother took two more aspirins, but knew they would do no good, until at least Angela was at home and in bed. Then she would go into her room and put her arms around her and, now that it was all over, let her give way to the tears she had so bravely held back all evening. The country-club dances were always over at one-thirty, so they should be home any minute now.

Sure enough, she heard the car just then. She heard Angela's feet come running up the steps, and the front door open. Then her feet on the stairs, and—surely she was dreaming, for Angela was singing, lightly, happily, as she came upstairs.

At her mother's door, Angela paused d whispered, "Awake?" She thought heard her mother answer, so she went in burst out, "Oh, mother, you'd never g I had the most marvelous time! Use it alone on meats, on fish, on salads! Mix it with your preferred mayonnaise! Fine in sandwich-fillings, too. Durkee's, made of a combination of rare spices, has a rich, golden color that attracts the eye—and a keen, tempting flavor that perks up the appetite!
DRESS IT UP WITH DURKEE'S DRESSING

BETTER MEALS —AND HOW!

by Virginia Coates

Good for summer eating—a plate of light golden-brown, hot biscuits . . . specially good and specially tasty when you use margarine in your favorite recipe. Just add a little extra if you like a rich dough. Then for that delicate golden crust, brush your biscuits lightly with melted margarine before popping them into the oven.

• • •

A wonderful spread for your hot biscuits is plenty of rich, country-fresh, Durkee's Margarine. No need to count pennies here—it's economical and nutritious with its standard 15,000 units of Vitamin A and so delicious!

• • •

Looking for a de luxe potato salad? Whether you're planning that Sunday picnic, or dining at home, here's a recipe you'll enjoy. It's all in the seasoning you use . . . Durkee's Dressing with its secret blend of rare spices and that scant ½ teaspoon of Durkee's Celery Seed—a choice combination for a flavorful potato salad.

Potato Salad

6 large potatoes
6 tsp. Durkee's Dressing
2 dill pickles, finely chopped
1 tsp. Durkee's Celery Seed
6 tsp. mayonnaise
2 stalks celery, diced
2 large apples, diced (optional)
3 tbsp. vinegar

Cook potatoes in boiling salted water until tender. While still warm, dice. Blend mayonnaise with Durkee's Dressing and mix with warm potatoes. Chill well and add rest of ingredients. Blend thoroughly. Serves 6 or 8. Leftover carrots and peas make an attractive garnish on the potato salad.

• • •

Add color to your summer meal with a platter of sliced, cold chicken, ham and a deviled egg garnish. Add flavor and pep with a bottle of Durkee's Dressing. It's spicy and mellow—just right to "pick up" the flavor of cold meat and, when used in deviled eggs, turns 'em into a chef's dish.

• • •

For a distinctive flavor in your summer salads, use Durkee's Celery Seed. It's a little touch that gives a "lift" to any salad, raw or cooked, and it's a little touch that accentuates the flavor of other ingredients.

"There's one thing I'll say for Fran—"

The truth is, Mrs. Charles Nulton of Rochester, New York, said a lot of things (nice things!) about her hostess.

The other guests began it.

"She's wonderful!" "Her home is lovely...such intangible charm..

That's where Mrs. Nulton interrupted. And here, quoted from her letter to us, is exactly what she said:

"Charm, yes, darlings...but not at all 'intangible.' Just feel these sheets, for instance...Pequots, of course!"

Whereupon the gals got a fine spontaneous lecture on Pequots... their firm, close-woven texture... their soft, linen-like look... their super-smoothness. Says Mrs. Nulton:

"The thing about Fran, I pointed out, is that she has fastidious taste and good sense, too. I'm a long-time Pequot user myself, and you may quote me any time, that for luxury-on-a-budget, Pequots simply can't be beat!"

So we're quoting Mrs. Nulton, with pride, as we've quoted dozens of other happy housewives who have praised the very tangible charms of smooth, muslin Pequot Sheets.

You, too, will like Pequots' snowy whiteness, the way they wear and wear. Their double-tape selvages, and their handy projecting size tabs. When you need sheets, get Pequots—so luxurious-looking, so practical, they're America's most popular sheets!

PROUD BEAUTIES

Our new Workshop families of matched cooking pans in various sizes are really beauties, and we're proud of them. We have one set in shining aluminum, another in stainless steel, still another with copper bottoms. All of them have straight sides and flat bottoms, for good heat distribution, and a gently curved union between bottom and sides, which makes them easy to clean. Each member of the family, be it saucepan, skillet or roaster, has its own tight-fitting cover. (That shortens cooking time, saves fuel, prevents steam's escaping.) Covers are dome-shaped, to increase the pans' capacity, help make them self-basting. They're lightweight, yet strong enough to bear up undented under the normal amount of bumping and dropping. Handles are heat-resistant, and some have rings so pans may be hung where they're easy to reach. How thrilled any June bride would be with such an ensemble for the cupboards of her brand-new kitchen! This year's brides are lucky, for once again there are excellent irons, toasters, and such, and many new versions of classic kitchen equipment, the kind of gifts that any prospective housewife loves to receive.

PROTECTIVE PAILS

Give the old familiar galvanized pail a new insulated plastic overcoat, and it takes a new and useful lease on life! This covering, designed to fit the standard 10-quart pail, converts it by means of an inch-deep glass-fiber insulation into an excellent tote bucket for frozen foods, ice cubes, milk or cold drinks on their way to a picnic. Another version of the pail protector is designed to be used inside the pail. Either way, it keeps contents cool for hours, provides an extra cubic foot of temporary food-storage space in your kitchen.

THE BANDBOX LOOK

To help keep you spick-and-sp there's now a nice little kit, complete compact, containing 6 numbered bot with removers for every conceivable k of spot and stain, together with a h ful booklet directing which bottle to for what, and how to attack everyth from grass stains to peach juice.

BLACK WASHABLES

Summer in New York means thin black or navy, washable if possible, as it does in most large cities. Not for us, alas, the whites and pastels of resorts. Heretofore our black batistes, our navy piqués that looked so smart and crisp when we bought them in May, often seemed gray with age by midsummer, for they were always a great laundry problem. No matter how carefully they were done, they seemed to collect a white powdery substance that showed up badly when they were dried and ironed. This summer, however, every girl in the Workshop is joyous, because we feel we've licked the "lint on black" problem. Detergents, the soapless kind, did it. We have found that when black washables are laundered with a good soapless detergent, no traces of that soapy film are left to dull and gray the fabric. We've washed our dresses by hand and in the machine, had the same good luck with both methods. Read the directions on the detergent you use carefully; some are recommended for cottons, some especially for rayons. These latter are the thing for your black underwear. You must still be careful to use a fine-grain starch, however, if your dark dress needs starching.

DUCK'S BACK

Speaking of summertime laundering, do you know about the home treatment for making washable clothes stain-resistant and waterproof? Technically, this new product is a stable wax emulsion, to be added to the very last rinse water. It may be used with or without starch. We've found it especially good for children's clothes, for our aprons and shower curtains. It makes such clothes easier to launder because dirt and stains remain on the surface, don't get ground down into the fabric.

STOCKING "MIXER"

Perhaps you already have one of the handy little 1 or 2 cup mixers, in which you shake up gravy or salad dressing or milk shakes to blended smoothness. Along comes a big sister to that now, designed for washing stockings, gloves, hankies or white collar and cuffs. It looks almost like a cocktail shaker, except that it's made in colorful plastics. A pinch of soap flakes, water, your stockings, the cover screwed on tightly, a good shaking to swirl the suds through—that's the way it works. Good for white-collar-girls' nightly laundry.

This year, you may deal out sudden death to garden bugs and blight on a large scale, with a new yard-long dust gun that takes 2 full pounds at a time of a new multipurpose insecticide, said to be effective against 27 common insects and plant diseases.

IF THE POWER FAILS

If lightning strikes, or a tree falls down in a windstorm, and your freezer is suddenly without electric power, here's what to do—or rather, what not to do. Don't open your freezer; opening it will let in warm air, which will hasten thawing. Freezers well filled with food will stay cold longer than those with sparse contents; and under usual conditions, the power will stay off only a few hours. However, if you think it's likely to remain off more than 24 hours, it may be a good idea to put in dry ice, which you can get from ice-cream-manufacturing plants. One community kept the food in its freezers solidly frozen for 36 hours, during a power shutoff there, by simply putting the freezers "to bed": snuggling them in quantities of blankets without opening them. . . . A freezer alarm, to warn you if the power does go off when you're not looking, is certainly a good investment.

SUMMER FIRE

It's pleasant to dine by candlelight, of course, especially in the summer dusk, but do be sure that evening's breezes, springing up suddenly, can't blow your sheer curtains near the candle flames—or, for that matter, over ash trays. Keep a constant check on lamp and appliance cords, watching for wear or breaks. Many people who worry about fire hazards in wintertime somehow relax their efforts in the summer, and they shouldn't. A fire starts in an American home every two minutes, on an average, all year round. . . . Every home should own good fire extinguishers, approved by the Underwriters' Laboratories, not to depend upon, of course, or to give a false sense of security, but "just in case." One new one is designed for home use in kitchens, since it employs carbon dioxide, which is recommended by fire-protection experts for flammable liquids, grease or electrical fires. It is easily portable (weighs only 2½ pounds,) and easy to use—a simple matter of pulling a trigger. Carbon dioxide does not harm electrical equipment, or food. It is really the "soda pop" gas found in colas and ginger ales.

UP IN THE AIR

When most women want to get up in their world, they use a rickety chair or even worse, says the National Safety Council. That's one reason why more accidents happen in the home than anywhere else. But it is, or has been, a lot of trouble to get a heavy ladder from the storeroom. Perhaps a new aluminum stepladder, designed with women's needs in mind, will help to make home safer. It weighs less than two pounds per foot of height, so it's easy to tote from attic to cellar if need be, yet each step is stress-engineered to take a 500-pound working load, in spite of the ladder's lightness.

executive director, Hollis D. Immick, ained construction man, worked with lic housing, surveying the possibilities of e help, of Federal facilities.

he veterans themselves pitched in. The rans' center started a "share the home" paign, rooting out spare rooms and ching up unused space with needy veter-ans. A group of technical students formed a co-operative and agreed to work on one an-other's houses. The housing chairman of the American Veterans' Committee, A. G. Gross-man, conducted a detailed survey of the city's –veterans and private citizens alike— needs, and the Meriden Journal published it in full as a public service.

MERIDEN tried. A year and a half later—by the end of 1946—Meriden had found homes for 268 veterans: public housing—hous-ing with Federal, state or city support—found homes for 229 "hardship cases"—veterans with families living in inadequate places; the "share the home" campaign turned up 12 rooms; private enterprise built 26 houses; the Meriden Veterans' Mutual Home Building Association completed one house.

We could wish that Meriden had done more. We could wish that inroads on perma-nent housing had been made. Meriden sim-ply solved its first and worst wave of emer-gency housing; it has yet to solve its basic problem. Its plans show few signs that it will this year or even next.

But because it did solve its emergency housing problem and because few cities and towns have even managed to do that much, and because, now, the second wave of emer-gency needs is rolling up, it is worth while studying what Meriden has accomplished. In trying, Meriden has done more than many communities.

New York City's Housing Authority ad-mitted at the end of 1946 that it had ac-counted for 10,000 families, while estimates of homeless veterans alone ran as high as 264,500. Jacksonville, Florida, surveys show that although the city added 3520 housing

Many cities have emptied and torn down these wartime-emergency housing; Meriden reinforced and remodeled its into a veterans' village. It's run by the city housing authority, managed by a former state senator.

The veterans' own answer to the housing problem: homes built through pooled money, skills and labor. It's made of cinder block, cost $6500, has four large rooms and bath on the first floor. Twenty-five are planned.

units last year, some 5217 are still needed. In Portland, Oregon, although the housing situation is described as critical, scores of units were torn down at the Vanport Housing project. In other cities, reports circulated that veterans' priorities were being misused, sold, and complaint meetings were held by irate citizens against the erection of quonsets or barracks because of their appearance.

Housing, said The New York Times, is possibly a boring subject to those who have satisfactory homes, but for those who haven't, "including many thousands who lost their place in the housing line by serving their country in wartime," it is a very vital subject indeed.

So, let us look at what Meriden has done, at what it hasn't done, and then perhaps we can see what can be done and what could be done in Meriden, in every town and city and county, everywhere where people are crying for room to get married, to have babies, or just to live and work peacefully.

First, then, MERIDEN ORGANIZED. Through the housing authority and its committees. Through its veterans' centers, supported by the Community Chest. Through its veterans' organizations who declared their needs, took action on their own.

Second, MERIDEN PLANNED. They braced themselves for a five-year emergency (until 1951) and refused to listen to those who said, "The housing situation will solve itself." They pulled together private industry and public facilities.

THIRD, MERIDEN ACTED. By bringing in quonset huts. By using Federal buildings instead of tearing them down. By converting space into living units. By getting state aid, investigating Federal aid.

Families who were broken up were reunited. Men who were about to be evicted were settled in quonsets and barracks where no one could evict them. Hard-pressed couples living with in-laws under crowded conditions or severe emotional strains were granted that luxury of luxuries today: a place of their own.

It was not easy for Meriden. It has r been easy for any town in the United Stat where building has been scanty since the pression, where no private residential buil ing at all took place during the war, where permanent public housing has been done seven years. Meriden, named as the "ide wartime community" by the War Manpow Commission, had to struggle like any oth industrial city to be even a comfortab

BUT to help, Meriden had the support its state, and the state's willingness to a other 15. Eighty veterans took over the huts; took over the combination kitchen-living room, the two small bedrooms apiece, the oil heaters and tin showers, and cheerfully paid the $30 to $32.50 ($2.50 extra for the park surroundings) to the city in rent. The lucky 80 were drawn from the veterans' center registrar, drawn by a committee of three veterans who heard their cases by number to avoid any possibility of personal favoritism.

Most of the 80 celebrated New Year's, 1947, in their new homes. Many of the townspeople said that they thought the park looked even prettier with the new homes in it.

Another 141 veterans, meanwhile, had found homes at Gale Terrace. Gale Terrace was Mr. Immick's baby. In 1943, when Meriden's pulsing war plants had demanded more and more workers, Mr. Immick proposed an emergency Federal housing project. Over protests—Meriden thought then, and still thinks it does not need any help from the Federal Government—the project, housing 163 families, was built. It was built on an expectancy of two years (our hopes were rosy then). Dormitories for single workers (again over protests) were subsequently added. In 1946, Mr. Immick fought and won a battle to reinforce Gale Terrace for another five years for the veterans. In 1947, he saw the dormitories converted into apartments, started the remodeling of the wartime cafeteria and recreation hall into new apartments.

THE quonsets and the barracks were not enough to satisfy Meriden—and its veterans—however. The AVC's comprehensive survey calculated a total of 1750 permanent new living units would be needed by the end of 1947; their total included estimates of new babies to come, the number of marriages that could be expected to take place, balanced against the normal turnover of homes due to death and divorce. The figures were challenged, but no new ones were brought forward to supplant them. Because of the impossibility of even visualizing such a comprehensive building program, the town set a goal of 500 new units, but admitted that—like the man with the baby coming soon—new hardship cases were constantly presenting themselves at the veterans' center; nonveterans had still to make themse heard and felt.

Meanwhile, private industry at first offe little but patience. Charles Newton, hea Meriden's Chamber of Commerce, q tioned 271 other chambers of comme throughout the country, requesting lumb and got back a unanimous answer of "N available."

"When materials are available, costs come down," Mr. Newton said. "When c come down, homes will go up."

Other private industry obstacles we material shortages, high costs, complaints the low rent ($35 to $40 monthly for M den's veterans), the slow payment (stage stage) of G. I. construction loans; the l profit in long-term-mortgage amortizatio

THEN Mr. Immick took another step: t time he combined public housing with p vate interests. He questioned the state as whether their dollar-for-dollar bill would a ply to conversion of private properties in t same financial fashion as it had in the pu chasing of public properties. The state hou ing director, Prentice White, agreed that would. And together, Mr. Tobie and M Immick got Meriden's conversion program a plan which has proved an example fo countless other cities—under way.

All this, mind you, while other cities ha not yet even counted the number of homele veterans among them; had only begun ca vassing the neighborhood for vacant spac for buildings which might be renovated reopened.

The conversion plan began in Octobe 1946. There was considerable paper work. I was set up this way: any owner desiring t allow the city to take over unused space—a attic or a garage, an empty wing—and con vert it into an apartment for a veteran coul lease his space to the city for a period o five years from the date of the state bil (May, 1946) without cost or profit. At the end of the five-year period the city would return the property to the owner complete with improvements, which would thereafter be his. Lenient tax appraisals were also arranged.

From car space to living space. This garage is being converted into apartments for veterans under Meriden's housing authority. City's lease runs five years; remodeling is financed in part by the state.

For the owner it appeared a dream plan—balance some $4000 to $5000 worth of improvements against a five-year wait. For the city it appeared sound. In the five years, rentals on the property could be expected to return the city its half share of the investment. The state, remember, gave its half.

While it does not appear that the plan will always work out quite so smoothly, it promises to work soundly enough. Costs were so high during the winter of 1946–47 that the total cost of renovating one room ran from $1250 to $1400. (New building costs per room ran around $1800.) The maximum rent an average veteran could pay was judged to be $40. It looked as if the city would not break even. A compromise was reached: the city agreed to share part of the giveaway, the owner was asked to invest some money (usually around $1000) of his own.

The procedure was lengthy, but thorough. First, the property was checked by real-estate men to determine whether it was worth improving. Second, architects drew up plans and estimated costs. Third, construction men went to work to determine what they could do and Mr. Immick's office checked the overall. Fourth, the owner was presented with the plan for his agreement. A hitch could come anywhere along the line. Out of 60 applications, some 6 were junked by real-estate men; several more fell through because of costs; owners refused to put in any money in 3 cases; but, by shortly after New Year's, 1947, conversion of some 24 properties into 35 apartments was expected, and another 20 units were still being sought. Critics attacked 12 plans calling for the renovation of attics, but there was no criticism of the first lease signed: the conversion of a sturdy garage into a four-family house; or of the possibility of converting into eight apartments the unused annex of an old but solid hotel. And there was no criticism of the fact that conversion could proceed where new building was delayed.

"Conversions are at once emergency and permanent housing," Mr. Immick said. "They will serve for veterans until 1951—the critical period in housing. Then they will revert to general use. We will use nothing but the best materials and workmanship; we will build living units that are worthy of permanence in our town."

PRIVATE industry thus took its first step into large-scale housing through conversions. Permanent housing began at remodeling.

And thus Meriden ran head on into the problem of how it was going to solve its long-term needs. That this is a very real problem can be seen by a quick glance in any direction. Who, despite the demand, is doing any building? Only those concerns—public, private or industrial—who, because of quick return (as in the case of a drugstore building or other rapid-profit property) or strong need (sometimes the emotional or social need offsets the money involved) or the desire for speed (the market won't wait forever), are willing to risk their money.

Many real-estate men say it is "insane" for anyone to build now; that future returns can't possibly offset the high cost of materials (when you can get them), of labor (when you can get it), of land (when you can find it). Building today is not, they say, an investment; it is a luxury.

Homeowners say they cannot risk investment they have put into their homes and communities by lowering building standards. They suggest that the veteran should be subsidized by bonus. Many resist rental housing, changing of the building codes, new materials which might render their own buildings obsolete.

But many public-minded citizens, religious leaders, social workers say that housing must be thought of in terms other than dollars; that lack of housing is contributing to juvenile delinquency, to the number of divorces, to general instability. "Social needs cannot be considered simply in terms of dollar profit," they say.

Governments are caught in between. The state of Connecticut's $25,000,000 housing bill ran into the state's $50,000,000 bonus bill. It is much easier to give a present than to do something for somebody.

The Federal Government dallies on the Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill, which would subsidize the building of 5,000,000 low-rental housing units for veterans, but which failed to pass the 79th Congress, and is up against stiff opposition in the 80th.

While Meriden is not against rental housing, meanwhile, it is against low-rental housing. The Federal Housing Authority's return to the financial guaranties which supported emergency war housing has brought forth no response in Meriden. The estimated rents ran too high for the veterans; the profits too low for the builders. Only a limited-dividend, 50 to 100 garden-apartment unit could win over Meriden—and there appears little chance that private industry will produce a profitable plan before 1947 runs out.

Mr. Tobie summed up the opposition arguments against Government-subsidized low-rental housing. "Low-rental housing isn't low-cost housing. Why, the Government subsidy has run as high as $20 per family. Why is it necessary for the Government to build apartments for families who cannot afford to pay their own rent? Subsidies on a long-term basis may ruin a city. If it is necessary to subsidize low-income groups—to put a premium on misfortune and possibly indolence, as it were—then let us do it in basic terms, providing basic shelter and food needs. Meanwhile, let us provide housing for those who can pay for it, and allow vacancies to occur for others in the natural course of events."

This policy—tagged the "drip down" policy by veterans—appears now to be fast becoming our national policy. Federal Housing Commissioner Raymond M. Foley has set a goal of 1,000,000 new homes for 1947; nonveterans, business firms and veterans alike will be permitted to build on the theory that any building is better than no building. It is believed that materials will be in good supply this year; it is hoped that because of this, costs will come down. Labor—or the lack of it—is expected to be the stumbling block—some call it the alibi—in 1947. To date, Meriden has had few labor problems—none that compare with those which have threatened building in some places. The AFL building trades smiled cheerfully on the 25 veterans who pooled their technical know-how to build one another $6500 cinder-block homes. Each put in $1000 plus his own technical skill. Their co-operative solution was that of many other groups around the country—and their homes a standing monument to the fact that housing could be done, even in the critical years of 1946 and 1947.

But it is not being done. Throughout the nation, 6,500,000 people are estimated to be without homes of their own. Their problem is no longer just a personal problem; it is a community problem. And only as a community did Meriden find even a partial answer to the crying needs of the crowded and homeless—an emergency which, it appears, will be with us for at least four more years.

HOUSE RULES FOR TWO-IN-ONE LIVING

that one of the great things that make some young wives bored and discontented with keeping house is the aloneness of it. Especially is this true of girls who have worked in offices or stores where there were plenty of other girls to chatter with. Actually they don't dislike housework as work at all; they just miss having a working companion!

The Stones seem to have the perfect situation, with Jane away working until twelve, leaving Nan alone in the mornings when Chip needs special attention. Then in the afternoons, when most girls are loneliest, they are together.

They do big occasional jobs together, too—things like washing the house's myriad windows, turning such a job into fun with "a lot of low slapstick comedy," they say, but getting it done in double-quick time. Nan says her hours of housework are cut to about half what they used to be when she managed alone; at least that's the way it works out on paper. They admit that two girls working together don't concentrate on the job as completely as one girl without another to laugh and talk with might do!

Food costs per person have been considerably lowered. they've discovered with delight, since they've been buying for four. Roasts, hearty stews and casseroles, the kind of thing dinner-for-two cooks are apt to shun because they "hang around forever," are just right now, and of course they're more economical than chops or slices of meat. It's practical now to buy "large economy sizes," to buy potatoes by the hundred pounds, as they do, and tomato juice by the case. Over a period of a month or so, such things can effect a tidy saving.

Money paid out is meticulously posted in the big account book kept in the kitchen, and all expenses for food and household supplies are meticulously halved, down to the last toothpick, on the end-of-the-month judgment day. This is easier to manage than establishing a household kitty, they feel. Whoever is the cook-shopper of the week may buy what she likes and no questions asked, but naturally they consult each other if an unconquerable urge for filet mignon and mushrooms arises! Jane and George pay thirty-five dollars a month rent to Nan and Charlie, the houseowners. This includes their share of coal, electricity bills, wear and tear and breakage. They both feel that they have better food for less money under the two-in-one system. The boys say it's because they privately established a system whereby Charlie would groan with delight about the food on the week when Jane, not his wife, was cook. Next week, George would do the same in Nan's honor. Naturally it inspired the girls, neither of whom is a famous cook by nature or inclination, to vie with each other and make greater efforts to win the plaudits. But Jane and Nan caught their husbands congratulating each other on the success of their scheme, and immediately relaxed in their race to rival Oscar of the Waldorf!

Jane and Nan's weekly rotation plan seems to have helped them avoid one of the irritations experienced by other house sharers. Two women cooking in one kitchen doesn't apparently work out too well, unless the women are near-angels, and angels so seldom have to cook! "The best thing to have and the best way to prepare it" seems to be a very personal and hotly debatable thing in some households, and even inexperienced cooks can become terribly annoyed by over-the-shoulder advice when they're in the throes of creating. Their scheme of "Jane's way completely" for one whole week, Nan's menus and cooking for the next whole week, seems to be an excellent pitfall preventive.

Another potential problem which hasn't proved to be any problem at all in the Stones' ménage is the question of "bringing up baby." Jane loves Chip dearly, loves to cuddle him, as any woman naturally loves to cuddle a baby as lovable as Chip is. But Jane never picks him up without asking Nan's permission, nor does she offer advice about his behavior and training unless she's specifically asked. This sensible courtesy to a young mother is one that seems to be very difficult for most older women to practice. It's the reef upon which many a two-in-one relationship founders, especially when the older woman feels that she is an authority on children.

Their household wheels turn so smoothly because "Jane is such a good sport," Nan told me privately. "She's always willing to do more than her share if Chip is acting up, as any baby does occasionally." And Jane confided that it was because Nan is "swell, always glad to lend a hand if I happen to be late getting home at noon, or if I'm tired." This willingness which they both possess, to do a little extra, if need be, may sound paradoxical in the face of their firm conviction that it's the carefully thought out division of work that has made their double design for living turn out well. But it's just another evidence that unselfishness usually does pay personal dividends in the end, to the very self you were willing to disregard for someone else's sake.

And then, of course, there's the thing Abraham Lincoln once said, as full of wisdom as most of his words: "Most folks are about as happy as they make up their minds to be." THE END

"Curb juvenile delinquency!"

Diary of Domesticity

By Gladys Taber

JUNE is a romantic month. It is a time of the year the poets loved especially, and goes well in sweet songs too. It suits Shakespeare with his "but thy eternal summer shall not fade."

In June, in the little town that belongs with my youth, boys and girls walked hand in hand along the river paths, and the sweet white clover foamed shoulder-high, and the gulls swung over in a cloudless sky. We had picnics in the purple twilight, with smoky, sandy frankfurters dropping from the green sticks, and quite muddy coffee in tin cups. Somebody usually forgot the rolls and had to go back for them.

We had never heard of dashing around the country in cars and dancing at roadside places, or going to anything like a night club. If we borrowed, with great machinations, one family car, we all piled in and drove to the lake or upriver, and had a picnic. We sat around the fire at the dark edge of the water and sang what I thought were the most beautiful songs in the world: "My little Per—sian Ro—ose, nobody knows—how I love you"; and "I'm the sheik of Araby, your heart belongs to me!" and "Always, always; I'll be loving you—always"; and "There's a long, long trail awinding, into the land of my dreams——" We thought we would be young forever. And being in love meant a good-night kiss in the romantic manner, and sleeping with notes under one's pillow saying, "I love you. You'll always be my girl."

Now when I read all the articles by high-school groups, or about high-school groups, arguing the pros and cons of chastity before marriage, I feel sad.

We must then have been full of complexes and frustrations and inhibitions, but we didn't know it. We felt perfectly adjusted except for not quite passing geometry or staying home with grippe the night of the football rally. We fell in love much the way we dived off the edge of the old pier, just holding our noses and plopping in and fishing ourselves out wet as oysters. And love was a miracle and a mystery and we had no idea we were seeking father images or compensating for something. We just knew the one-and-only was the most perfect human being that ever walked the mundane earth. Simple.

I know now there must have been many a sad heart beating under starched shirtwaists among the adult women, but I didn't know it then. And many a man, nipping the end off his good cigar, must have wondered why in time he picked the woman in the world least likely to be a good wife, but he never mentioned it to us.

Well, times change, and in our lifetime change piles on change. So it is a comfortable thing to have the same kind of June that we had when I was sixteen. Nature can still be lyric and romantic and the moon still the stuff of poetry.

Raising a puppy is a fascinating, if arduous, job. Jeremy, Melody's son, has been the liveliest puppy we ever tried to cope with. He is never still a moment unless he is dead asleep, getting a brief rest before tearing up something else. He whirls through the house like a merry-go-round on the loose, ears flying, tail twiddling, and mouth full of tissue or my best slippers or the bath brush or a pair of good socks. His own toys he piles up in the corner, just checking them over once in a while. But we determined to train him in some ways, since we planned to have him go with us whenever we go. We have learned a lot about training.

A puppy should be shut away by himself in a quiet room every little while. Then when he is older, he will not raise the roof every time mamma goes to the grocery store on an errand. Jeremy can be popped in any room and he will settle down because he is not frightened by being alone. Also, we put a little red collar on him very young, when he thought it was a kind of game, not an assault on his personality. Playing games with the leash worked out well too.

ront with a hey-nonny-nonny air. So we an with Jeremy by carrying him in his carrying case for short drives. Perfectly , and he will never be a bad passenger in automobile.

Housebreaking is not quite so easy as the
. It takes patience to follow a whirligig
I guess fast enough just the time to pop n on the newspapers. The best way is to t him in a small room, such as a bathroom, h newspapers on the floor, and then take n out after he has used them. And put him k before he needs them again.

Melody has been interesting to watch.
ving only one puppy to raise, she has nt more time on him herself. She has yed with him until she herself began to urn to her childhood. She jumps around e a puppy, plays with toys, throws balls ound, skips over rugs, chews stockings.
e has taken to bounding up on the wide ndow sill and sleeping there, and people e always surprised to walk in and see a dog a window sill, especially a nice grown ack cocker.

After this, nobody will have to persuade

> The feeling of friendship is like that of being comfortably filled with roast beef; love, like being enlivened with champagne.
>
> —SAMUEL JOHNSON.

Sister Jill is busy in the arden. We are specializ-ng this year in vegetables ecommended for freezing.
And she is trying tree to-natoes for the first time.
The first edible podded peas are served in soup bowls for supper, dashed with salt, pepper and butter.
Tender and sweet and innocent is the first edible podded pea. And how good are the first leaves of the oak-leaf lettuce, mixed with baby spinach leaves and chopped scallions and dressed with garlic dressing!

Jill has been making rye bread, which, cut warm and spread nicely with butter, is supper enough for me with vegetable chowder or lobster bisque. Our friend Mrs. Gee gave us a new way to get bread to rise perfectly. She lights her oven for just a moment, feels the oven with her hand to be sure it is not too warm, puts in the bread and turns off the heat. No draft gets in and the temperature is just right. If it needs to be a little warmer for the second rising, she lights the oven again for a moment, but often it does not need it.

New recipes are always fun. Alicia Bern-heim gave me a new sauce for dunking shellfish, which made a great hit. It calls for 1 egg yolk, beaten, 2 teaspoons anchovy paste, ½ teaspoon dry mustard, 1 cup mayonnaise, fresh black pepper, 1 tablespoon red-wine vinegar, 1 tablespoon tarragon vinegar, chives or scraped onion to taste (we like a lot), 1 clove garlic, and, if you like, 2 tablespoons white wine may be added. Keep in refrigerator twenty-four hours before serving, and then you remove the clove of garlic.

Now we have the freezer there is no month without oysters, r or no r in it. We freeze them in pints, and freeze clams the same way. We like swordfish steaks which we can get when we go to Crystal Beach. It may be imagination, but fish that has been home-frozen tastes even more tender to me than fish just from the counter.

Our trips back from Crystal Beach are filled with the smell of fish of all kinds, and we stop now and then to peer in the trunk to be sure the lobsters have not left their bag.
Esmé greets the arrival of the car with a loud pantherlike scream. Tigger, more restrained, simply moves to the exact middle of the kitchen floor and plants himself like a solid black battleship at anchor. And waits. We immediately fix a fish platter for the two of them.

Supper in the barbecue on a warm June evening is something close to heaven. The brook makes a soft murmur, and so do the late birds, and the air is very sweet. The smoke from the fire rises like a gray feather in the violet light. If there are a number of friends, the grill is full of broilers and the sauce basting them gives forth a good scent of garlic and olive oil and red wine.

To have those we love sitting in the barbecue in the June dusk and to serve supper sauced with good conversation—this is a most pleasant thing. And though some I love are not with us any more, their presence is there.

I always wish we were more of a singing nation. My daughter Cicely's Latin American friends can sing at any moment, and sing well, and our Russian neighbors in the village can sing beautiful songs by the hour. But middle-aged New Englanders never burst into song and spend an evening playing some instrument and harmonizing.
However, I sing a good deal myself, when nobody can hear how far off the key I am.
I like something brisk for the dishes like
"Why, oh why did I ever leave Wyoming?"
I never have been to Wyoming, but it is a nice tune. Later on I carol over the dusting,
"Open the door, Richard." And brushing Esmé, I find myself chanting, "You—you were temptation—you came, I was alone—I should have known ——"

Oh, but a June morning is magic! I cut the roses early, before the sun is pouring too much gold down from the sapphire sky. We plan to have lunch under the old apple tree, on trays, and every cocker fares forth to help move the table in the shade. Jill picks a basket of fresh vegetables, the last spears of asparagus, the salad greens, mint from the brook, stalks of rosy rhubarb. There may be radishes and scallions. Also, there are strawberries.

By afternoon everyone has worked enough to feel stiff, and my neck aches like a no-good tooth. But the house is clean, the chores are done, the garden partly weeded and the lawn mowed evenly. All those unbudgeted things are coped with, too, like the screen door coming off the hinges, the sink starting to do a Niagara on us, the slats falling out of the antique four-poster. Where do people put such things when they live by PLAN? Our entire plan is simply MISCELLANEOUS.

Even if we ever get menus organized ahead, the children will drop in unexpectedly and eat up the whole week's supply before going to bed. Or company will come and stay over. We just don't worry about it; we sort of cook along.

By night, the cool wind comes down from the woods, smelling of damp mosses and flowing springs and wild honeysuckle. And the world is suddenly so beautiful that my throat aches with it. And I think, on a June night, that faith and hope and love will never forsake us.

Many a man has lived on dreams alone,
Nourished his heart on what he never had,
Many a woman makes her bread from stone,
And dreams are all the wealth of many a lad.
Mariners steer tall ships against the moon
With never a port in sight, they hope for one,
And oftentimes a passionate bud of June
Withers untimely in too hot a sun.

This we know well, and yet we raise our eyes
On summer evenings when all wings are still,
And look again for the familiar skies
Silvered with stars that spend their light at will.
We see the stars, and easily may mark
Against their glow, how little seems the dark!

BY RUTH MILLS TEAGUE

A WEDDING BREAKFAST at home for, say, twenty-five or thirty people may look like a job for a professional caterer. But even if a caterer is at hand, most of us aren't eager to whip one in at the drop of a hat or even at the chime of a wedding bell. On the other hand, the idea of going out isn't attractive either: many of us feel that having a wedding breakfast away from home is rather like having Christmas dinner in a restaurant. Then there's the expense: the menu I'm proposing isn't cheap—far from it—but the cost at home is slight compared with what a chef capable of preparing it would nick you.

So why not do the job yourself? Fitting the preparations for a sumptuous meal into the prewedding rush will not be easy, (Continued on Page 267) but it needn't stump you. With wise management, and some kind of help, it can be done—and you'll be proud as Punch of your skill and efficiency.

And speaking of help, there is only one item on our menu that requires real cooking skill, so, if you have that yourself—and I'll assume you have—your helpers needn't be trained cooks.

Now, if I haven't talked you out of the whole deal, we'd better get on with our plans. This time nothing must be left for you to do at the last minute, and we'll choose our menu with that in mind.

Chaud-Froid of Boned Stuffed Turkey will be the chef-d'oeuvre, and a more spectacular exhibit of your culinary skill would be hard to find. A Production, no less, but this is a wedding breakfast and the food must be worthy of the occasion. I have no use for fancy food that looks even a little bit better than it tastes, but chaud-froid of boned stuffed turkey, with the accent on the stuffing, tastes vice versa.

Enough turkey talk for now. We'll get along to the hot dish, Tongue Timbales Parmesan, with a spicy hot sauce to pour over them. Although they look complicated, they're a cinch to make and can be depended on to stand up nice and pretty and keep their figures. Also—No. 1 requirement—their taste is delicious.

The salad will be a special do of shrimp and lobster. We'll use the conventional ingredients for such a salad, but we'll get an unusual effect by the way they are arranged. More of that later—and I needn't waste words on the taste.

The bread will be tiny finger rolls, baked in corn-stick pans, if you have them. They'll come hot from the oven to the table, but first they will be split open down their length and buttered.

Now the dessert. Of course there will be the traditional wedding cake, and that I shouldn't advise you to make. With it we'll have a huge mold of Strawberry Bavaroise. The top of the mold will be hollowed out and filled with pale-green minted pineapple, and the base will be surrounded by luscious strawberries that have been sprinkled with chopped mint, sugar and shredded coconut. Sound pretty? Well, it is, and the delicate creamy taste of the pudding with the sharper taste of the fruit is one of those delightful gastronomic surprises.

CHAUD-FROID OF BONED STUFFED TURKEY

Select a fine 18 or 19 pound turkey and ask your butcher to bone it for you. Ask him pretty-please and for the wedding of your daughter, sister or best friend, what family butcher could refuse? When the turkey arrives from the butcher minus his bones, you'll probably be considerably disconcerted at how little he resembles his original self at this point. But don't worry. He'll have an elegant shape by the time he is stuffed and dressed for the party. First you'll remove every trace of cartilage that may have been overlooked by the butcher, and then you'll go on to some fancy embroidery work. Sew up the incision neatly with kitchen twine, but leave a large opening for the stuffing, and sew up the openings at the ends of the legs.

Stuffing

For the base of this stuffing use 7 cups corn-bread crumbs and 5 cups toasted white-bread crumbs—and I might as well say right here that you will be flabbergasted at the amount of stuffing one boned turkey will hold. Melt ½ pound butter or margarine in an iron pot or very large skillet, add 6 cups finely chopped celery, 4 chopped medium onions, 3 minced cloves garlic and 1½ pounds chopped mushrooms, and sauté for 10 minutes. (Reserve 6 perfect mushroom caps for your decorations.) Mix the vegetables with the crumbs and add 6 tablespoons chopped parsley, 3½ cups chicken bouillon or 3½ cups water and 4 envelopes chicken-bouillon powder, 3 envelopes beef-bouillon powder, 3½ teaspoons salt, 1½ teaspoons black pepper, 3 teaspoons paprika, 2 teaspoons rosemary, 1 cup chopped English walnuts or pecans, and 1 cup almond slivers that have been fried to a golden brown. Mix thoroughly, taste and add more seasoning if you like. Stir in 3 slightly beaten eggs and we're ready to stuff. (Note: The next time you roast a chicken, try using ½ cup or more chopped English walnuts or pecans in the stuffing. The nuts retain both texture and individual taste. Very good!) Start with the legs and squeeze from the outside to force the stuffing into place. Next the wings, same process. Now fill in the rest of the cavity, squeezing and pushing to make sure every little crevice is tightly filled. When you're satisfied it will hold no more, sew up the rest of the incision and turn the bird over. It will sprawl at this stage, but you can press and push it into the shape you want—the shape of a turkey, to be more explicit. Now sew the tips of

When you buy vegetables do you actually get the vitamins that are so essential to health?

Don't waste good money on wilted, dried-out, vitamin-starved vegetables!

the legs together, and fasten them down firmly to the skin and place the turkey on a large white cloth that has been soaked in salad oil. The final shaping is done by bandaging the turkey in the cloth. Use safety pins to fasten the cloth around the bird and force it into shape. When you're satisfied—and you'll probably fasten and unfasten the safety pins several times before you are—fit the turkey into an oval roasting pan with a lid. Put 2 cups water in the pan, cover and cook in a 300° F. oven until done, allowing about 18 minutes to the pound. Be sure there is always some water in the pan, and baste frequently. The less it browns, the better, and if it didn't brown at all it would be still better. The cooking should be done two or three days before the wedding. When cool, remove the cloth and place turkey in refrigerator. The turkey must be thoroughly chilled before it is blanketed, first with a rich cream sauce and then with aspic.

Cream Sauce

Make a cream sauce, basic method, using 6 tablespoons butter or margarine, 6 tablespoons flour, 3 cups cream, juice of ½ lemon and salt to taste. When done, stir in 1 teaspoon unflavored gelatin soaked in a little water. Cool the sauce to lukewarm and pour carefully over the turkey to coat it evenly. I use a large spoon to coat the wings and legs and pour the sauce over the rest of the bird from a flat-lipped pitcher. Don't expect a completely smooth job, but be sure that every bit of the surface is covered. Chill again before the next step.

Yellow Aspic

Soak 4 envelopes unflavored gelatin in ½ cup cold water. Heat 5¾ cups highly seasoned chicken broth, canned or homemade, and the juice of 1 lemon to the boiling point and stir in gelatin. If canned broth is used, be sure that it is clear and has no grease. If homemade is used, be sure to clarify (basic recipe). Add a few drops of yellow vegetable coloring. Pour off about 2 cups of this mixture and cool until it thickens a little and acts as if about the next minute it would begin to set. Pour this on the turkey to make a thin glaze over the entire surface. This is not at all difficult, but the consistency of the gelatin must be exactly right. If you let it get too thick, set the pan in hot water and start the cooling process over again. Pour all but 1 cup of the remaining gelatin mixture into a shallow pan and store in refrigerator. We'll come to that 1 cup in a minute.

> It is useless to discuss accomplished facts, to protest against things past remedy, to find fault with bygone things. —CONFUCIUS.

Pink Aspic

I'm going to suggest using canned madrilène for this. Soak 2 envelopes unflavored gelatin in a little cold water and dissolve in 4 10½-ounce cans hot madrilène. Add beet juice for stronger color. Pour into a shallow pan and store in refrigerator.

Trimmings

From the tongue for the timbales select 6 or 8 deep pink slices and the same number of pale pink slices. Cut 10 disks with a small biscuit cutter and 10 tiny ones with the cutter for the hole of a doughnut. Put these on flat plates and pour on enough of that leftover cup of aspic barely to cover them. Cut 3 or 4 truffles into very thin slices, put them on a plate and cover with a little aspic. Truffles aren't necessary, but they are available now and can be ordered from fancy grocery stores or the grocery departments of large department stores. They are expensive, so order the smallest-size can. Sprinkle the mushroom caps with paprika and fry in butter or margarine to a pale golden color. Pour a thin layer of aspic in the bottom of a small pan and place the mushrooms in, top side down. Make some tiny leaflike points of green pepper.

Once the trimmings are made, the actual decoration of the turkey takes very little time, but I'd do it the day before the wedding and have it off my mind. Use your own imagination, but I do think the overlapping row of tongue disks along the top of the turkey (as you see on mine) is a good idea because it builds up the height of the breast. I alternated the dark and light pink, and put a piece of truffle in the center of each disk. Part of the pink aspic can be cut in points and arranged around the ends of the turkey, with mushroom caps between the points, and the rest can be chopped and heaped on the side of the platter, alternating with heaps of yellow aspic. The decorations for the sides—the small tongue disks and green peppers—should be pressed into the glaze a little so they'll be sure to stick. There. With your own inspiration and the picture to guide you a little, I know you'll turn out a magnificent bird.

TONGUE TIMBALES PARMESAN

These can be made two or even three days ahead of time. Soak 2 large smoked tongues overnight in cold water. Cover with fresh water, add 2 teaspoons whole pepper, 5 bay leaves and 1 sliced onion and simmer until tender—about 2½ hours. Let them stand in the broth until cool enough to handle, then plunge into cold water and skin. Remove the roots and fatty parts at the base. If you have a slicing machine you're all set. If not, ask the butcher who boned your turkey—I hope—to slice it very thin.

The amount of rice needed for the filling will depend on the size of your timbales, but 2 pounds should be enough for 25 or 30. Wash the rice thoroughly through 4 waters. For each cup of rice to be used, put into a kettle 1 quart water, 1 small chopped onion, 1 slice bacon, 2 teaspoons salt and 1 teaspoon saffron. When the water boils briskly, sprinkle in the rice and cook until tender. Saffron differs in strength and you may have to add a little more to make the rice a bright yellow. If you can't get saffron use a little yellow vegetable coloring. Drain the rice, remove bacon and add a large piece of butter or margarine and 1 cup grated Parmesan cheese. Toss with two forks until well mixed.

Rub individual molds generously with salad oil. Cut the rounded ends from the slices of tongue and line each mold with overlapping slices of tongue, cut ends down, touching but not covering the bottom of the mold. Fill with the rice mixture, pressing lightly with a fork as you go along. With scissors cut away the tongue that extends above the rim of the molds. Now the timbales are ready for last-minute heating. Half an hour to an hour before serving put them in pans of hot water, cover with wax paper and heat in a 300° F. oven. Turn them out on a serving platter and garnish with parsley.

Sauce Diablo

Cook together to a golden brown 3 tablespoons salad oil, 2 tablespoons butter or margarine and 2 minced cloves garlic. Blend in 4 tablespoons flour and add slowly, stirring constantly, 2 cups soup stock or canned consommé and remove from fire. Add ¾ cup catchup, ½ teaspoon Bahamian mustard or 1 teaspoon other prepared mustard, 1½ tablespoons Worcestershire sauce, 1½ teaspoons salt, ½ teaspoon whole pepper and 1 medium-sized onion chopped. Cook over direct heat until thick, stirring constantly; transfer to double boiler and cook ½ hour longer. Strain and add ¼ cup undiluted evaporated milk to lighten the color. The sauce can be made as far ahead of time as suits your convenience, and reheated in a double boiler. Serve the deep pink sauce in a separate bowl beside the platter of pink-and-gold timbales.

SALAD

You will need 5 pounds large shrimp and 5 medium lobster tails for the salad. Use fresh or frozen sea food, depending on availability. If fresh is used, wash thoroughly, boil the lobster tails in heavily salted water for 20 minutes and boil the shrimp in court bouillon for 15 minutes. To make a simple court bouillon, add to enough water to cover the fish ½ cup vinegar, 2 or 3 stalks celery with leaves, 2 carrots, 2 sliced onions, 2 teaspoons salt and 1 teaspoon whole pepper. Cool lobster tails and remove shells carefully. Cool shrimp in the court bouillon, remove shells and clean. The lobster and shrimp can be prepared several days in advance.

The day before the wedding chop celery, cover with water and ice cubes and place

New England Breakfast

Fresh California Orange Juice

Codfish Cakes and Bacon Baked Beans

Boston Brown Bread Wild Plum Jam Coffee

Interesting breakfast? Yes! Most interesting because a newer favorite is now added to the old – fresh California orange juice. And with good reason. All of those other foods provide almost no vitamin C, the very vitamin health authorities say we should get at breakfast. Orange juice does, abundantly.

A big glass every day will give added pleasure and value to your own breakfast. Flavor? You'll tilt your glass up high for the last of its deliciousness. Health? Just check the charts and see!

Sunkist Oranges make good eating in lots of ways! Keep them on hand always…for recipes, lunch boxes, between-meal snacks. They are the finest fruit from 14,500 cooperating California and Arizona citrus growers.

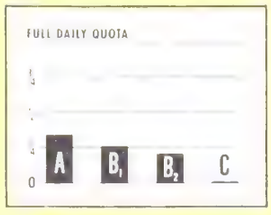
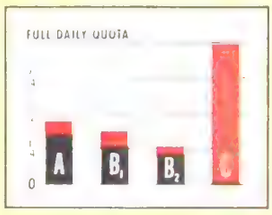
SEE HOW MUCH HEALTH ORANGE JUICE ADDS!

Without fresh California orange juice, breakfast supplies this much of the day's vitamin needs:



Here are the vitamins you get from an average good American breakfast* without orange juice. It falls short in vitamin C. This is true of most foods. Yet you need C daily to fight fatigue and infection, protect teeth and gums, keep feeling young.

With fresh California orange juice, breakfast supplies this much of the day's vitamin needs:



Oranges are your richest everyday source of vitamin C. A big glass of juice fills your day's need and boosts other food values, too. That's why, big or little, all good American breakfasts start with fresh California orange juice. Yours should!

Out of some cold figures, came a story to warm America's heart

NOT LONG AGO, the Secretary of the United States Treasury studied a figure-covered sheet of paper.

The figures revealed a steady, powerful upswing in the purchase of U. S. Savings Bonds, and an equally steady decrease in Bond redemptions.

But to the Secretary, they revealed a good deal more than that, and Mr. Snyder spoke his mind:

"If you give them the facts," he said, "you can always depend on the common sense and long-range judgment of the American people.

"The last few months have given us heart-warming proof of that.

"After the Victory Loan, sales of U. S. Savings Bonds went down—redemptions went up. And that was only natural and human.

"It was natural and human—but it was also dangerous. For suppose this trend had continued. Suppose that, in this period of reconversion, some 80 million Americans had decided not only to stop saving, but to spend the $40 Billion which they had already put aside in Series E, F & G Savings Bonds. The picture which that conjures up is not a pretty one!

"But the trend did NOT continue.

"Early last fall, the magazines of this country—nearly a thousand of them, acting together—started an advertising campaign on bonds. This, added to the continuing support of other media and advertisers, gave the American people the facts . . . told them why it was important to buy and hold U. S. Savings Bonds.

"The figures on this sheet tell how the American people responded—and mighty good reading it makes.

"Once more, it has been clearly proved that when you give Americans the facts, you can then ask them for action—and you'll get it!"

WHAT DO THE FIGURES SHOW?

On Mr. Snyder's sheet were some very interesting figures.

They showed that sales of Savings Bonds went from $494 million in last September to $519 million in October and kept climbing steadily until, in January of this year, they reached a new postwar high: In January, 1947, Americans put nearly a billion dollars in Savings Bonds. And that trend is continuing.

In the same way, redemptions have been going just as steadily downward. Here, too, the trend continues.

Moreover, there has been, since the first of the year, an increase not only in the volume of Bonds bought through Payroll Savings, but in the number of buyers.

HOW ABOUT YOU?

The figures show that millions of Americans have realized this fact: there is no safer, surer way on earth to get the things you want than by buying U. S. Savings Bonds regularly.

They are the safest investment in the world. They pay you $4 for every $3 at the end of 10 years. And you can buy them automatically, almost painlessly today, through either of two plans:

If you are eligible for the Payroll Plan, for your own sake and your family's sake, get on it . . . and watch your savings mount up.

If you are not eligible for the Payroll Plan, but have a checking account, see your banker and get him to tell you about the new Bond-a-Month Plan.

Either of them will set you on the road to financial security, and the happiness that comes with it.

Save the easy, automatic way—with U.S. Savings Bonds n refrigerator. Slit the stalks several imes lengthwise and cut across into very small pieces. You will need 4½ to 5 cups chopped celery.

Cut 3 green peppers and 1 sweet red pepper into slender strips and cut across into tiny pieces. Cover with water and ice cubes and place in refrigerator.

Wash 2 heads lettuce, preferably Boston lettuce, and hard-cook 6 eggs.

When you are ready to arrange the salad, dry the celery and peppers and toss them together. Cut lobster tails into slices ⅓ inch to ½ inch wide. If you have a square or oblong platter, use it for the salad. Arrange a border of small lettuce leaves and fill the platter with alternate rows of shrimp and lobster, leaving an inch and a half of empty space between rows. Do this neatly and let the shrimp and lobster pieces lean against one another so the rows will be plump and full. Fill the empty rows with chopped celery and pepper and, if you like, sprinkle with capers. Cut the hard-cooked eggs with an egg cutter and arrange them, fan shape, at the corners of the platter. If you use a round platter, follow the same system, but make circular instead of vertical rows. This arrangement has two advantages over the mixed salad: 1—it looks prettier; 2—if people like shrimp but not lobster, or vice versa (I don't know why this should be true, but occasionally it is), they can take what they like from the salad platter and be happy.

Mayonnaise

Since I haven't given you my recipe for mayonnaise since March, 1946, I'd better repeat it here.

Measure 2⅔ cups salad oil—and be sure that it and the mixing bowl are cold. Into the bowl put 2 large egg yolks, ¼ teaspoon red pepper, ¼ teaspoon dry mustard, 1 teaspoon salt, 1 scant teaspoon sugar, 1 teaspoon paprika, 2 tablespoons vinegar and 2 tablespoons lemon juice. Beat for ½ minute with rotary or electric beater and begin adding the oil, a little at a time at first and later in a small but steady stream, beating constantly and fast. If you use a rotary beater, move it around a bit as you beat. With a stationary electric beater, the bowl can occasionally be moved from side to side. The idea is not to beat exclusively in the center of the bowl. In 4 or 5 minutes you will have a bowl of stiff golden mayonnaise. This recipe makes about 1½ pints. Add 2 cloves garlic cut in half and 1 teaspoon Worcestershire sauce. Stir and store in refrigerator at least overnight—and don't forget to remove the garlic pieces before serving. Put the mayonnaise in a separate bowl beside the salad.

FINGER ROLLS

There isn't space to give you my recipe for icebox rolls, but you can find one in any good cookbook. Make the dough ahead of time and have the rolls baked in corn-stick pans just before serving.

STRAWBERRY BAVAROISE

This recipe will fill a 7-quart mold and will serve at least 30 people. The pudding should be made two or three days before the wedding.

Soak 6 envelopes unflavored gelatin in 1 cup cold water and add 2 cups boiling water. Stir until gelatin is dissolved, add 2 cups sugar and stir again. Defrost 4 boxes frozen strawberries and press through a fine sieve. Mix ⅓ cup lemon juice with the pulp, measure by cups and add to the gelatin mixture. There should be 7½ cups of liquid in all. If the combined strawberry pulp, water and lemon juice do not make that quantity of liquids, add more water. Chill until the mixture begins to set, then put the bowl in a pan of ice cubes and water and beat with a rotary beater until very fluffy and stiff. This takes a lot of beating, and it must be steady and fast. If you have an electric beater, one person can do the job, but if the beater must be turned manually you'd better have at least one stand-by to take over when your arm gets tired. During the beating be sure to scrape the bottom and sides of the bowl frequently, because the mixture nearest the ice tends to congeal. When this beating job is done, remove bowl from ice water and whip 2 cups heavy cream until stiff, then beat 7 egg whites until stiff. A lot of beating, but we're making a tremendous dessert. Now fold the cream and egg whites into the gelatin mixture, add enough vegetable coloring to make the pudding a lovely delicate pink and beat long enough to mix all ingredients thoroughly.

Now we're ready for the mold, and you may have difficulty finding one large enough. A punch bowl, a huge glass vase or a tremendous mixing bowl will do nicely. Wet the inside of the mold with cold water and pour the pudding in. Now go after air bubbles by inserting a long knife wherever you see them, and when this is done insert the knife many times in the middle of the pudding where you can't see the bubbles, because they're bound to be there. Store the mold in a refrigerator, yours or a neighbor's.

The pineapple for the filling may be fresh or canned and should be cut into small pieces. For fresh pineapple make a sirup of 1 cup sugar, ½ cup water, 10 or 12 mint leaves and green vegetable coloring. When the sirup has cooked, strain it, add the pineapple and boil gently for a few minutes. The pineapple should be pale green, so be cautious with the vegetable coloring. If canned pineapple is used, add a little sugar to the juice and proceed as above. (If you like, the pineapple may be boiled in ½ cup crème de menthe to which ¼ cup water and ⅓ cup sugar have been added. It will give both the mint taste and the green color to the fruit.) This can be done a week ahead of time if it suits your convenience.

Shortly before serving time, large fresh strawberries should be washed, stemmed and sprinkled with a little sugar and 2 tablespoons finely chopped mint leaves. (Or, if you like, the strawberries may be sprinkled with a little crème de menthe.)

To arrange the dessert, unmold the pudding on a large round platter and, using a large spoon, remove enough pudding to make a hollow in the top. Don't make the hollow too deep—a shallow one will hold a lot of pineapple. Fill the hollow with the pale-green pineapple and make a ring of shredded coconut where the two colors meet. At the last minute—but you needn't do this yourself—heap the fresh strawberries around the base of the mold and sprinkle them with shredded coconut. Garnish with sprigs of mint or pale green leaves.

Lines Across A Breakfast Table

By Georgie Starbuck Galbraith

Dear sir, it would be foolish to Pretend that I beheld in you
Those qualities ascribed by myth
To demigods, or viewed you with An awe approaching reverence.
For—leave us face it!—there are gents
Far handsomer and maybe e'en
A few with intellect as keen.
But just because you're no Spinoza
Plus Apollo, don't suppose a Minute I advance objection
To such pleasant imperfection.
Quite the converse. I prefer
The status quo, for if you were Ideal, whatever would you see,
My darling, in the likes of me!

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

There's the food, and it's good and beautiful food, as should be. Again I don't say it's easy, but if you spread the work of preparation over four or five days—and you can—it shouldn't be too difficult a job for any ambitious cook. The boning, stuffing and molding of the turkey are the only tasks that require skill, and that needn't be trained skill. The first time I did it I had no minute instructions to follow—I just thought it was a good idea and I tried, and the results were gratifying.

Service. These have been wordy recipes, and I must skip swiftly to finis. Buffet service, of course, and table arrangement planned and practiced in advance. With such decorative food to work with, your table is bound to be a beautiful sight however it is arranged, but you'll want it to look exactly as you've pictured it in your mind.

Enough about that, and now to an extra Conversation Piece; subject, the little boxes of wedding cake your guests will take home with them. Here's an opportunity to be different, and we'll take advantage of it. Have the boxes covered with different colored shiny paper—pink, blue, green, gold and silver. Buy them already covered, or buy the white boxes and the papers and do the job yourself. Use the boxes as a centerpiece for your main table, or arrange them on a separate table with the dessert on one side and the wedding cake on the other. Stack them in a pyramid, using a covered six-inch-square box for the center. Arrange a circle of little boxes around it, then stack a smaller circle on those, and so on to the top. I needn't give you a play-by-play description—you'll see as you go along. Now with eight long strips of pink and blue chiffon ribbon, about three inches wide, tie a big bow for the top, leaving streamers long enough to extend down the sides and a little beyond the bottom of the pyramid. Have someone hold the bow on top while you stretch the streamers at equal distances down the sides and tuck them under eight of the bottom layer of boxes. When you are satisfied with the arrangement, use cellulose tape to fasten each streamer to the bottom of the box under which it is tucked. Slip two or three flowers into the knot of the bow. The streamers will appear to be holding the boxes in place.

There you are, and here I go. The wedding breakfast is almost over; we're ready for the finale. The bride, in her white gown, is standing behind the gaily colored pyramid. She is about to untie the chiffon bow, and the bright little boxes will scatter over the table.

Another time, use a cooked lemon or chocolate filling instead of the jelly.

[1] Broiled Chicken

All tender cuts of meat, certain fish and young chickens can be broiled in an oven broiler.

Broiling chickens weigh 1 to 2½ pounds. Have the butcher split them in half and remove neck and backbone. Clean thoroughly, removing any pinfeathers the butcher forgot, cut off tails, wash and blot dry with paper towels. While no fat is needed when you broil a steak or chop, young chickens have very little fat and need to be rubbed generously with butter, margarine or salad oil to keep the chicken from drying out. Do this first. Then sprinkle with salt and pepper. If you like the flavor, rub a cut clove of garlic over the chicken before rubbing with the fat or oil.

Lay the chicken halves skin side down on the broiler rack and broil at moderate heat, 350° F., about 30–40 minutes, depending on size of the bird. Turn frequently, and if chicken looks as if it's getting dry, brush with a little melted butter or margarine or salad oil. Test for doneness with a fork. The fork should go in easily and there should be no tinge of pink to the meat. Chicken, unlike steak, should always be well done. If you use frozen chickens, follow the directions on the package. The best position for broiling is 2 or 3 inches from the source of the heat.

A note about the peas. Don't cook your peas more than 6 minutes if they are young and tender, and they will have a lovely color. There's no secret to cooking them—if you remember to use a small amount of water and not overcook them. For frozen peas, follow directions on package. Nan Stone is fortunate to have a pressure saucepan—is wedded to it for vegetables.

4 Coffee

Know your own coffee maker, for there's a best way to brew for every kind. Always measure both your coffee and water. You'll soon hit your stride on the strength you like—that is, the amount of coffee and water to use. Then stick to it so you'll always be sure it will be just right. But you can't get a good brew with any less than 2 level tablespoons of coffee to each standard measuring cup of boiling water—and it should be boiling.

MENU II

Since the lemon-chiffon pie and the onion soup can be made long before your session with the roast and the rest of the fixings, we'll get busy with these two first.

11 Lemon-Chiffon Pie

Pastry: The usual proportions of shortening and flour for pastry are 1 part shortening to 3 parts flour, and 2 tablespoons water to each cup of flour. You're wisest to start with a 1-crust pie for your first attempt. The quantities I'm giving you for the pastry can be used for a 2-crust pie later on, when green apples come along and you've had a little practice. Though they make more than enough for 1 pie shell, they're better quantities to learn on. The extra pastry you can make into little thimble tarts or cheese straws. But more of that later.

Sift 2 cups flour with ½ teaspoon salt into a bowl. Measure ⅔ cup vegetable shortening carefully, pressing it down into the cup so there are no air spaces. A glass measuring cup is best, as you can see what goes on. Drop the shortening into the flour. If you have a pastry blender, you're in luck, for it makes quick work of pastry mixing. If you haven't, use 2 knives—1 in each hand, scissor fashion—and cut the shortening in until it is in crumbs about the size of dried beans. Don't cut too fine or you won't have a flaky crust. Experienced cooks can use their fingers, but you'd better stick to the knives or the pastry blender for a while. Measure ¼ cup cold or iced water. Too much water makes hard, brittle crust—too little, a crumbly crust. Sprinkle it over the flour and fat a little at a time, lifting and turning the mixture with a fork as it is added. Toss aside pieces of dough with fork as soon as they are formed. This way the water will be more evenly distributed. Try never to hit the same spot twice. Give pastry a stir with the fork to sort of bring it together. Press it together lightly with your hands into a ball. Shape with your hands into a flat disk, pinching any cracked edges together. Handle gently, but not gingerly. To roll, use a lightly floured pastry cloth and cloth-covered rolling pin if you have them—otherwise a lightly floured board and rolling pin. With a light hand (I emphasize light, as a heavy hand never helped a pastry) roll the dough from the center out—all the way around. Now and then turn the dough ¼ turn to keep it from sticking, and continue rolling. Keep it as round as you can, and roll it as thin as possible without splitting the dough. Hold the piepan over the dough to see whether it has been rolled large enough to fit the pan—and it surely will. Fold the dough in half. Place it in an ungreased 9 or 10 inch pan. Unfold the pastry, easing it carefully, with a pat here and there, to fit the pan. Be sure you don't stretch it, or your pastry will shrink in the baking. Cut off excess pastry with kitchen scissors, leaving ½-inch margin beyond edge of pan. It's handier than using a knife. Fold pastry under, so that it is even with the rim of the pan. Make a crimped edge with thumb and forefinger of right hand and the forefinger of the left hand. See photo on page 227. Prick pastry all over with a fork. Bake in hot oven, 450° F., about 15 minutes, or until golden brown.

We have a JOURNAL kitchen trick that helps keep pastry in its best shape while baking: Cut a big square of wax paper—bigger than the pan. Lay it in the unbaked pastry. Spread 1½ cups raw rice over paper. Put pastry in oven. Remove paper and rice after about 5 minutes. Finish baking. Keep the rice in a jar and you can use it over and over again for this purpose.

While the pie shell bakes, you can reroll the pastry scraps. Cut them out in small rounds. Cut out the centers of half the rounds with a thimble or smaller round cutter. Prick with a fork and bake till golden brown. These are good put together with jelly. I call them thimble tarts. If you'd rather make cheese sticks, roll grated cheese into the rerolled pastry. Cut in strips and bake. They are good as a snack.

Lemon-Chiffon Filling: Start the filling while pie shell is baking. Sprinkle 2 teaspoons unflavored gelatin over ¼ cup cold water. Let stand a few minutes to soften. Meanwhile, mix ⅓ cup of sugar and ⅓ cup lemon juice together. Separate 3 eggs. Add a pinch of salt to the 3 egg yolks and beat them until they are light-colored and quite thick. Add the lemon and sugar to the egg yolks, stirring constantly. Put in the top of the double

During one of my childhood visits to the country I found a land terrapin and started to examine him, but the terrapin closed his shell like a vise. Seeing me trying to pry him open with a stick, my uncle said, "No, no, that's not the way." Then he took the creature inside and set him on the hearth. In a few minutes, after the little fellow began to get warm, he stuck out his head, then his feet, and calmly crawled toward me. "People are sorta like terrapins," my uncle said. "Never try to force a fellow into anything. Just warm him up with a little human kindness, and more'n likely he'll come your way."

Miracle Whip

Salads are eaten with gusto when they're served with Miracle Whip—because Miracle Whip Salad Dressing has a lively just-right flavor you get in it alone. Its exclusive recipe combines the qualities of zesty boiled dressing and fine mayonnaise.

Frequent shipments of Miracle Whip are going to food dealers, but of course this famous salad dressing doesn't linger on the shelves. Far more people want it than any other kind!

ASPARAGUS, TOMATO AND EGG SALAD. For each serving place a thick slice of tomato on lettuce. Arrange cooked asparagus tips on tomato. Halve hard-cooked eggs cutting in sawtooth fashion. Press yolks through sieve, season with Miracle Whip. Fill whites using pastry tube. Place eggs on chop plate, surround with asparagus and tomato salads. Serve with Miracle Whip.

boiler until the custard forms a thin coating on the spoon. (See custard recipe—Menu III.) Even though this is a different mixture, the principle is the same as in making any custard. Remove the custard from the hot water and stir in the gelatin that has been softening in the cold water. Stir until the gelatin is thoroughly dissolved—no little shiny particles on your spoon. Pour into bowl and add 1 teaspoon grated lemon rind. Cool in refrigerator until it begins to thicken. Don't let it really set. Beat the 3 egg whites just until they stand up in peaks. Mixture should be shiny-looking and not dry. Add ¼ cup sugar, a tablespoon at a time, beating well after each addition of sugar, so it's well dissolved. Fold the egg-white-and-sugar mixture into the gelatin custard with a light down, up and over motion of the spoon. Pour into the baked and cooled pie shell. It should look very spongy and light. Chill until set. Just before serving, whip ¾ cup heavy cream until stiff. Fold 1 tablespoon of sugar and, if you have it, 1 tablespoon chopped mint into the cream. Substitute ½ teaspoon vanilla for mint if you don't like the flavor. Spread over top.

Now that you know how to make a pastry pie shell, you can make chocolate, butterscotch, coconut cream and lemon pie, too, as well as any one of the many chiffon pies. When you are really experienced at pie rolling, you can divide the dough and get 2 pie shells out of the 1 recipe for pastry, but you'd better try it for just one first.

[5] Onion Soup au Gratin

When a recipe calls for meat stock, consommé or broth, you're wisest to use one of the many good canned bouillons or consommés, or you can use meat pastes, beef-bouillon cubes or the powdered forms, plus water for right strength. With all these aids to making homemade soup a quicker process, you will not often start from scratch and make your own, but here's how in case you want to be truly orthodox.

Start your stock with a good piece of shinbone with meat left on, and a knuckle-bone, cracked. If you have leftover roast bones in addition, so much the better for the strength of your stock. If you want your soup to have a good brown color, brown the meat and bones in a little fat in the bottom of a deep soup kettle. If not, skip this step. Now cover with 3–4 quarts cold water. Add 1 teaspoon salt, about 6 whole black peppers, ½ bay leaf, 2 onions, peeled, 1 carrot, scraped, a handful of parsley and a handful of celery tops. Bring to a boil, then turn down heat very, very low and simmer 3–4 hours. The purpose of this long, slow simmering is to extract the flavor from the meat, bones and seasoners. Remove the scum on top from time to time.

Strain the stock and cool. Skim off fat. From here on you can use the stock in any recipe calling for same. This is the base of old-fashioned vegetable soup—just add diced vegetables of your choice from the garden, season to taste and cook until vegetables are tender. Most stock-based soups taste better the second day.

Now for the actual making of onion soup. Slice 6 medium to large-sized peeled onions thin. Brown them carefully in 3 tablespoons butter or margarine. They should be golden brown but not burned. Add 6 cups broth or meat stock—your own brew or the canned bouillon or consommé. If it's a condensed variety, dilute according to directions on the can. Season with salt and pepper to taste and add 1 teaspoon Worcestershire sauce. Simmer over low heat until the onions are tender. Taste again before you serve. This may be made ahead as I suggested, and reheated before serving.

To be really French, pour the soup into an earthenware casserole. Arrange slices of toast or slices of toasted hard rolls on top. Sprinkle with grated Parmesan cheese and place under broiler or in oven until cheese melts and browns. Soup should be steaming hot before you put it into the casserole. A quicker way is to serve the soup—pass toast or the toasted roll slices as well as a bowl of grated cheese. Let everyone help himself to toast and cheese at the table. Or you could skip this garnishing and serve the soup plain.

6 Roast Beef

If you like a standing rib roast with the one in: Use a 2 or 3 rib roast. About ½ pound meat and bone is usually allowed per portion, but you can't roast 1 rib very successfully. It's better to have some for icing cold. Be sure you know the dressed weight of the roast after the butcher has trimmed it so you will be able to figure roasting time. Wipe the roast with a damp cloth. Rub salt and pepper into it well. Place roast, fat side up, in an open roasting pan. The bones act as a rack. If you have a meat thermometer, make an incision with a pointed knife or metal skewer through the fat and insert thermometer so its bulb is in the exact center of the meaty part of the roast. If the roast won't stand up, lay it flat side down on a rack in the pan and insert thermometer directly into the center. Roast uncovered in a slow oven, 300° F., 18–20 minutes per pound if you like it rare; 22–25 minutes per pound for medium; 27–30 minutes per pound for well done—though I personally think it's a crime to roast good beef to the well-done stage. If you have a meat thermometer, use this guide for doneness according to interior temperature: 140°F. for rare; 160° F. for medium; and 170° F. for well done. It's really the most accurate way to tell when a roast is of proper doneness. A meat thermometer is worth purchasing if you are a beginner cook.

If you prefer a rolled roast: Use a 3-rib roast and have it boned and rolled at the market. Have the butcher weigh it after boning and rolling so you can figure roasting time. Rub with salt and pepper. Place fat side up on a rack and proceed as for the standing roast. Roast 32 minutes per pound for rare; 33 minutes per pound for medium; and 38 minutes per pound for well done. Base time per pound on the ready-to-roast weight without the bone. Use same interior thermometer temperature as for the standing ribs.

7 Roast Potatoes

Parboil 6–8 potatoes, or as many as you want for your meal. By parboiling, in this instance, I mean cook the potatoes only partly done by boiling 10–15 minutes for old potatoes, 8 for medium size, about 5 for small new potatoes in boiling salted water. Have them ready ½ hour before roast is to be done. Remove the rack from the roasting pan if you are using one. Place potatoes around the roast. Sprinkle lightly with salt. Baste with the fat in the pan. Nan says she and Jane found the word "baste" confusing when they were first learning how to cook—always had thought basting applied to sewing. Anyway, it means to spoon a liquid or fat over meat or fish during cooking. Pour a spoonful of the fat over the roast, too, while you're at it. Finish roasting for the rest of the time—about 30 minutes. The potatoes need turning now and then and basting, too, so they will brown evenly. Parboiling of the potatoes keeps them from getting a rubbery, shriveled crust. Lift roast and potatoes out onto hot platter and keep hot until you make the gravy. Roast meats carve more easily if they are allowed to stand in a warm place for a little while anyway after the actual cooking time is over.

8 Roast Beef Gravy

Some people like natural gravy—au jus, as it's called, with no thickening—others like a slightly thickened gravy. I hope no one likes a really thick one. I personally like the natural gravy best. In any case, let the drippings stand a few minutes so the fat will float.

For thickened gravy: Pour off all but about 1½ tablespoons of the fat; or if you can't guess with your eye, pour it all off and put back 1½ tablespoons. Add 1½ tablespoons flour. Stir it into the fat and juices. There won't be much meat juice from this method of roasting. Gradually stir in 1½ cups boiling water, stirring all the time until the gravy thickens and boils. This is the classic way to make any pan gravy, but if you have trouble making smooth gravy, try it this way. Put the 1½ tablespoons fat in pan with the drippings. Add boiling water and scrape all the bits of brown that have adhered to the pan into the liquid. Use the back of your spoon for this. Put your flour (1½ tablespoons) in a jar with 3 tablespoons cold water. Screw on the top of the jar and shake well. This trick usually makes a smooth mixture quickly. Use a spoon and make the thickening in a cup if you haven't a jar. Add the thickening to the hot liquid gradually, and stir constantly until it bubbles and gets very glossy. Since I said one usually has very little juices to give gravy good flavor, it's best to add about ½ teaspoon concentrated meat paste, or use beef broth instead of water in the beginning. In any case, season gravy to taste with salt and pepper before you strain it into the gravy boat.

If you like natural gravy, omit the fat entirely, adding just enough water or broth to keep it of good strength. Some cooks like to pour 1 cup of the water or broth over roast in last few minutes of roasting—I've tried it and it really makes better natural gravy, doesn't hurt the roast at this point either. If desired, add a few tablespoons of red wine with the broth. Try the way you like best.

BETWEEN THE DEVIL AND THE DEEP BLUE SEA

The dictionary defines this phrase as: "Between equally disagreeable or hazardous alternatives." But I like better the original meaning, as told to me by an old State of Maine man, who in his youth had been a builder of those wooden ships which carried our flag to all corners of the earth. In those days, he said, not only every sail, every piece of rigging, had its name, but even the deck planks and seams were distinguished one from another by name. The seam, then, between the outermost deck plank and the next was called the "devil." And whenever a calking job at sea arose, the man whose job it was to calk that seam, standing on the outboard plank, literally stood "between the devil and the deep blue sea."

—J. H. WERNER.

9 Fresh Asparagus

To save time, you may often prefer to use the frozen asparagus, which is all cleaned. But now that the fresh asparagus season is on, you might like to know how to prepare it.

Grasp each stalk between thumbs and forefingers and snap the tender upper portion from the woody base. Never cut asparagus if you want to eat all you cook. If the stalks are sandy—and they usually are—scrub with a stiff brush and cut off the lower scales where the sand usually collects. Let the stalks stand in cold salted water about 30 minutes or so to sift out any sand in the tips. Wash in fresh water and cook in boiling salted water just 8 minutes. This is long enough for the fat stalks—cook even less for the thinner ones. Most people overcook asparagus until it's so limp you could tie it in a knot. You don't want to be one of them. Yours will still be tender, soft and green without being mushy. Drain and dress with melted butter or margarine, salt and pepper. Small kitchen tongs are the best kitchen gadget for lifting out the asparagus. Someday, when you learn to make hollandaise, serve it with that—but for now, be practice-perfect with plain butter or margarine.

10 Green Salad—French Dressing

A wooden bowl seasoned with the oil of many mixings is best for green salads, but of course you will use what you have. Have the salad greens brittly crisp—shaken free of moisture and dried gently in a towel before ever anointing with dressing. If greens are wet, your dressing will become diluted. Combine several greens for the best salad. There are many to choose from—lettuce, water cress, romaine, escarole, spinach and chicory are all good in combination.

For a salad for 1 meal, blend 3 tablespoons salad oil with 1 tablespoon wine vinegar or herb vinegar. Season to taste with salt and pepper—freshly ground pepper is best if you have a pepper mill. This dressing is the simplest and most classic. From here on you can be as adventurous as you please, adding dry mustard, paprika, various herbs and seasoners. But it's good the way it is. Rub the inside of the salad

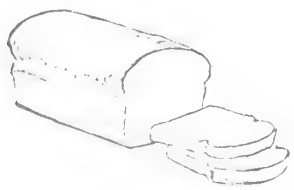
What makes bread light?



THE STAFF OF LIFE gets its "lift" —its feathery lightness—from another basic food: Sugar. The sugar used in making bread is partly converted by yeast into carbon dioxide gas, which permeates the dough and makes it rise. But that's not all! Sugar also adds energy value, imparts flavor to the loaf, contributes to the golden color of the crust, and helps keep the bread moist and fresh.

In baked goods—as in a variety of canned fruits and dairy products, cured meats, breakfast cereals, confections and a host of other wholesome foods—sugar is a standard ingredient, contributing to food value as well as to palatability.

Sugar is a versatile food, and one about which science is learning more and more. In order to promote the study of sugar, both as food and a raw material of industry, the Sugar Research Foundation has established research projects at many universities and colleges in the United States and Canada.

Its purpose: greater knowledge, better health, better living.

will have time to chill. They don't have chilled, but I think they taste better fruit—in this case, strawberries. . . .
t the stew in good time. It could be e in the morning, too, then reheated. . . .
biscuits are the only last-minute trick.

[4] Baked Custards

reheat the oven to 350°F. Scald 4 cups
k. By scald, I mean heat it until a n, crinkly film forms on top. Beat 6 s slightly with a fork—only enough to ak up the whites and yolks. Add ½ cup ar and a pinch of salt. Now add the lded milk gradually to the eggs and ar, stirring as you add it—and I do an gradually. If added too fast, the hot lk will cook the egg and you'll have little ating bits of egg in the milk that look as ambled eggs do when they first begin to ok. Why scald the milk for custards?
stards can be made perfectly well with-t scalding the milk. But by scalding the lk, the baking time is shortened and the agulation, or setting, of your custards startel more readily. So much for why it this way. Add 1 teaspoon vanilla to e liquid custard and strain into greased stard cups. Straining assures a smooth star. Set them in a pan of hot water—aving the water come up to about ½ inch o top of custard cups. By baking in ter, the outer part of the custard to get overdone before center is
. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., minutes, or until done. When is ne? An ages-old test for doneness is till th best. Insert a silver knife into he custards—gently though—pull it out.
f the knife is clean, custard is set. If custar clings to the knife and mixture ooks silky, leave custards in oven a bit onger. There's just a right point for tak-ng out a custard, and you'll learn how it should look the more often you make me. The look, and often the feel, in ooking is as important as the things you do. To long cooking or too-high baking temperatures makes custards watery. Removes he cards from hot water and use pot holder—unless you're lucky enough to have a custard rack. I like to put custards in refrigerator immediately on a board or cloth so contact with metal ration't cause the custard cups to chicken oftentimes custards will continue to cook in the cups after removing them from the oven. The cups hold the heat, you see. This will make 6 custards. If the quantities for 2 persons, although ours turn out as well as I think they will you will be glad to have them cold for other meals.

For a custard to serve over fruit, pudding and as a base for floating island and cream use the same ingredients. Scald milk in top of double boiler; add it to eggs, sugar, salt, but this time return to the double boiler and cook over hot water, stirring constantly until mixture just coats a metal spoon. It's harder to tell the right point with a wooden spoon, even though you may use that for stirring.
Pour custard into a bowl as soon as it reaches the right point. Add vanilla, and cool quickly in refrigerator. (Keeps it from cooking too far, which means curdling—see cook book.) And if you've ever had curdle, you know what that looks like.

[5] Brown Lamb Stew

There are two kinds of stew—a brown stew and a light stew. For a brown stew the meat is browned in fat before liquid is added. For a light stew, the meat is not browned. Chicken fricassee and veal stew are examples of light stews. Brown stews are usually more popular. At least I prefer them.

For the lamb stew, purchase 2 pounds of shoulder of lamb. Have it cut into 1½-inch pieces at the butcher's. Season with salt and pepper, and dust the pieces with flour. Heat 2 tablespoons shortening or lard in a heavy pot—Dutch-oven type metal—or top-of-range casserole. Brown the lamb well on all sides. Drain off excess fat. Add about 2 cups water and 1 clove garlic, minced. Put on the lid tightly and simmer, covered, over low heat, or bake in a covered roaster or casserole in the oven until the meat is almost tender when you pierce it with a fork. The slow heat and the moisture tenderize the less tender cuts, so never let a stew boil. Now add vegetables—4 cup diced potatoes, 1 cup carrots, diced and cut into chunks, 1 cup shelled peas and a few small white onions make a good combination, though you can be as adventurous as you like. Add a little more water if necessary, and additional seasoning. Continue to cook until vegetables are tender. To serve, skim off fat and thicken slightly with a little flour-and-water thickening—just as you learned to do in making gravy. Cook a little longer to thicken.

Part beef, part lamb and part veal make a good stew; and that reminds me—braising is similar to stewing. In this class are pot roasts, braised pork chops, and so on. To braise, you season and flour the meat, brown it thoroughly, cover and simmer slowly to tenderize, but this time add little or no water. A heavy Dutch oven or casserole with tight-fitting lid is essential for successful braising—as all the juices must be kept in. The slow cooking and the natural moisture from the meat do the tenderizing.

[13] Baking-Powder Biscuits

You need a light touch for a light biscuit, and the best way to acquire skill is to watch a good biscuitmaker perform. Then practice, practice, practice. Anyway, here are all the whys and wherefores. If your first batch should be a big success, you follow the rules.

Preheat your oven to 450° F. Sift 2 cups flour with ½ teaspoon salt and 3 teaspoons baking powder into a mixing bowl. Add ¼ cup vegetable shortening and cut the fat into the flour the same way you do for the pastry, only this time more thoroughly. Mixture should look like fine crumbs or coarse corn meal. Make a hole in the center and add ¾ cup milk all at once. Stir together quickly with a few quick whisks with a fork until all the milk is blended in with the dry ingredients. The dough should be light and soft. Scrape it onto a lightly floured pastry cloth or board. Dip your hands in flour and knead the dough ever so lightly—only about 10 seconds. Kneading means to press the dough with the heel of one hand—but not too hard—turning and folding the dough with the other hand. This gentle kneading for only a few seconds will make your biscuits flaky. Now pat or roll out dough to ½-inch thickness. Cut with a floured cooky cutter. If you flour the cutter each time, the biscuit dough won't stick to it. Place biscuits several inches apart. Shape and reroll the scraps for more biscuits. A quick way to cut biscuits is to mark and cut the dough into square or diamond-shaped pieces with a sharp knife. No rerolling of scraps then is necessary. Bake in a hot oven, 450° F., 10 minutes.

For drop biscuits*, increase the milk to 1 cup. Drop by tablespoons onto greased cooky sheet instead of rolling them.

For shortcake*, increase shortening to ¼ cup and add 1 tablespoon sugar to dry ingredients.

For cheese biscuits*, add ½ to 1 cup grated cheese before adding the milk.

THE weight of bringing home su grades should never hang heavily child's head, but he ought to feel that pride of the family an occasional touch is a fine thing.

Children always take the line of persistence.

In the weaving of a marriage every wo knows who supplies the warp and who woof.

Note to brides: If the count is more t ten, a husband may be years learning all wife's relatives—and he probably never know who gave each wedding present.

To omit nicknaming one child, if the oth in the family have been given nicknames, to disinherit him from your spirit.

Our old dog Rags (already named whe presented to us several years ago) now has companion in a new English cocker, Th Duchess of Earlham, which, as far as dog are concerned, has sent us from rags t riches.

So economical she always made an open-faced pie.

As out-of-place as a station wagon in a funeral procession.
